A Sound National Farm Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, since 1918 the problems of agriculture have been a matter of national concern. For 30 years the farmers, the farm organizations, and Congress have worked toward the solution of those problems—and with a good deal of success.

Any program of such nature must be in the best interests of the whole country. We have approximately 27,000,000 farm people, and of those 27,000,000 approximately 10,000,000 are considered farm operators and farm workers. They are a unit on which 30,000,000 other persons—processors, wholesalers, and retailers—depend.

It has been established, time and time again, that a healthy and prosperous agriculture means a prosperous economy for our Nation, in the best interests of all our citizens. I have sincerely believed that prosperity for the entire country depends—and to a large extent—upon a prosperous agriculture.

The farmer today is an efficient, well-trained businessman. With the job of farming he must know marketing, purchasing, finance, bookkeeping, engineering, and tax regulations; as well as plant rotation, pest control, soil conservation, scientific breeding, and sanitation.

The American farmer's big struggle has been to get a fair price in the market place. Through hard work he has made progress under the parity-price formula which was set up under the leadership of farm organizations in the 1920's. Years of education have convinced the public and both political parties that parity is fair to both the farmer and the consumer.

Finding a workable and sound method to dispose of national and local farm surpluses continues to be the problem confronting American agriculture. While many proposals to accomplish this purpose have been suggested or tried out during the past 25 years, the problem remains largely unsolved for a peacetime economy.

For the immediate future, with the United States again mobilizing for an all-out war effort, it is vital to the economy of the country to secure maximum production of all essential farm products. Abundant production of food will help win the war and also materially curb a run-away price inflation. However, to secure full production for the emergency, satisfactory price-support floors should be provided to protect producers of both basic crops and vital perishable commodities from drastic market declines. No one can predict the length of the present war emergency or the demand that will be made on American farmers for food and other farm products to win the war and take care of domestic needs.

Congress should now study and prepare legislation for a sound and permanent long-range farm program. Such action is vital to the future economy of our country. Instead of following unsound agricultural proposals to solve the farm problem, I propose that we correct the objectionable features of the present farm program, and proceed to repeal administration policies that work to the detriment of agriculture. This should be our first goal. There are many desirable features in the present farm program, which I helped to enact, which should be retained and improved. In connection with this action, I am proposing changes in the long-range farm program. The development of this program should be free from political manipulation. My proposal contemplates equality in economic opportunity for the men and women who produce the food and fiber for the Nation.

If parity means anything, the farmer should receive parity prices in the market place, and not be made dependent on the Government for a substantial portion of his annual income. With less than 20 percent of our population engaged in agriculture, one does not need to be an expert to figure out that any farm program will be a complete failure when its success depends on securing billions of dollars in annual appropriations to be used as production payments to farmers. If appropriations fail, farmers particularly engaged in the production of dairy products, poultry products, livestock, and other perishable commodities would be left holding the bag and headed for bankruptcy. These farmers produce the bulk of American farm income, and if they go into an economic tailspin, depression will overtake the entire country.

REMOVAL OF DOMESTIC TRADE BARRIERS

Domestic trade barriers which stop or retard the free flow of quality farm products between various areas in the United States, should be abolished. Such action is vital to the future welfare of Midwest dairy farmers, who are now stopped from selling their milk and cream in 36 of the large consuming areas of the United States under the Milk Marketing Agreement Act of 1937, and because of local and State regulations.

RESTORE TO BUTTER ITS HISTORIC YELLOW COLOR

For the past 60 years the oleomargarine industry has tried to steal the natural yellow color of butter to be used in coloring oleomargarine so that this synthetic product would look like butter. During this period a Federal law has prohibited the coloring of oleomargarine in imitation of butter without the payment of a 10 cent per pound tax.

Since the beginning of the Democratic Roosevelt Administration in 1933, the oleomargarine industry intensified its drive to repeal this Federal law. Until the Eighty-first Democratic Congress, this onslaught was successfully stopped by groups representing dairy farmers and Congressmen from dairy States. The repeal of the tax was never an issue. The fight was over the color "yellow."

However, in the Eighty-first Democratic-controlled Congress, the Democratic Party joined hands with the oleomargarine industry and succeeded in passing a law that legalized the coloring of oleomargarine yellow in imitation of butter. President Harry S. Truman signed and approved this law on March 16, 1950. The law went into operation on July 1, 1950, and I am convinced that it will do untold damage to dairy farmers in the Midwest butter-producing States. It will also permit fraud and deception on the consuming public.

In the past 10 years butter consumption has decreased from 17 pounds to 10 pounds per capita, and oleomargarine consumption has gone from 2 pounds to around 6 pounds per capita. The law repealing the tax on oleomargarine should stand, but I insist and will fight to repeal the law which permits oleomargarine to be colored yellow in imitation of butter for shipment in interstate commerce.

IMPORTS OF COMPETITIVE FARM PRODUCTS

Parity tariffs on competitive imports of farm products should be established to protect American farmers. Imports of pork products, butter, cheese eggs, fresh fruits, and vegetables and other competitive farm products of which a sufficient amount is produced in this country to meet domestic requirements, can only serve to break the domestic price structure, destroy the support program, and work great injury to American farmers.

In January 1950, President Truman reduced the duty on imported butter from 14 to 7 cents per pound and fixed the annual quota of butter imports at 60,000,000 pounds. Congress enacted a law authorizing the President to place an embargo on the importation of butter and other fats and oils, which is in operation at the present time. Since the authority contained in this law leaves it at the discretion of the President to continue the embargo, it is assumed that President Truman for political reasons would not permit imports of butter to come into this country until after the congressional elections on November 7, 1950.

The support price on butter is now 60 cents per pound and nearly 200,000,000 pounds of butter is in the hands of the Government under the support program. Butter from foreign countries that have devalued their money by as much as 30 percent can now ship butter into the United States, if the President removes the embargo, including tariff duty and transportation paid, at less than 50 cents per pound. Imports of butter would competely destroy any program devised to protect the integrity of the American dairy farmer who generally operates a so-called family-sized farm. It is our duty to protect American producers, and, when we do so, we safeguard the entire economy of the country.

FAMILY-TYPE FARM

Special recognition should be given to encourage farm-home ownership for the development of the family-sized farm.

CONSERVATION OF SOIL AND WATER RESOURCES

It is vital to the future welfare and security of the American people to conserve the fertility of our soil. Soil-conservation practices should be encouraged in every manner under the appropriate programs now in operation. These programs can be improved for the benefit of our economy.

Soil erosion and devastating damage caused by floods is a problem that demands the immediate attention of Congress and the country. With the limited funds that have been made available by the Federal Government, the soil-conservation districts through farmer cooperation have done magnificent work. Funds should be substantially increased to provide the required technical help for the soil-conservation districts, and also inducement should be provided under the Service for terracing of land, and planting of trees and grasses, where floods cause soil erosion and other damages due to the topography of the land.

A well-rounded soil-conservation program must take into consideration the following farm practices:

Contour farming, strip cropping, pasture improvement, seeding pasture, wildlife-area improvement, woodland management, tree planting, terraces, field diversions, farm drainage, tilling field windbreaks, prevention of grazing damage, fence-row management, and stream-bank management.

CROP INSURANCE

The over-all crop insurance program should be strengthened on a sound actuarial basis to afford Nation-wide crop coverage to American farmers on a voluntary plan.

TRADING AMERICAN SURPLUSES FOR FOREIGN CRITICAL PRODUCTS

To remove burdensome surpluses, authorization should be given to trade American farm surpluses for foreign-produced critical commodities that are not produced in the United States.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. Speaker, I have always supported a sound rural electrification program. I believe that program should be expanded and that the REA should be supported as in the past. This is but part of our program to bring to the family farm a better standard of living and better living conditions.

I supported the $800,000,000 of REA loan appropriations passed by the Eightieth Congress. This is almost half of the total loan funds voted by Congress over the previous 15 years of the REA's history. It was by far the largest amount for REA provided by any one Congress. I also supported and voted for an amendment which, if it had been enacted, would have further increased the amount of one of the Eightieth Congress' loan appropriations for REA by $25,000,000.

LET'S HAVE A SOUND FARM PROGRAM

Such a program should provide: A fair price for the farmers' products in the market aided by a system of price supports; constructive programs and research for more and better production and uses of agricultural products in industry; American markets should be preserved for American farmers; there should be adequate development and restoration of our soil and water through conservation; there should be an expansion of animal agriculture as a means of reducing surpluses and rebuilding our soil; there should be rural development and improvement—meaning better roads, better schools, better telephone service where needed, expanded rural electrification and a host of other things—including encouragement for ownership of family-sized farms; we should develop greater export markets for surplus crops.

This is the kind of a farm program worked out and supported by most of the great farm organizations of the country. In Congress, it has been supported by Members representing the great agriculture sections of the country.

It is American in its concept, and, while no one would contend that the entire answer to the farm question has yet been discovered, a program based on these principles and adjusted by experience, will give the farmer his fair share of the national income without interfering with his initiative and self-reliance, and without putting his liberty in jeopardy.

The American farmer has proven himself to be the most resourceful and productive on earth. For example, during World War II, with less hired labor, less machinery, less fertilizer, and less transportation, he increased his production 35 percent. How? By hard labor—by long hours—by good management—and by new methods.

We must never forget that our farm families are the backbone of a free and prosperous America. Let us keep them that way.

Summary of Legislation Enacted by Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH S. WHERRY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in accordance with the permission granted me earlier in the day, I present for publication in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of legislation enacted by the Eighty-first Congress from January 3, 1949, to September 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION ENACTED BY THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS, JANUARY 3, 1949, TO SEPTEMBER 21, 1950

(By Hon. KENNETH S. WHERRY, United States Senator from Nebraska)

The 2-year record of the Eighty-first Congress indicts the Democratic administration and its leadership in House and Senate for insincerity, lack of direction, extravagance, mismanagement, and irresponsible conduct of foreign affairs.

The Democratic Party, in control of Congress and the administration, proved itself morally and intellectually bankrupt. It operated on a day-to-day, politics-as-usual, opportunistic basis with its sole intent to perpetuate itself in office.

In the peacetime program it proposed prior to the invasion of Korea in June 1950, the Democratic leadership irresponsibly committed the Nation to deficit financing for Government hand-outs.

In the conduct of foreign affairs both before and after the Korean invasion, the Democratic leadership of the Nation floundered from one crisis to another with no long-range program of world-wide scope to meet the global challenge of Communist aggression. The Congress, not alert to protect the American people from the blunders and mismanagement of the administration in both domestic and foreign affairs, has demonstrated to the people the need for a new membership that will serve as a watchdog on administration leadership rather than act as a rubber stamp to every new pronouncement and change of policy that issues from the Executive.

The Eighty-first Congress was organized on January 3, 1949, with Democratic majorities in both House and Senate.

These majorities were won in the campaign of 1948 during which the electioneering President and all the vast army of Federal propagandists deliberately falsified the record to malign the real achievements under Republican leadership in the Eightieth Congress. The Democratic majorities in the Eighty-first Congress were won by distortion and smear tactics leveled against the Republican Eightieth Congress. The majorities were won by grossly fraudulent promises which the Eighty-first Congress has not delivered in the 2 years of its existence.

By contrast with the failures of the Eighty-first Congress, the record of the Eightieth Congress has regained the respect and reputation which were clouded by the vituperation and falsification of the administration spokesmen in the campaign year of 1948.

Events of the past 2 years have provided the American people with facts by which the solid achievement of Republican leadership in the Eightieth Congress is contrasted with the inadequate performance of Democratic leadership in the Eighty-first Congress.

The Eighty-first Congress, despite unwise reduction of military spending in the 1950 and 1951 budgets, could not achieve the balanced budgets which the Republican Eightieth Congress gave the Nation for the first time since a Democratic President took office in 1932.

The leaders of the Eighty-first Congress ignored the struggle of the Republican Eightieth Congress to force attention of a reluctant administration on the disastrous consequence of inaction in the Far East. It defended the President's indifference to communism in Asia until open conflict with Communist forces followed the invasion of South Korea on June 25, 1950.

The Eighty-first Congress, without strength to repeal the sound labor legislation enacted by the Republican Eightieth Congress and endorsed by the people of the Nation, refused to consider proposals of Republican leaders to vote sensible, perfecting amendments suggested by 3 years of successful operation of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Eighty-first Congress killed the peril-point provision written into the Reciprocal Trade Act by the Eightieth Congress in order to offer moderate protection of American workmen from competition of imports produced by foreign sweat-shop labor. The Eighty-first Congress voted down this proposal to require the President, in making trade agreements, to be advised by a nonpartisan Tariff Commission of the point below which tariff reduction imperils American job security.

The Democratic leadership of the Eighty-first Congress obstructed the crusade carried on in the Eightieth Congress to eliminate Communists and Communist sympathizers from the Federal payroll. It set up a committee to "whitewash" substantiated charges that Communists have been or are now operating in the executive branch of Government. Only the full pressure of public opinion following conviction or confession of Communist activity in Government could induce Democratic leadership to bring to a vote in the closing hours of Congress a subversive-control bill for which Republicans had been pressing. The measure was passed over a Presidential veto, despite opposition of administration spokesmen.

On June 25 the Democratic leadership in the Eighty-first Congress was forced by the outbreak of hostilities in Korea to recognize the seriousness of the Communist threat in Asia and the world, concerning which Republican leaders in the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses had issued prophetic, unheeded warnings.

The Korean crisis forced the administration and the Democratic leadership in Congress to repudiate their previous position of "letting the dust settle" in Asia. Belatedly, attention was given to Republican demands for affirmative action to block Communist aggression and for enactment of legislation curbing subversive activities on the home front. The action of the administration in these two fields was welcomed by Republicans in Congress. Full cooperation was given by Republicans in both Houses in enactment of legislation to build up the armed services and provide necessary controls for the domestic economy.

THE LEGISLATIVE RECORD

Increased taxation, domestic controls, and legislation directly concerned with the defense effort following the Korean invasion were passed in the closing weeks of the Eighty-first Congress. Prior to the emergency, the major effort by Democratic leadership in the Congress was directed toward extending and implementing programs initiated in preceding Congresses.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The Eighty-first Congress voted in both sessions to continue the activities of the Economic Cooperation Administration inaugurated in the Eightieth Congress. The ECA program, intended to be reduced each year and terminated in 1952, was given substantially reduced funds for its operation in both fiscal years 1950 and 1951. The Democratic leadership in Congress, supporting the policies of the administration, was hostile to constructive criticism of Republicans based on the experience of ECA in operation. An amendment offered by Republicans to halt the transfer by European nations of ECA grants to Russia was fought by administration leadership despite the open scandal of shipment of war materials and potentials to Russia by Britain and other governments.

The Eighty-first Congress, carrying out the intent of the Vandenberg resolution of the Eightieth Congress, ratified the North Atlantic Treaty in 1949 and subsequently appropriated funds for transfer of arms to countries participating in a mutual defense pact. Military aid inaugurated by the Eightieth Congress for Greece, Iran, Turkey, the Philippines, Korea, and other nations, was continued by the Eighty-first Congress in the mutual defense program and was stepped up after the Korean invasion.

The administration, however, was slow to execute the will of Congress in respect to building up the defenses of other nations. Of $27,400,000 appropriated in 1949 for Iran, Korea, and the Philippines, for example, only a negligible part had been spent when Korea was invaded in late June of 1950. Even more striking was the failure of the administration to use funds appropriated in 1948 and 1949 for aid of forces fighting communism on the China mainland.

The attitude of the Democratic leadership in the Eighty-first Congress and the administration toward Republican demands for a firm policy in Asia expressed complete indecision prior to the Korean invasion. In January of 1950, when Republican leaders in the Senate called for assurances that Formosa would not fall into Communists' hands by default, Democratic leaders in Congress termed Republicans "warmongers." Administration spokesmen, including the President and the Secretary of State, were critical of Republican Senators and declared a line of strategic defense in the East that excluded Korea and Formosa.

Of course, the administration was forced by events in Korea to make a complete reversal of this policy and adopted the Republican point of view 6 months later when Korea was invaded.

Administration proposals for Point 4 were presented to the Eighty-first Congress in the second session without adequate preparation or programing. In effect, only increased activity in technical assistance programs now carried on were proposed. But the scope of increased activity and the joint operation of the new program by the United Nations, cooperating with the United States, were outlined in very vague and general terms. The Congress allowed less funds than those requested and attempted, despite administration protests, to define more clearly the scope of Point 4 activities intended by Congress.

Republicans played a major part in the Eighty-first Congress in earmarking funds for loans to the Spanish Government. Following the advice of military experts that Spain is essential to an integrated defense program for Europe, the Congress forced through a Spanish loan provision that was opposed by the President and his congressional leadership. The President has declared his intention to ignore the congressional directive that Spain be aided in its fight against communism.

APPROPRIATIONS AND EXPENDITURES

The Eightieth Congress provided for 2 years the first balanced budget for the Federal Government since the Democrats assumed office in 1932.

During the Eighty-first Congress, the Federal Government was returned to deficit spending by congressional leadership which gave cooperation to the President in many new, large-spending projects. Leaving out fixed charges of the Government such as those for interest on the national debt, and leaving out payment for national defense, foreign aid, and veterans' affairs, the other cost of Government climbed steadily from $5,000,000,000 in 1947 to nearly $11,000,000,000 in 1950.

Republican attempts to achieve economy in Government spending during the Eighty-first Congress were vigorously opposed by administration leadership and were, for the most part, unsuccessful. The many attempts made to cut amounts appropriated to individual items were fought off by Democratic leadership both in the Appropriations Committees and on the floors of House and Senate.

Appropriations for 1951 were presented to the Congress in one bill for the first time in history. The so-called omnibus appropriations bill, largely the result of Republican effort over several sessions, presented all appropriation items in one bill rather than in the customary 10 separate appropriation bills of prior years.

The omnibus appropriations bill offered economy-minded legislators their first major opportunity to cut expenditures. In the Senate, the Bridges-Byrd amendment was offered to the bill making an across-the-board percentage reduction in appropriations with proper exemptions for defense items and fixed payments. The potential savings of this amendment approximated $500,000,000. A similar amendment to the bill had been adopted in the House.

In the House-Senate conference on the bill, the Bridges-Byrd amendment was dropped and general instructions were given the President to reduce appropriations by $550,000,000. Republicans, who had given full support to the Bridges-Byrd amendment, accepted the conference compromise, although the directive to the President constituted a wide delegation of congressional power to the Executive in determining where reductions in expenditure should be effected.

After the invasion of South Korea, supplemental appropriations were voted for the war effort with Republican support. Republicans were critical, however, of the failure of the Executive to trim nonessential spending not related to defense. They were equally critical of the failure by the President to outline an overall program of defense and overseas activity to indicate the extent of the burden the American people will now be asked to carry in support of their Government.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Republicans gave full cooperation in Congress to the building up of an adequate national defense. They supported the legislation providing for reorganization of the armed services along the lines set forth as a result of creation of the Hoover Commission in the Eightieth Congress. They gave full support also to appropriations for the military.

Republicans played a major part in forcing through Congress against administration opposition funds necessary for a strong air force. These funds were subsequently impounded by the President and the Air Force strength was not built up until the outbreak of hostilities in Korea forced the President to recognize the wisdom of congressional action in this area.

Republicans, committed to the principle of economy in Government and reduction of nonessential expenditures, never stinted in appropriating funds for adequate defense. In all, some $90,000,000,000 were provided for the military after World War II, despite which the administration was caught unprepared to carry out the limited action demanded in the early months of Communist hostilities in Korea.

DOMESTIC PROGRAMS

One of the major accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress was the revision of social security legislation which was brought about by Republican support. The new amendment of the law grew out of suggestions made by a study group created in the Eightieth Congress to re-examine the social security program.

Largely as a result of Republican demand, the new social security law carries provision for a commission to make further study of the system and the advisability of adopting a "pay-as-you-go" policy with more nearly universal coverage.

The farm law passed by the Eighty-first Congress embraced the principles of the Hope-Aiken law passed in the Eightieth Congress as the first permanent price-support legislation. The production-payment scheme spelled out in the Brannan plan made no headway in the Eighty-first Congress, largely because of opposition by the Republican Party and the major farm organizations.

The President's proposals for socialized medicine were completely disregarded in the Eighty-first Congress when they faced the total opposition of Republicans and the hostility of the medical profession.

Action taken in the Eighty-first Congress made a start toward carrying out the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission on reduction of expenditures in the executive branch of Government. In the first session of the Congress, the President was given wide powers to reorganize and streamline executive agencies, subject to the veto power of the Congress. This veto power was exercised in several incidents in which the President sought to use reorganization powers for political ends, exemplified in his proposal to change the Taft-Hartley law in reorganization of the National Labor Relations Board, or to advance his socialized medicine program in creation of a Welfare Department not in conformance with Hoover recommendations.

The Congress, on its own initiative, executed some of the Hoover reforms, notably in the National Defense Department and the Department of State. It is estimated that total reorganization to date may effect savings of $1,400,000,000 out of a potential total savings of four to five billion dollars by adoption of the Hoover proposals.

No major labor legislation was enacted in the Eighty-first Congress, although Democratic Party leaders continued to attack the Taft-Hartley law, echoing the labor bosses. In the first session of the Congress, perfecting amendments to the law were adopted in the Senate with Republican support. The Democratic leaders chose to kill such amendments in the House, however, rather than lose their issue of outright repeal. The successful operation of the law since its passage in the Eightieth Congress has been attested by the lessened number of strikes, the increased prosperity and growth of unions, and the general endorsement given the law by the American people.

Republicans in the Eighty-first Congress gave support to continuing programs for reclamation, flood control, housing construction, veterans' benefits, and the normal operations of Government that must be carried on within the limits that the Nation can afford.

DEMOCRATIC INSINCERITY

In carrying out the legislative program in the Eighty-first Congress, the administration and its leadership in House and Senate displayed a flagrant insincerity and political cynicism.

The bills for Alaskan and Hawaiian statehood, which passed the House in the first session of Congress, were held on the Senate Calendar. Contrary to promises of Democratic leadership, they had not been brought up for consideration by the time Congress adjourned in September.

Similarly, civil-rights measures were exploited by Democratic leadership without sincere effort to secure passage.

The Ferguson antilynch bill, reported favorably out of committee in the first session, never was brought to the floor for action by the Senate majority leadership although prospects for shutting off debate and passing the measure were excellent. An antipoll tax measure was mishandled in the same fashion.

A fair employment practice bill, highly controversial in many of its provisions, was brought to the Senate floor late in the second session and there discarded by the majority leader after token attempts to shut off debate by exercise of the new Wherry-Hayden cloture rule. In voting for cloture, Republicans overwhelmingly favored the closing of debate while Democrats could not muster half their votes to carry out civil-rights promises written into the campaign platforms of both major political parties.

MAJOR LEGISLATION ENACTED BY THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS, (JANUARY 3, 1949-SEPTEMBER 23, 1950)

The Presidential pay raise

(Public Law 2. Approved January 19, 1949)

Congress suspended rules to increase the President's salary from $75,000 to $100,000 and that of the Vice President from $20,000 to $30,000 a year. It also voted a tax-free allowance for the President of $50,000 a year; and for the Vice President, $10,000 a year.

Agriculture

Farm Price Supports

(Public Law 439. Approved October 31, 1949)

The farm price support bill rushed through in the closing hours of the first session compromised the Senate revision of the Aiken law and the House demands for 90 percent support levels. The Brannan plan never was put to a vote by administration leaders who found no support for its production-payment provisions in either House of Congress. The new farm law provides that basic crops—wheat, cotton, corn, tobacco, peanuts, and rice—will be supported at 90 percent of parity in 1950, at 80 to 90 percent of parity in 1951, and at 75 to 90 percent thereafter. Farmers are given the option of two parity formulas to achieve maximum support levels. Milk and milk products will be supported on a sliding scale of 75 to 90 percent of parity. Wool, potatoes, and a few other nonbasic crops will have 60 to 90-percent support. Other commodities will be supported at levels up to 90 percent at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. The law resembles the Aiken law passed in the Eightieth Congress, which was the first permanent farm legislation.

Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act Amendment

(Public Law 85. Approved June 7, 1949)

This legislation, introduced by a bipartisan group, modifies the charter of the Corporation. The Commodity Credit Corporation was given its first permanent Federal charter by the Eightieth Congress. The charter also was revised to provide for storage facilities for agricultural products.

Rural Telephones

(Public Law 423. Approved October 28, 1949)

Introduced by a large bipartisan group, the legislation authorizes the Rural Electrification Administration to make loans to finance expansion, construction, and operations of rural telephone service.

Crop Insurance Act of 1949

(Public Law 268. Approved August 25, 1949)

The legislation continues the crop-insurance program on an experimental basis as begun in the Eightieth Congress, but provides for gradual expansion of crop insurance to additional counties. It contains other modifications of the law pursuant to the program initiated in 1947.

Oleomargarine

(Public Law 459. Approved March 16, 1950)

Passed with support of both parties, this law repeals Federal taxes on oleomargarine and contains provisions regulating the sale of colored margarine.

Cotton and Peanut Acreage Allotments and Potato Supports

(Public Law 471. Approved March 31, 1950)

The law provides for the establishment of minimum farm allotments for cotton for the year 1950 equal to the larger of two different percentage computations, except that no farm under this provision could receive an allotment over 40 percent of the acreage on the farm which is tilled annually or in regular rotation. It allows marketing penalty for excess peanuts to be avoided by marketing through designated agencies and limits reduction of 1950 peanut allotments. The Secretary of Agriculture is given discretionary authority over disposition of Irish potatoes acquired under the 1949 price-support program, so that those potatoes may be used for human consumption rather than destroyed. It prohibits price support on 1950 crop of Irish potatoes where marketing orders have been disapproved, and prohibits price support in 1951 and thereafter unless marketing quotas are in effect.

[1] These estimates include any additional amounts which may have been submitted to the Senate after the bill was acted on by House Appropriations Committee.
[2] These figures include $433,968,011 to be rescinded as effected by sec. 702; the branches of the service and the amount to be rescinded from each were to be determined by the Secretary of Defense.
[3] Rescissions to be effected by sec. 702 were allocated to the various appropriations affected.
[4] This table includes only cash appropriations.
[5] The total of the Post Office appropriations is $2,207,500,000 payable from postal revenues to the extent such funds become available and the remainder from the Treasury. Estimated revenue is $1,761,000,000.

Civil rights

Cloture rule

(Adopted March 17, 1949)

Offered by Republican leadership during the filibuster on civil-rights legislation early in the Eighty-first Congress, the rule provides that a constitutional two-thirds may cut off debate on a motion to take up legislation. The cloture rule is the most significant action taken in many sessions toward obtaining consideration for civil-rights legislation, since, for the first time, it becomes possible to shut off debate in the Senate on a motion to take up. First tested in a vote on the motion to take up the FEPC bill in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, it was supported by 33 of 42 Republican Senators, and failed because only 22 of 54 Democratic Senators would vote to close debate.

Communism

Subversive Control Act

(Public Law 831, over the President's veto, September 23, 1950)

Republicans led the drive for the enactment over the President's veto of legislation to protect this country from internal sabotage by Communists. Not until the pressure of public opinion grew too strong to ignore did Democrat leadership in this Congress schedule any subversive control bill for action. As finally agreed upon by both Houses, this act combines the original Republican bill as amended with a number of other provisions relating to our internal security. The compromise bill provides, among other things, for registration of Communists and officers of "front" organizations, bans members of either group from holding Federal jobs or receiving passports, labeling of their literature by Communists, and detention of Communists in case of invasion, insurrection, or declaration of war.

Education

Emergency School Aid

(Public Law 306. Approved September 10, 1949)

The law authorized appropriations of $7,500,000 to continue Federal assistance through 1950 to local school agencies that are overburdened with defense-incurred school enrollments or that provide schools for children on Federal reservations or other federally owned property.

Finance and commerce

Export Control Act of 1949

(Public Law 11. Approved February 26, 1949)

The Eighty-first Congress continued the authority of the President through 1951 to control exports of certain commodities, excluding fats and oils, when in domestic surplus. The law conforms to laws passed in the Eightieth and prior Congresses.

Import Controls Over Fats, Oils, Rice

(Public Law 590. Approved June 30, 1950)

The Eighty-first Congress continued through June 1951 the import controls over fats and oils and rice and rice products.

Extension of Rubber Act

(Public Law 575. Approved June 24, 1950)

This act extends for 2 years the effective period of the Rubber Act of 1948, enacted by the Republican Eightieth Congress, to provide for a synthetic-rubber industry.

Tax Act

Designed as a start toward financing the Korean war, this act increases individual income taxes by about 20 percent. The act increases corporate income taxes beginning with income earned after July 1, 1950. Among provisions designed to plug loopholes in existing tax laws is one under which life-insurance companies will pay income taxes for 1949 and 1950.

General government

Reorganization Act of 1949

(Public Law 109. Approved June 20, 1949)

Introduced by a bipartisan group, this legislation carries out some of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch, which was created by the Eightieth Congress and which submitted its report early in 1949. The act gave the Chief Executive wide powers to correct the waste and mismanagement found in the present administration. Under the terms of the act the reorganization plans submitted by the President become law if not disapproved by a constitutional majority of either the Senate or the House within 60 days.

Thirty-four plans were presented pursuant to this legislation in the Eighty-first Congress. Plans No. 1 of 1949 and No. 27 of 1950 were voted down in the Senate by a strong majority because they seemed to jeopardize creation of a separate governmental unit to direct public health activities, as recommended by the Hoover Commission. Plans 2 through 7 of 1949 went into effect on August 19, 1949. They are:

No. 2. Transfers the Bureau of Employment Security from Federal Security Agency to the Department of Labor.

No. 3. Strengthens top-level organization of the Post Office Department.

No. 4. Transfers National Security Council and National Security Resources Board to the Executive Office of the President.

No. 5. Makes Chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission its chief executive and administrative officer.

No. 6. Makes Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission its chief executive and administrative officer.

No. 7. Transfers Public Roads Administration from Federal Works Agency to the Department of Commerce.

In the second session 27 plans were submitted, of which 7 were rejected by the Congress. Those rejected are:

No. 1. Proposed vesting almost all functions of Treasury Department in Secretary of Treasury. Opposition centered around transfer of functions of Comptroller of Currency. See plan No. 26 below.

No. 4. Proposed vesting almost all functions of Agriculture Department in Secretary of Agriculture.

No. 7. Proposed vesting administrative responsibility in the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and transferring power to select Chairman from members of the Commission to the President.

No. 11. Proposed transferring administrative responsibility for the Federal Communications Commission from the Commissioners to the Chairman.

No. 12. Proposed reorganizing the National Labor Relations Board, including abolishment of the Office of General Counsel.

No. 24. Proposed transfer of Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Commerce Department.

No. 27. Proposed creation of a Department of Health, Education, and Security.

The remaining plans submitted which went into effect are:

No. 2. Vests almost all functions of the Justice Department in the Attorney General. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 3. Vests almost all functions of Interior Department in the Secretary of the Interior. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 5. Vests almost all functions of Commerce Department in Secretary of Commerce. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 6. Vests almost all functions of Labor Department in Secretary of Labor. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 8. Vests administrative responsibility in Chairman of Federal Trade Commission. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 9. Vests administrative responsibility in Chairman of Federal Power Commission. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 10. Vests administrative responsibility in Chairman of Securities and Exchange Commission. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 13. Vests administrative responsibility in Chairman of Civil Aeronautics Board. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 14. Vests in the Secretary of Labor responsibility for labor standards enforcement. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 15. Transfers responsibility of the General Services Administrator for public works programs in Alaska and the Virgin Islands to the Secretary of Interior. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 16. Transfers school assistance and water pollution control activities of the General Services Administration to the Federal Security Agency. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 17. Transfers administration of Federal grants to State and local governments for advance planning of public works from the General Services Administration to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 18. Transfers to General Services Administrator functions of Federal agencies respecting leasing, custody, etc., of Federal office buildings. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 19. Transfers from Federal Security Agency to the Labor Department, the Bureau of Employees' Compensation and Appeals Board. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 20. Transfers from Secretary of State to General Services Administrator certain record keeping and certification functions pertaining to official documents. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 21. Abolishes Maritime Commission and establishes a Maritime Administration in the Department of Commerce. Effective May 24, 1950.

No. 22. Transfers Federal National Mortgage Association from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Effective September 8, 1950.

No. 23. Transfers lending functions of Reconstruction Finance Corporation regarding prefabricated houses to Housing and Home Finance Agency. Effective September 8, 1950.

No. 25. Transfers functions of National Security Resources Board to its Chairman with full powers of delegation. Effective July 9, 1950.

No. 26. To meet congressional objection to Plan No. 1 of 1950, the Treasury reorganization plan was resubmitted making exempt from the transfer of functions those of the Comptroller of the Currency. Effective July 9, 1950.

Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949

(Public Law 152. Approved June 30, 1949)

This legislation was enacted to carry out recommendations of the Hoover Commission in regard to the handling of Government property, procurement of Government supplies, and establishment of General Services Administration. Public Law 754 of the second session further implements Hoover Commission advices in this field by amendment to this act.

State Department Organization

(Public Law 73. Approved May 26, 1949)

The reorganization of the State Department provided for in this legislation carries out recommendations made by the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch.

Executive Pay Bill

(Public Law 359. Approved October 15, 1949)

Salary increases granted heads and assistant heads of departments and agencies in this legislation are in general compliance with the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission.

Federal Employees' Classification Act Revision

(Public Law 429. Approved October 28, 1949)

This legislation revised the Classification Act granting salary increases to classified employees, supplementing the cost-of-living increase for Government employees granted in the Eightieth Congress.

Postal Pay Raise

(Public Law 428. Approved October 28, 1949)

Introduced by a bipartisan group, this legislation grants postal employees a salary increase.

Post Office Financial Control Act of 1950

(Public Law 712. Approved August 17, 1950)

With the objective of carrying out recommendations of the Hoover Commission relative to accounting and auditing for the Post Office Department, the Congress implemented the necessary procedural changes in this act.

Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950

(Public Law 784, Approved September 12, 1950)

Stemming from Hoover Commission recommendations seeking to modernize the Federal budgeting and accounting system, this measure provides the framework for bringing the budgeting, accounting, and auditing procedures up to date.

Housing and community facilities

Housing and Rent Act of 1950

(Public Law 574. Approved June 23, 1950)

This legislation continues the Rent Act of the Eightieth and prior Congresses to December 31, 1950, with a local-option provision for further extension through June 30, 1951, unless sooner terminated by Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution by Congress.

Housing Act of 1949

(Public Law 171. Approved July 15, 1949)

Introduced by 11 members of each party, this legislation is the culmination of the efforts of a bipartisan group that has worked through several past sessions to enact a comprehensive housing law. Construction of 810,000 low-rent housing units in the next 6 years is authorized. Federal aid is provided for slum clearance and for construction of farm dwellings.

Alaska Housing Act

(Public Law 52. Approved April 23, 1949)

This legislation raises the dollar ceilings on mortgage loans on housing in Alaska and provides a secondary market for securities.

Alaska Public Works Act

(Public Law 264. Approved August 24, 1949)

Expenditure of $70,000,000 is authorized for a public-works program in Alaska for schools, hospitals, sewers, wharfs, docks, etc.

Advance Planning of Public Works

(Public Law 352. Approved October 13, 1949)

This legislation, introduced by a bipartisan group, is a renewal of a similar program authorized in 1944 and carries on through October 13, 1951. Appropriation of $100,000,000 is authorized for loans and grants to States and other non-Federal public agencies to undertake advance planning of public works.

Federal Grants for Minor Airport Projects

(Public Law 445. Approved February 9, 1950)

Under terms of this law congressional approval of Federal grants for class 4 or larger airports would carry over for 2 succeeding fiscal years. Also, improvements of $50,000 or less at such airports would be exempt from requirements of specific congressional approval.

(Public Law 475. Approved April 20, 1950)

After rejecting the President's new, highly controversial middle-income, cooperative housing program, a bipartisan majority of the Congress enacted an omnibus housing measure which improves and modifies the several FHA mortgage-insurance programs; provides for disposal of war and veterans' housing; liberalizes terms of GI bill home loans; and authorizes loans to educational institutions for student housing.

Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control Acts of 1950

(Public Law 516. Approved May 17, 1950)

Title I authorizes construction, repair, and preservation of 94 public works on rivers and harbors, amounting to $203,723,125; and title II authorizes the prosecution of 59 flood-control projects, amounting to $1,249,691,200.

Federal Aid to Highways

(Public Law 769. Approved September 7, 1950)

This is an authorization for Federal aid to highways and other road construction for a 2-year period ending June 30, 1953.

International affairs

Extension of Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act

(Public Law 307. Approved September 26, 1949)

Extension of reciprocal agreements in the Eighty-first Congress continued a program that has been in existence since 1934. The Eighty-first Congress voted down a Republican-sponsored amendment which would have directed the Tariff Commission to set the rate of duty below which the United States could not go in trade negotiation without endangering American industry. This amendment, which was added to the bill in the Eightieth Congress and operated successfully for a year, required the President to explain his action to the Congress and the people whenever he ignored the findings of the Tariff Commission. This provision, which offered a reasonable safeguard to American industry against the competition of cheap foreign labor, was defeated by the Democratic leadership on the grounds that it was restrictive legislation although the only possible restriction under the amendment was that imposed by public opinion.

(Public Law 25. Approved March 24, 1949)

This legislation authorized a special contribution of $16,000,000 to the United Nations for the relief of Palestine refugees.

(Public Law 283. Approved September 3, 1949)

The Eightieth Congress merged two Government corporations to form the institute with a charter for 3 years. The Eighty-first Congress extended the life of the charter for 5 years and authorized an appropriation.

North Atlantic Pact

(Ratified by Senate July 21, 1949)

The North Atlantic Pact was ratified by the Eighty-first Congress to fulfill part of the promise expressed in the Vandenberg resolution adopted in the Eightieth Congress. The pact was ratified with strong bipartisan support.

International Wheat Agreement

(Ratified by Senate June 13, 1949)

The international wheat pact, unanimously deferred in the Foreign Relations Committee of the Eightieth Congress, was ratified by the Eighty-first Congress, and the Government was authorized to pay a subsidy necessary to encourage the export of 168,000,000 bushels of wheat for each of the next 5 years. The Congress later authorized Commodity Credit Corporation to carry out operations to fulfill United States commitments under the agreement. (Public Law 421, approved October 27, 1949.)

Far Eastern Economic Assistance Act of 1950

(Public Law 447. Approved February 14, 1950)

The law extended to June 30, 1950, the President's authority to obligate funds for economic aid to certain parts of China and authorized $60,000,000 for economic aid to Korea until June 30, 1950.

Continuation of Economic Cooperation Act of 1948

(Public Law 47. Approved April 19, 1949)

The Eighty-first Congress renewed authorization for ECA in substantially the same form as the original authorization which was enacted in the Eightieth Congress under bipartisan leadership. See also Public Law 535 below.

(Public Law 535. Approved June 5, 1950)

Continuing the major international economic assistance programs begun during the Republican Eightieth Congress, members of both parties approved this measure. Title I amends the ECA act and provides $2,700,000,000 plus unexpended balances for fiscal year 1951, $600,000,000 of which is to be used to promote European trade liberalization. Title II reserves $40,000,000 of previous appropriations for China aid for non-Communist-dominated China, authorizes $8,000,000 for disaster relief in China, and $6,000,000 for educational assistance to selected Chinese in the United States. Title III authorizes United States contributions up to $27,450,000 for Palestine refugees. Title IV, the so-called Point 4 amendment, provides for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries, but does not include the other Point 4 request for guaranties of private investment abroad. Title V authorizes $15,000,000 for fiscal 1951 to support the United Nations' international children's welfare work.

(Public Law 555. Approved June 16, 1950)

Originating with the Republican Eightieth Congress, the displaced persons program was continued with modification until June 30, 1951, by Republicans and Democrats in the Eighty-first Congress. Changes enacted include increasing the number of displaced persons in the general category who can be admitted from 202,000 to 301,500, and advancing the eligibility date from December 22, 1945, to January 1, 1949.

Military Assistance Program Extension

(Public Law 621. Approved July 26, 1950)

In line with the basic policy of mutual defense aid established by Public Law 329 in the first session of the Congress, the Republicans and Democrats, with only one dissenting vote, authorized additional funds for continuing the military assistance program. New funds authorized a total of $1,222,500,000, broken down as follows: North Atlantic Treaty nations, $1,000,000,000; Turkey, Greece, and Iran, $131,500,000; Philippines and Korea, $16,000,000; and general area of China, $75,000,000. An amendment adopted provides for discontinuance of such aid to North Atlantic Treaty countries not making their full contribution to mutual defense.

Labor

Minimum Wage Increase

(Public Law 393. Approved October 26, 1949)

This legislation, offered by a large bipartisan group, increased the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour. The law does not follow the President's recommendation for greatly extended coverage. The new law clarifies the status of retail-store employees and others where administrative decisions were overriding congressional intent.

Overtime on Overtime

(Public Law 177. Approved July 20, 1949)

Legislation was enacted by the Congress to clarify overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. The law is retroactive and results from claims filed by employees and pending in the court.

National defense

National Security Act Amendments of 1949

(Public Law 216. Approved August 10, 1949)

These amendments follow recommendations of the Hoover Commission to revise the action taken by the Eightieth Congress toward unifying the armed services. The law passed in the Eightieth Congress, to which these amendments are offered, was the first unification legislation enacted although all previous Congresses since Pearl Harbor had voiced the need for unification.

Under Secretary of Defense

(Public Law 36. Approved April 2, 1949)

Following the Hoover Commission recommendations, this law revised the unification law enacted by the Eightieth Congress to create this new position.

Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949

(Public Law 110. Approved June 20, 1949)

The Eighty-first Congress revised the administration of this Agency which was established under the terms of the Unification Act of 1947, enacted by the Eightieth Congress.

Military Career Compensation Act of 1949

(Public Law 351. Approved October 12, 1949)

The Eighty-first Congress revised the military-pay schedule on the basis of information gathered by the Hoover Commission established in the Eightieth Congress.

Long-range Proving Ground for Guided Missiles

(Public Law 60. Approved May 11, 1949)

This legislation authorized expenditure of $75,000,000 for construction of installations necessary for development of an existing program.

Land-based Air Warning System—Radar

(Public Law 30. Approved March 30, 1949)

Continuing a long-range program for adequate national defense, this legislation authorized the Secretary of the Air Force to establish land-based air warning and control installations and facilities and authorized expenditure of $85,500,000.

Unitary Wind Tunnel Plan and Air Engineering Development Center

(Public Law 415. Approved October 27, 1949)

This legislation enlarged the present program of national preparedness by authorizing construction of experimental and testing facilities in the field of transonic and supersonic aeronautics.

Rental Housing Near Military Installations

(Public Law 498. Approved May 2, 1950)

As a means of encouraging rental housing construction near military installations, this measure amends the National Housing Act to permit the Secretary of the Army, Navy, or Air Force to negotiate for the services of architects and engineers without regard to civil service and classification laws.

Uniform Code of Military Justice

(Public Law 506. Approved May 5, 1950)

Both parties joined in supporting this measure as an additional step in unifying the Armed Forces. Providing a uniform code of military justice, the act revises, unifies, and codifies the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard.

Alien Enlistments in Army

(Public Law 597. Approved June 30, 1950)

The Eighty-first Congress authorized until June 30, 1953, 5-year period enlistments of unmarried aliens between 18 to 35 years of age in the Regular Army.

Extension of Selective Service Act

(Public Law 599. Approved June 30, 1950)

As a national defense measure immediately following the Korean invasion, the Eighty-first Congress extended selective service to July 9, 1951, and gave the President authority to order Reserve components into active Federal service.

Free Postage for GI's in Korea

(Public Law 609. Approved July 12, 1950)

Both parties joined in sponsoring and supporting this law providing free postage for servicemen in Korea.

Construction of Modern Naval Vessels

(Public Law 674. Approved August 8, 1950)

To strengthen the sea power of the United States, Congress authorized $350,000,000 for the construction or conversion of modern naval vessels.

Suspending Restrictions on Authorized Personnel Strength of the Armed Forces

(Public Law 655. Approved August 3, 1950)

This measure suspends the restrictions on the authorized personnel strength of any component of the Armed Forces until July 31, 1954.

Army and Air Force Authorization Act

(Public Law 604. Approved July 10, 1950)

Under this act the Eighty-first Congress provided for the composition of the Army and Air Force and put into basic law authority for Air Force activities. Later, the Congress suspended ceilings on size of the Armed Forces as a temporary measure stemming from the Korean war.

Extension of Enlistments in the Armed Forces

(Public Law 624. Approved July 27, 1950)

In view of the gravity of the Korean situation, the Congress took steps to strengthen the Armed Forces. Under this act the President is permitted until July 9, 1951, to extend all enlistments in the Armed forces for 1 year.

Facilities for Training Reserves

(Public Law 783. Approved September 11, 1950)

Another defense measure, this law provides facilities for training National Guard, Air National Guard, and Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force, and Coast Guard Reserves.

Extension of Authority to Maintain Tin-Smelting Industry

(Public Law 723. Approved August 21, 1950)

This legislation continues prior law by providing a 5-year extension of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's authority to maintain a domestic tin-smelting industry in the interest of national security. Included is authority for operation of the Government-owned Texas City smelter.

Drafting Medical and Dental Specialists

(Public Law 779. Approved September 9, 1950)

The law establishes a priority of obligation for military service among physicians, dentists, and allied categories of personnel under the Selective Service Act.

Servicemen's Family Allowances

(Public Law 771. Approved September 8, 1950)

Without show of partisanship the Congress agreed to provide allotments of from $85 to $165 monthly to GI families, including the serviceman's contribution.

Defense Production Act of 1950

(Public Law 774. Approved September 8, 1950)

As a means of preventing severe economic dislocations and of assuring fulfillment of rapidly expanding national defense requirements, the Congress passed the Defense Production Act. This law contains economic mobilization, inflation control and defense production assistance powers. Among other things, it provides for mandatory controls on a selective or industry-by-industry basis when the President finds prices in the industry are rising at an unreasonable rate, with the requirement that if price ceilings are set in a given industry, he must freeze wages; priorities and allocations powers; penalties for hoarding; requisitioning authority; aid to expanding private business; for settlement of labor disputes; and consumer and real estate credit controls.

Science

National Science Foundation

(Public Law 507. Approved May 10, 1950)

Bipartisan efforts throughout three Congresses to encourage basic research in the sciences culminated in the enactment of this measure. The law establishes a National Science Foundation as an independent agency of the Government, directed by a 24-member board and administered by a Director appointed by the President. Among other things, the Foundation would initiate and support basic research in the mathematical, physical, medical, etc., sciences, grant scholarships and graduate fellowships, and foster international exchange of scientific information.

Health Research

(Public Law 692. Approved August 15, 1950)

With the announced purpose of improving the health of the people of the United States this act amends the Public Health Service Act to support research and training in arthritis and rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, poliomyelitis, blindness, leprosy, and other diseases.

Social welfare

Hospital Survey and Construction Amendments of 1949

(Public Law 380. Approved October 25, 1949)

This act, introduced by two Members of each party, extends an existing program from 1951 to 1955, increases the annual authorization of expenditure of $150,000,000, and increases the Federal share of expenditure from one-third to a maximum of 66⅔ percent.

President's Commission on National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week

(Public Law 162. Approved July 11, 1949)

Seventy-five thousand dollars is authorized for the expenses of this Commission which promotes national interest in the employment of handicapped persons.

Rehabilitation of Navajo and Hopi Indian Tribes

(Public Law 474. Approved April 19, 1950)

The law authorizes $88,570,000 for Navajo and Hopi Indian rehabilitation, including amounts for soil and water conservation, irrigation, surveys of physical and human resources, industrial and business development, employment and resettlement off the reservation, roads and trails, communications, loans, hospitals, schools, housing, and common service facilities.

Social Security Act Amendments of 1950

(Public Law 734. Approved August 28, 1950)

The extensive study and research into social-security problems conducted during the Republican Eightieth Congress bore fruit in 1950 with the passage of this law. Supported by an overwhelming majority of both parties, the law makes substantial changes in the social-security system, nearly doubling old-age benefits and covering an additional 10,000,000 workers.

Territories

Government for Puerto Rico

(Public Law 600. Approved July 3, 1950)

In line with United States policy of self-government of territories where possible, the Eighty-first Congress provided under this law for the organization of a constitutional government by the people of Puerto Rico.

Civil Government for Guam

(Public Law 630. Approved August 1, 1950)

Complying with the wishes of local inhabitants, the Congress provided by law for a civil government for Guam, where, since 1898, all powers of government have been exercised under Presidential Executive Orders.

Transportation and Communication

Post Office Research Program

(Public Law 231. Approved August 16, 1949)

This legislation provides for research on equipment used by the Post Office Department and complies with recommendations found in the task-force report submitted by the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch.

Continuation of Maritime Commission Authority to Sell, Charter, and Operate Vessels

(Public Law 147. Approved June 29, 1949)

The legislation grants extension to 1950 of laws extended in the Eightieth Congress and prior Congresses.

Marine War-Risk and Liability Insurance

(Public Law 763. Approved September 7, 1950)

Under this law the Congress has authorized the Secretary of Commerce to provide war-risk and certain marine and liability insurance for the protection of passengers, crew, vessels, and cargoes, when endangered by war conditions or threats of war. It is restricted to domestic companies.

Security Control of Air Commerce

(Public Law 778. Approved September 9, 1950)

Whenever the President so declares by Executive Order, the Secretary of Commerce and Civil Aeronautics Board are authorized to control air traffic when the national security is endangered. This is designed to prevent a sneak attack by enemy aircraft masquerading as United States civil aircraft.

Veterans

Disabled Veterans' Special Housing

(Public Law 286. Approved September 7, 1949)

This act expands coverage of Public Law 702 of Eightieth Congress, authorizing up to $10,000 for specially adapted housing to additional groups of veterans with serious service-connected disabilities.

Omnibus Disabled Veterans' Benefits Act

(Public Law 339. Approved October 10, 1949)

Amending existing law, this act increases compensation for World War I presumptive service-connected cases, provides minimum ratings for service-connected arrested tuberculosis, increases certain disability and death compensation rates, liberalizes requirement for dependency allowances, and redefines "line of duty" and "willful misconduct."

Veterans' Education and Training Amendments of 1950

(Public Law 610. Approved July 13, 1950)

Nonpartisan in sponsorship, this law seeks to clarify the rights of veterans to take courses of study under the GI bill of rights and to amend provisions relating to contractual arrangements between the Veterans' Administrator and educational institutions.

Jewry, an Old Foe of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, this is a propitious time to direct the attention of my colleagues to an item which appeared in the September 1950, issue of the Metropolitan Star, entitled "Jewry, an Old Foe of Communism."

The Metropolitan Star is the official publication of the Metropolitan Council of B'nai B'rith.

May I also, at this time say, as stated in the Metropolitan Star, and I quote, "just for the record," B'nai B'rith at its convention in May 1938, adopted the following resolution:

Communism which rests upon a denial of democracy, upon the destruction of civil liberties, upon the suppression of the fundamental bases of human liberties—freedom of speech, freedom of the press, of peaceful assembly, of religious worship—upon a philosophy which incites the overthrow of constitutional democratic government by force and violence—for all of these reasons and more, communism is abhorrent to the Jew whose very history, tradition, religious, and spiritual training holds him near and dear to every ideal and principle which is sought to be annihilated by the vicious philosophy of communism. So that there may be no possible doubt as to the position of the B'nai B'rith on this question,

Be it resolved by the B'nai B'rith in convention assembled, that it does hereby solemnly condemn communism, both as a philosophy of government and of life.

Similar resolutions have been adopted by B'nai B'rith at every supreme lodge convention held since 1938.

The article first above referred to is as follows:

JEWRY, AN OLD FOE OF COMMUNISM

The time was October 1935. Adolf Hitler has just deprived the Jews in Germany of their rights as citizens. In the United States a prophetic statement was issued by three great Jewish leaders, Alfred M. Cohen of B'nai B'rith, Cyrus Adler of the American Jewish Committee, and B. C. Vladeck of the Jewish Labor Committee.

The document—issued in New York on October 21, 1935—was entitled, "A Public Statement on Communism and Jews."

We republish it today as an historic document with the knowledge that the attitude of Jewry toward the evil of communism and fascism has not changed one iota.

Here it is:

"To Our Fellow Citizens:

"On Sunday, September 15, the present National Socialist Government of Germany, at the behest of its Chancellor, Adolf Hitler, dictator of the German people, decreed a series of laws that put Jews beyond the legal and social pale of the German people, and deprived them of claims to German citizenship. This debasement of the Jews in Germany was not the result of a sudden decision. Long prepared for and premeditated, pledged by the National Socialist Party at its foundation, these laws were only the official culmination of a series of measures degrading and oppressing German Jews.

"This official denial of civil rights is directed against men and women whose ancestors have lived in Germany for over a thousand years; who have made signal contributions to German economic, political, and cultural life; who have shed their blood in defense of their fatherland; and who have contributed their best talents to the peaceful development of the German state. This injustice was perpetrated under the cloak of a so-called link between Jews and communism, which has no existence in fact, but which is being used to confuse the minds not only of Germans, but of people all over the world.

"When the Jews of the United States first learned of these pretexts for persecution, they deemed it beneath their dignity to take notice of them. However, because of the censorship of free expression in Germany and the enormous propaganda carried on by Nazi Germany outside its borders, the time has come for us to make answer to the libels and unjust insinuations, and to make clear that these falsehoods have the same motive that has always inspired tyrants and despots—that of seeking a scapegoat for their own sins and, under cover of a false issue, of deceiving their people by fomenting suspicion, discord, and hatred.

"It is high time that these facts be known:

"While communism, having its roots in economic forces, no doubt influences some Jews as well as some non-Jews a study of German conditions indicates that the majority of the Jews who were permitted to vote in Germany during the Republic were affiliated with the liberal democratic parties,

In the presidential elections in which Hindenburg, Hitler, and Thaelmann were candidates Jewish leaders appealed to the German Jews to vote for Hindenburg and against the Communist and National Socialist candidates. German Jews were chiefly engaged in occupations and in callings from which Communists are not recruited; indeed, their own economic interests made them diametrically opposed to communism. The most influential German dailies in the pre-Hitler period, such as the Frankfurter Zeitung and the Berliner Tageblatt, which were owned by Jews, were bitterly opposed to communism. Not one prominent or even well-known German-Jewish leader was ever identified with the Communist Party in Germany. According to authentic figures given under the auspices of the present government, there was only 1 Jew among the 70 Communist deputies in the Reichstag of 1930, and not a single Jew among the 81 Communist deputies of the Reichstag of 1933. Finally, not even the most brazen official mendacity can obscure the fact that while there were less than 300,000 German Jews who were enabled to vote, there were fully 6,000,000 Communist votes cast during the republic.

"The facts about Soviet Russia and the Jews are equally illuminating. Among the 36 commissars who constitute the Soviet Government, only two are Jews. Neither the president of the Council of Commissars, Ryckoff; the president of the U. S. S. R., Kalinin; the general secretary of the Communist Party, Stalin; the president of the Third International, Dimitroff; nor the founder of the Communist Party, Lenin, are Jews. A large percentage of the millions of Jews in Russia before the Revolution were trades people, members of the class whom the Bolsheviks attacked most violently, and who had most to lose by the victory of communism. Indeed, after the Revolution the Soviet Government declared fully half of the total Jewish population in Russia as declassed, as hindrances to the development of the Revolution. Jewish workers in Russia were organized in an association called the Bund, which opposed the Bolsheviks until the very last. Orthodox Jews and Zionists, whose numbers were preponderant in Russia, are regarded as counterrevolutionaries by the Soviet Government.

"An examination of the lists deliberately circulated by anti-Semitic agents in attempts to establish their thesis that nearly all of the Bolshevik leaders are Jews reveals that a large number of those classified are not Jews at all, and that a number of others, far from being Bolsheviks, were leaders of the anti-Bolshevik movement. While Trotzky was a Jew, many of the leaders of the Mensheviki, the sworn foes of bolshevism, were Jews. The official statistics of the Petrograd Communist Party in 1918, shortly after the revolution, showed that there were 124,021 members of whom 74.3 percent were Russians, 10.5 percent Latvians, 6.3 percent Poles, 3.7 percent Esthonians, 2.6 percent Lithuanians, and 2.6 percent Jews.

"It is plain from the above how little evidence there is for the malicious charge of a so-called Jewish Communist link. If the Jews are to be condemned because there are some Communists amongs them—men who have never in the slightest degree concerned themselves with Judaism—then there is not a people on earth that might not with equal right be condemned.

"Those who have even an elementary acquaintance with the traditions cherished by our people during the 2,000 years since the destruction of the Jewish state know that complete and unequivocal loyalty to the country of one's citizenship is a basic principle of Jewish life. Ever since the Babylonian exile, spiritual leaders from Jeremiah down have adjured the Jewish people to seek the peace and prosperity of the land in which they live, to pray unto the Lord for it; for in the peace thereof they would enjoy peace.

"Students of the origin of the American form of government have pointed to the debt which the colonial fathers owed to the inspiration of the Hebrew Bible. Lecky, the distinguished historian, expressed this debt in the famous dictum: 'Hebraic mortar cemented the foundation of American democracy.' To millions of American Jews as well as to millions of Jews in other lands, therefore, the tenets of liberalism and democracy are the most dearly prized ideals: Jewish emancipation has always gone hand in hand with the progress of democracy. Any form of government or economic system which is based on, or maintains itself by, the suppression of the elemental bases of human liberty—freedom of speech, of the press, of association, of religious worship—is, therefore, abhorrent to them.

"The real reason for the propagation of this falsehood becomes apparent in Chancellor Hitler's words when he refers to 'Marxism and its related parliamentary democracy.' Under the pretext of an attack on bolshevism, many of whose tyrannical features have been adopted by the National Socialists, the Nazi Government has in practice robbed the German people of their civil rights, suppressed freedom of speech, of the press, and assembly, has destroyed the free labor unions and confiscated their funds; and it is now engaged in a pagan assault upon the religious conscience of the Protestant, Catholic, and Jew alike. Is it not plain that his thunderbolts against Marxism are only a smoke screen for his sinister designs upon the liberties of the German people and the peace of the world?

"Because we have an abiding faith in the spirit that animates the true American, we call upon him not to permit this campaign of slander and libel to go unreproved. We are confident that our fellow Americans of all faiths, familiar with the lesson of history that oppression sets no limit to its victims, will add their voices in protest against the destruction of the innocents in Germany.

"We are firm in our belief that the American sense of justice and fair play will influence our fellow citizens to express themselves unmistakably against the ruthless suppression of liberty of conscience, against the destruction of human lives and human ideals, and against the revival of pagan barbarism in the heart of the civilized world.

Taft-Hartley Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a friend and constituent who has been confined to a hospital for some time, devotes most of his waking hours to ventures in writing both prose and poetry. This man, a veteran, has forwarded to me his views on the Taft-Hartley Law. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including it at this point:

TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

Our Government is a government of law as contradistinguished from a government of functionaries. Our Government is devided into three coordinate branches. The legislative branch or Congress which makes the laws, the executive branch or the President who enforces the laws, and the judicial branch or the courts that interpret the laws.

The Taft-Hartley Act was passed over President Truman's veto and became a law on the 23d day of June 1947. Since then the leaders of the various labor unions have entered the field of political action and stormed the halls of Congress shouting for its repeal on the grounds that it is a "slave labor law."

Section 1 of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdicition."

The Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect for 3 years and 2 months, during which time the representatives of labor have had ample opportunity to submit their cause to the Federal courts, and secure a judicial interpretation of the so-called slave-labor provisions of the act. It would not be a novel question for the courts, for as late as January 12, 1942, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that the Georgia contract labor law violated the antislavery amendment and an act of Congress forbidding peonage.

In submitting their case to the courts the labor leaders would not be in danger of falling into a capitalistic "booby trap," because all of the United States Supreme Court judges and practically all of the appellate and district court judges were appointed by either President Roosevelt or President Truman. And they should not be solicitous about the costs of legal proceeding, when every labor union worthy of the name has a stable of "striped pants" gentlemen called labor relation counselors, commonly known as lawyers, retained on an annual fee basis, who are ever ready, able and willing to enter legal combat on a moment's notice.

The slogan "Slave Labor Act" sounds like a product of the late Charles Michelson school of political philosophy. Well, regardless of who coined the slogan it is rapidly losing its vote-drawing potential, for time seems to have a way of its own to deflate canards, half-truths, slogans, and diatribes coined to appeal to hate, prejudice, and our other base emotions. The persistent repetition of the "slave labor" slogan is more insulting to the intelligence of union members than to the authors of the Taft-Hartley Act. The act has enslaved no one. During the time it has been in effect, union membership has grown, many factories and places of business not heretofore unionized have been brought within the orbit of organized labor, and innumerable new contracts have been negotiated with the management of union shops providing for an increase in pay and welfare benefits.

VETERAN.

Senator Tobey's Reply to the Chicago Tribune

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], who is absent on official business, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief statement prepared by the Senator from New Hampshire referring to an editorial in the Chicago Tribune of September 21, together with a copy of a letter written by Joseph Medill, founder of the Chicago Tribune, in 1863. The Senator from New Hampshire wishes to raise the question: If the advice set forth in this letter from the founder of the Chicago Tribune in 1863 had been followed, what would have been the effect upon this country?

There being no objection, the statement and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CHARLES W. TOBEY

Col. Robert R. McCormick, of the Chicago Tribune, has seen fit to attack me and other members of the Republican Party in strange terms. In an editorial appearing in the Chicago Tribune of September 21, he has pontificated as follows:

"The Tobey - Morse - Dewey - Vandenberg crowd are the Tories and the doughfaces of the Republican Party. * * *

"The name 'doughface' was generally used up to the Civil War to designate a politician who betrayed the policies of his own party. It was the doughfaces of the Whig Party who prevented it taking a stand on the slavery question and so destroyed it, making the formation of the Republican Party a national necessity."

Now I had not been aware that I, as the colonel implies, have been "proslavery."

Perhaps most Americans also have not been aware of the type of republicanism from which this colonel and this editorial springs. I have here a letter which may throw some light on this question and give pause to consider what might have been the fate of our Federal Union had the advice of the Chicago Tribune been heeded in the past.

This letter was written by Mr. Joseph Medill, the founder of the Chicago Tribune and grandfather of this colonel. The letter speaks for itself, having been written in the darkest days of the Civil War and representing an effort by Medill, who called himself a Republican, to force the Union into an abject truce with the Confederate States.

Here is the letter which, I believe, never before has been published in entirety. It was addressed to Congressman E. B. Washburn, then chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee:

OFFICE OF THE DAILY TRIBUNE,
Chicago, January 14, 1863.

E. B. WASHBURN.

SIR: Prepare to hear some painfully plain talk. In the first place we may as well admit to each other that the rebs can't be conquered by the present machinery. Second, the Treasury is about on its last legs, the currency of the country is deteriorating fearfully fast and if the coin of W. & M. issue hits a three hundred million more the bottom will tumble out. Third, this Republican Congress will terminate in a few weeks and the next Congress will be hostile to the administration. Fourth, the people are growing exceedingly tired of the war and are becoming very much discouraged. Fifth. The opposition of the Democrats is taking a bolder shape daily. The cry for an armistice is increasing every day. When that is granted there will be no more fighting by this administration. The war for a time will be over. An armistice is bound to come during the year '63. Next April and May the period of enlistment of all the 9-months men expire, also the this-year men. No more volunteers can be obtained to fill up the ranks nor can men be had by drafting.

I believe all these premises must be admitted by you and every other cool reflecting man.

Well, what then? Why, we have to fight for a boundary, that is all now left to us. The first and most important thing to be done is to take Vicksburg and Port Hudson and clear the river. Far better to let Washington and Maryland go than the control of the Mississippi. If peace be made leaving the Southern Confederacy in possession of the lower Mississippi there is no certainty that Southwest will stay in the Union. The democratic demagogues will have in their hands a lever by which they can split off the West from the East. The rebels would hold a prize which would enable them to bring the West to its knees and make it coincide with the most exhorbitant demands and do the most degrading things. I shudder at the bare contemplation of an armistic leaving Vicksburg in the rebel's possession when it is made. They will have a ring in our nose and the string in their hands. The first thing then is to take Vicksburg. To this end the Government ought to bend its whole power. The Potomac Army is idle, inert, and useless, making war only on the resources of the country through the Treasury.

I would dispatch 60,000 men from it to New Orleans as fast ships could be chartered to convey them to help Banks take Port Hudson. I would send Grant to Vicksburg with every man that can be raked up—withdraw the garrisons from all the little places. Sherman has proven himself wholly unfit to command. Steele is a proslavery hound, less than half loyal, whom it is unsafe to entrust with a large command. Ask your brother what he is. As to McClernand—he is truly too small caliber to entrust. You knew that, willing but not weighty. Grant is the ablest, though I do not estimate him as high as you do by any means. But he can plan and fight—the others can't.

Vicksburg taken and the river open from Cairo to the Gulf, we have the rebel confederation cut in two. The army can quickly conquer Arkansas and Texas as they would be unsupported. All of Louisiana would fall into our hands like a ripe pear. Reduce the Potomac army to just sufficient strength to hold the Potomac line—say 80,000 or 100,000 men. Send the balance, say 40,000 to 50,000 forthwith to help Rosecrans clean the rebs out of east Tennessee. He must get help or the fruits of his vast victory will be utterly lost as the Richmond army is reinforced. Bragg, while Burnside sleeps at Talmouth.

Well, what next? You ask. I answer, an armistice. We will then be in a respectable attitude for a truce. Look at the map. All the territory west of the Mississippi will be in our possession. We shall have control of the navigation of the river and an outlet to the Gulf. The short-cut canal at Vicksburg will forever prevent the bluffs at that place annoying us again. We shall have Delaware, Maryland, western Virginia, Virginia, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, and all the territories and all the Northern States—population 25,000,000 to start with. The rebel confederation will be reduced to the coast slave States, seven in number. We shall have as much slave territory on our hands as we can digest for a few years. Emigration from Europe and the North would in 3 or 4 years settle forever the status of those acquired slave States. We, Republicans could be able to retain the Government in our hands. The national strength would not be seriously impaired by the loss of the seven seceded States. We should soon outgrow it. After a truce of 60 to 90 or 160 days while the rebs might fiercely object to our proposed boundary line, they would be obliged to succumb. They would be in no condition to recommence the war. (Like a man after stopping a few hours from a terrible fisticuff, he is not likely to begin the fight again until his cuts and bruises heal up.) European powers would insist on preserving peace and on the boundary I have named. In a few years the seven slave States or some of them would grow tired of their confederacy and ask for readmission. At all events 10 years hence we would be able to pitch into them some fine morning and lick them out of their boots in one round; and swallow them, if we wanted to. Meanwhile we might grab Canada to indemnify us for loss of territory. England deserves this punishment and some day must catch it.

I can understand the awful reluctance with which you can be brought to contemplate a divided union. But there is no help for it. The war has assumed such proportions—the resistance is desperate and stubborn. Our finances are so destroyed and exhausted. The Democratic Party is so hostile and threatening that complete success has been a moral impossibility. The war has been conducted so long by "central imbecility," Seward critique, and McClelland, Buell, Porter, Halleck, Steele, Franklin, Nelson, McCook, and other proslavery half secesh generals, that the day of grace is past. It is now "save what we can." If there is to be reform it comes too late. But I see no prospect of reform with anything. Halleck and his gang are still being retained. Lincoln is only half awake, and never will do much better than he has done. He will do the right thing always too late and just when it does no good.

You may combat the views here put forth, but each day will verify their correctness. I write what I have after a full and careful survey of the situation. Some weeks ago I threw out a hint or two to Colfax, but he said "he could not bear to think of it." But we must think of it. It is that or far worse. It is the boundary I mention with abandonment of the Government to the Democrats absolutely who will surrender to the rebels if the latter will accept them on any terms; if not, then separation on the line of Mason and Dixon. I think the rebel leaders are intent on separation absolutely and unqualifiedly but they might be coaxed to claim some of the Western States, with New England and the New England parts of the other States "left out in the cold." None of these things can we consent to. We must then make the most of the situation. Seize Vicksburg, cut off and conquer the territory west of Mississippi and make peace.

Yours truly,

J. MEDILL.

The Farmer Must Prosper if the Nation Is To Prosper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN H. GUILL
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GUILL. Mr. Speaker, farm supports are going to be cut right out from under the farmer's feet unless the farmer makes himself heard both through the ballot box and the mail box. Farm supports have been under heavy fire here in Congress and they will be eliminated entirely unless the farmer presents a solid front against those who would destroy him.

As a member of the House Committee on Agriculture I want to raise my voice here in protest against any attempt to eliminate those supports. The farmer and the entire Nation need farm supports badly.

The propaganda machines of the left-wing elements in the big metropolitan centers of the North and the East have been trying to fool the public into believing that the farmers of this country have been gouging the consumer with high prices and unnatural profits. As one propagandist puts it, "we are keeping the city worker broke just to maintain the country cousin in clover." Many honorable people who are ignorant of the reasons for supports have also followed this line.

The argument against farm supports is wrong. It is also typical of the traditional attitude of people in the big cities. They consider the rural areas of America in much the same way that England used to consider her colonies—as sources of revenue and supply, with no obligation on England's part to assist the colonies in return. The big-city dwellers believe it is wicked for the farmer to make money.

The whole argument is based on false assumptions.

HOW MUCH DO OUR FARM SUBSIDIES COST US?

The Government has spent more than $8,000,000,000 on loans and purchasing of farm products during the last 17 years but figures up to April 30, 1950, show the total loss has been only $212,858,871.

Perhaps you will say: "That can't be right; we lost more than that on potatoes and eggs alone last year." That is true—and bad administration caused most of that loss—but the Government made a profit on purchases of wheat, tobacco, oats, corn, rice, flax, and cotton—items which account for more than 85 percent of the total loans made—and this profit brought our losses down to $212,000,000. The United States Government has spent five times that amount in aid to Greece alone during the last 5 years.

SUPPORTS HAVE BEEN GOOD INVESTMENT

Actually, the money spent on the farmer by the Commodity Credit Corporation has been the best investment the Government has made in the last 20 years. If prices had not been supported, farm income would have dropped, national income would have dropped, business would have dropped, millions of men would have been out of work, a depression would have resulted and the Government would have lost many, many billions of dollars in income.

It has been determined, after years of research and study, that every single dollar of farm income generates $6 additional of national income. In other words, a dollar's worth of wheat, for instance, is transported to processing plants, and by the time it has made the rounds and comes back to the consumer in the form of bread, or wheaties, or what have you, it has given birth to $6 more of income on its way through the cycle of distribution.

NATIONAL PROSPERITY IS TIED TO AGRICULTURAL PROSPERITY

The following figures should prove that if the Nation is to be prosperous the farmer must be prosperous. The national income over the years averages seven times the farm income. They rise and fall together in that ratio.

Year	Gross farm income	National income
1929	$13,000,000,000	$87,300,000,000
1930	10,500,000,000	75,000,000,000
1931	7,600,000,000	58,800,000,000
1932	5,700,000,000	41,700,000,000
1933	6,400,000,000	39,600,000,000
1934	7,800,000,000	48,600,000,000
1935	9,000,000,000	56,800,000,000
1936	10,000,000,000	66,900,000,000
1937	10,600,000,000	73,600,000,000
1938	9,400,000,000	67,200,000,000
1939	9,900,000,000	72,500,000,000
1940	10,300,000,000	81,300,000,000
1941	13,100,000,000	103,800,000,000
1942	17,700,000,000	134,400,000,000
1943	23,000,000,000	168,200,000,000
1944	23,600,000,000	182,200,000,000
1945	24,000,000,000	182,800,000,000
1946	27,100,000,000	178,300,000,000
1947	33,000,000,000	202,500,000,000
1948	32,500,000,000	226,500,000,000
1949	30,500,000,000	221,000,000,000

The discrepancies in the 7-to-1 ratio in individual years can be explained by the lag as farm crops go to the market but the 7-to-1 average maintains over the years. During the years of the depression we lost an average of $27,000,000,000 in national income each year for 10 years. That amounts to $270,000,000,000, or a total $10,000,000,000 higher than our national debt. If farm prices had been supported in those years as they are now—instead of trying to prime the pump, as we did, through artificial means such as WPA—we would not have had 12,000,000 citizens out of work and the depression, if it came at all, would not have been nearly as serious as it was.

The farmer today is a $30,000,000,000 customer of American business. He uses an estimated twice as many industrial products per capita as does the city dweller. Today, for example, there are four times as many tractors on farms, 14 times as many combines, and 33 times as many mechanical corn pickers as there were in 1929.

A slump in farm income would strike at the manufacturer of every single item in the Sears, Roebuck catalog—and would therefore strike at the workers in those industries. If we were to remove farm-price supports altogether and drop back to, let us say, 1939-price levels—our national income would be one-third of what it is. Figure out for yourself what would happen to our bonds, employment, business. Where would we get the taxes to operate our enormously expensive Government?

COMPARE THE INCOMES

The antifarmer propagandists would have us believe the American farmer is rolling in wealth while the American laborer is having a hard time making ends meet. Let us examine that claim.

In the peak year of 1948, the average farmer's net income was $906. In that same year, the average city dweller's net income was $1,565. In his peak year the farmer received only 60 percent as much money as did the average city worker.

One-fifth of the Nation's population lives on farms. They receive only one-seventh of the national income.

It is true that a farmer can eat off his own land at a cost less than what the city dweller must pay. Still, that is counterbalanced by his poorer living conditions, poorer educational and health facilities. The farmer is also constantly at the mercy of the elements. Insects, floods, droughts, and storms can ruin in a short while the labor of a lifetime.

FARM SUPPORTS ARE FAIR

The big city consumer wants the farmer to compete in an open market without any supports whatsoever. He talks smugly about supply and demand.

What does this boil down to? It means that he expects the farmer to sell in an open, unprotected market and buy in a closed, protected and highly supported market. Every item he buys, whether it be the clothes he wears, or the tractor he uses or the car he drives, is protected directly or indirectly, and those who produce these goods or materials are subsidized directly or indirectly.

Perhaps the farmer could compete in an open, unprotected market if he could buy a New Zealand suit of clothes, a Swiss plow, a Swedish prefabricated barn and a Japanese set of dishes, tariff-free, at the low prices which cheap labor and cheap production costs in foreign countries would permit him to purchase them for. I do not think his city cousins in industry would be very happy about that state of affairs, however.

Here are some figures on how the Government is subsidizing private enterprise. These figures are from the 1951 budget:

Federal aid to housing	$1,700,000,000
Federal aid to roads	500,000,000
Federal aid to aviation	250,000,000
Federal aid to ocean shipping	250,000,000
RFC aid to commerce and finance	200,000,000
Federal aid to hospital construction	150,000,000
Federal aid to education	140,000,000

This does not include such indirect subsidies as the annual postal deficit—which in the last fiscal year totaled $555,000,000. This money was lost in second-, third-, and fourth-class mails—categories used almost exclusively by business houses and publications. This money is an indirect subsidy to business. Why should the farmer be the only nonsubsidized citizen in the United States?

FARMERS CANNOT STRIKE

The farmer cannot fix the price of things he sells. He has no control over prices. No individual farmer can do a thing about what he gets for his product. All he can do is take it to market, ask what the price is, and if he does not like the price, haul it back home. Most farm produce is perishable or semiperishable. That means it has to be sold at a certain time, so the farmer is at the mercy of the consumer and the buyer. Unlike the city boys in labor and industry, the farmer cannot go on strikes or stop production in order to hike prices. Food consumption in this country has gone up 16 percent, but agricultural production has gone up 35 percent, as compared with prewar levels. This is true, despite the fact that there are fewer people on the farms today. The population trend is away from the farm and toward the city.

Suppose the farmers, instead of hiking their production 35 percent, had effected a general slowdown to keep production at the prewar levels. Where would farm prices be today? They would be astronomical.

But farmers do not strike. Farmers do not conspire to slow down. The farmers just plug along at being good citizens and supplying the Nation with food. They do want a fair return for their labor and risk, however, and they should have it.

FARM RECEIPTS AND WAGES

All this goes to show that the laws of supply and demand really are working insofar as the farmer is concerned. When the city boy talks about the law of supply and demand, he does not mean what he says. He has in mind a law which would put all the emphasis on supply and none on demand.

Since 1920 cash receipts from farm marketing and the wage earnings of factory workers have been almost identical each year, except during the war years when there was no effective ceiling on wages and a very effective ceiling on farm prices. For instance, in 1946 the cash receipts from farm marketings were $24,500,000,000 and wage earnings of factory workers were $24,200,000,000. In 1947 farm receipts were $30,000,000,000 and wage earnings of factory workers were $29,500,000,000.

Every time the industrial workers get a wage increase they force up the price of farm goods. That's the law of supply and demand in action, and the industrial workers have no cause for complaint. The folks in the eastern and northern metropolises would evidently like to see an OPA on farm prices and let wages and other prices go hog-wild.

CONCLUSIONS

The facts are these: The farmer must be adequately supported if he is to prosper and he must be adequately supported if the Nation is to prosper.

There are some inequities in the present farm program. That is why I introduced H. R. 514, my own farm bill, which will allow the farmers themselves to participate in the formation of a new farm program. It is my firm belief that the farmers have just as much ability to solve their own problems fairly as do the Washington bureaucrats, some of whom have never been on a farm except for a visit. I hope, as a member of the powerful House Agriculture Committee, to have my bill included in the farm program of the Eighty-second Congress in 1951.

But the most important thing to remember is this: if we have a reduction in farm income we shall have a reduction in national income seven times as great. Every depression is farm-led and farm-fed. Historically, farm prices go down before, faster, and further than other prices. Our economy is so integrated that we cannot reduce drastically the purchasing power of one-fifth of the Nation's population without seriously affecting the prosperity of the other four-fifths of the Nation.

This has always been true in the past. It is truer than ever today, because agriculture is a bigger customer of industry than ever before in history.

If we reduce farm incomes drastically by removing supports, we must look forward to soup lines, foreclosures, misery, poverty, and a depression which would make us pushovers for the world Communists.

I think our economy is too much subsidized, but I can never vote against supports for the farmer until every business is willing to forego Government support. This does not appear possible in the predictable future.

Where To—After Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN B. BENNETT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRLSENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how far can this country go in attempting, singlehandedly, to solve the social, economic, and military problems of other nations of the world and still be able to maintain its security and defend its freedom at home?

How many Koreas will there be, and how many of such expeditions can the American people swallow and digest?

These are reasonable questions, and the public is entitled to have them answered by those who are directing the war and our foreign policy today. This country stands united behind our efforts in Korea. Once our troops are sent to a foreign country to do battle, every loyal American is left with but one choice, and that is to give them unlimited and undivided support in order that their efforts will be successful. But we are entitled to ask the President some questions, and we are entitled to frank and honest answers. Have we embarked on a program of fighting Russian satellite countries no matter in what part of the globe such aggression breaks out? Are we committed to a program of exhausting our manpower and dissipating our resources in far-flung corners of the globe and, thus, weakening ourselves while our real enemy, the Soviet Union, sits on the sidelines reserving its military strength? These are questions that deserve forthright answers from the present administration, because our very survival depends upon it.

When we review our foreign policy since the end of World War II it is easier to understand the reason for the tragic mess we are in today. It was at Yalta in 1945 that our Government cut the heart out of China by giving Manchuria to the Soviet Union. The Russians had not lifted a hand in the Pacific war against Japan, and yet our Government rewarded them by handing over the richest industrial and agricultural part of China to Joe Stalin. This was bad enough, but to add insult to injury, we forced the Chinese Nationalist Government to collaborate with the Chinese Communists; and paved the way for complete communistic control of China. Thus, by two diplomatic strokes we turned over 500,000,000 Chinese to the Kremlin. But we did not stop there. We permitted the Communists to take over Korea north of the thirty-eighth parallel, which was bound to result in a political and economic upheaval in that country.

We spent millions of dollars in economic aid for the rehabilitation of South Korea, and maintained a large army to defend it. In June of 1949 Secretary of Defense Johnson ordered our troops out of South Korea, and Secretary of State Acheson announced that both South Korea and Formosa were outside of our defense perimeter. Then, after putting the world on notice that we did not consider South Korea worth defending, the North Koreans commenced their invasion. Overnight the President reversed the policy previously established, and decided to send our troops to South Korea. How ill-prepared we were for this expedition has been well demonstrated by subsequent events, particularly in the blood of American soldiers.

During the 4 years prior to Korea we spent more than $50,000,000,000 in national defense. Where has the money gone? In that 4-year period only $1 out of every seven defense dollars has been spent on actual war equipment—on tanks, planes, guns, and so forth. The rest of the money went for so-called administrative costs, out of which we got nothing in the way of military equipment. The armed might which we had at the end of World War II—the finest and the best in history—was steadily reduced to a mere shell. This, in spite of the fact that Congress has consistently appropriated every defense dollar asked for by the President. On at least two occasions Congress has voted funds for a 70-group Air Force, but each time the President limited the Air Force to 48 groups. In 1949 Congress appropriated $189,000,000 for a superaircraft carrier. The President scrapped the plan to build this carrier after nearly $5,000,000 had been spent in laying its keel.

Between 1945 and 1950 there were no new modern tanks, no big artillery guns, no rifles, no machine guns, and no naval guns built, and not a single new Navy ship put on the ways. All of these things seem unbelievable in view of the billions that were appropriated for our defense, and the fact that we were supposedly getting ready to defend ourselves against Communist aggression.

We talk about defending the freedoms of the rest of the world at a time when we are ill-prepared to defend our own borders. The time has come when we must look to the future on a realistic basis. We must gear our efforts to save the world's freedoms on our actual ability and capacity to carry such a burden, rather than upon the false premise that our manpower and resources are without limit.

Even the richest nation in the world can go bankrupt if its economy is stretched beyond the breaking point. Let us see how near to reality such a situation may be approaching. Since the end of World War II it has cost us approximately fifteen billions per year to maintain a manpower potential in the Armed Forces of about a million men. If we raise this level to 5,000,000 men, our cost will immediately skyrocket to seventy-five billions per year, to say nothing of the cost of additional armaments which may easily add another fifteen billion per annum. Add to this our nonmilitary expenditures and you would have an annual budget of about $150,000,000,000, which would be nearly 60 percent of our total national income. When you take 60 cents out of every dollar earned by every American citizen you are nearing the breaking point. Moreover, this does not encompass the cost of fighting on foreign battlefields. If we are to send our Armed Forces to all parts of Europe and Asia, the cost will run into hundreds of billions of dollars more, and can only be financed by further additions to our already towering national debt.

It must be plain to everyone by now that settling the world's problems is pretty much of a singlehanded job so far as we are concerned. We have allies at the council table. We have allies who gladly accept our money and resources, and we have allies who are with us in spirit if not in action. But the war in Korea has proven that when it comes to fighting, the United Nations means the United States. Outside of small token contributions it is our boys who are doing the fighting and dying in Korea.

This same noncooperative spirit obtains in Europe, where demands have been made that American troops be sent to defend European soil before they recruit armies to defend their own countries. As a matter of fact, it is common knowledge that western Europe regards Russian aggression as an American problem. They regard it as a fight between the United States and Russia in which they have no primary concern. Actually, Mr. Speaker, they have so little concern over Russian aggression that during the past 2 years western European countries have shipped to Russia and her satellite nations hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of iron, steel, copper, rubber, machine tools, petroleum, trucks, and other manufactured articles, all of strategic importance and usable by Russia in her preparation for war. These are facts, Mr. Speaker, and only stupid men will avoid facing them.

We have had no foreign policy or program. Our plans have been made hour by hour, day by day, and subject to change without notice. We talk in one manner, and act in another. We have vacillated, stumbled, and fumbled our way along from one problem to another until we have become embroiled in what appears to be world war III, and one of the most tragic entanglements in our entire history.

We must finish our job in Korea. But when that has been concluded we must pause to get our bearings and determine our future course. It is time that we did some straight thinking with respect to foreign policy. It is time that the President took the American people into his confidence on these matters. Where is he taking us, and why?

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we can contribute our share toward the settlement of world problems, but we cannot assume the whole burden. We must base that contribution on our own ability and capacity. We must put first things first. Our own defenses are in a woeful state of disrepair. Our first duty is to provide an adequate defense for this Hemisphere. Only after that job is completed will we be able to assess our ability, in terms of manpower and resources, to help solve the problems of Europe and Asia.

We must keep America strong and free. We will profit little by protecting the liberty and freedoms of people in other countries if we lose our own in the process.

H. R. 4800

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. WILSON

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on September 6, 1950, the President signed into law H. R. 4800. I wish to take this opportunity to express my own gratitude for his action. I originally introduced H. R. 2500 in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress to give relief to farmers in my district and elsewhere who had purchased resettlement homes under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act. Those farmers who purchased such land between 1936, the date of passage of this law, and 1946, when it was amended, received but a portion of the mineral interest in their lands. The remaining portion was retained by the Government.

These farmers have since that time encountered difficulties of serious consequence. Where they have desired to sell their land they have been unable to do so advantageously because of the outstanding mineral rights. A prospective purchaser of their land in many cases could not secure a loan because of the outstanding mineral rights. Further it has been next to impossible for the owner of such land to lease his land for oil and gas development. The slowness in obtaining a lease from the Government for its fractional interest is a major factor in deterring the leasing of the farmers' interest. As a consequence neither the owner of the land nor the Government has been able to benefit from the high prices of mineral rights and leases that prevail when a well goes down near such land. Further than this there are instances in my district where wells producing oil and gas have been completed on land adjoining such resettlement farms. Those wells are draining the oil from under such farms but because of the leasing difficulties the farmer cannot lease his own interest and secure an offset well to protect himself from drainage. Thus both the Government and the farmers lose.

Mind you, this situation did not prevail as to those farmers who purchased such lands after the 1946 amendment. The changed policy provided in those amendments was just and proper, but of course it was not retroactive to assist those who had purchased resettlement homes between 1936 and 1946.

Despite the changed policy in this respect in 1946, the Government has continued to hold those scattered fractional mineral interests for speculative purposes. The truth of the matter is that these retained mineral rights have been a windfall to the Government. For example, the Government purchased one farm in my district for $12,000 with minerals intact and then sold the same land for the same price but retained three-fourths of the minerals. This has been repeated over and over in other instances.

Because other Congressmen had similar problems in their districts, several related bills were considered by the House Agriculture Committee at the same time. The result was H. R. 4800, reported on June 14, 1949. As passed by the House of Representatives on June 20, 1949, this legislation provided for the disposition of retained mineral rights reserved or acquired by our Government under any program heretofore administered by the Resettlement Administration or the Farm Security Administration, or now administered by the Farmers Home Administration with certain minor exceptions. This bill provided for the sale of these retained mineral rights to the present individual owners of the surface rights where there was some value. An appraisal would fix that value, thus being both fair to the farmers, who could clear up his title and lease his land for the first time, and fair to the Government. Where the mineral rights have no value, applications accompanied by a fee of $1 would result in the simple quitclaim of the outstanding mineral rights to the individual owner of the surface.

This bill as passed by the House was considered in the Senate Agriculture Committee in the present session of Congress and reported with amendments on March 8, 1950. It passed the Senate on August 23, 1950, and the House agreed to the Senate amendments the next day. As signed by the President, this measure allows the Department of Agriculture 90 days in which to prepare to receive applications for the outstanding mineral rights administered by it. Application must be made in 7 years of the date of the act, September 6, 1950, or within 7 years of the acquisition of the mineral interests, whichever is later.

I am proud of the part that I have been able to play in securing fair treatment to those farmers affected by this legislation. These farmers are grateful for the opportunities brought by the programs under which they purchased their land. They have not been demanding in any respect despite the inequity worked on them as distinguished from later purchasers who acquired the entire mineral rights with their lands. Ours has always been a land of equality of opportunity and fairness of treatment where we could make it so. This legislation is another milestone in making and keeping America the land of opportunity and fair treatment.

Red Threat to the Philippines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL T. WAGNER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Speaker, the free world is united against the Reds. The people of this country are aroused to the pitch of military action against the Communist plot to enslave the world.

In the light of open warfare now in Korea and in the shadow of the looming cloud of Red invasion of Formosa, shall we forget the friendship of the peoples of the Philippines?

In this crisis can we afford to forget that for us the Republic of the Philippines is the outermost bastion of the free world in the East?

Can we afford to neglect the most valid reports that come to our desks telling us that while all the democratic world is roused to the pitch of arms against Red aggression, the Reds are even now, because of our folly, growing to formidable strength right behind our lines in the mountains of the Philippines?

It is late in the day for us to awaken, but not too late for us to take note with alarm that the strength of communism in the Philippines, growing on the destruction of free trades-unions and the smashing of legitimate strikes under the eyes of American businessmen and American Government official observers, is now at such a peak that Red Hukbalahaps joined by discontented and impoverished workers could probably today take the capital city of Manila.

The United States is a democracy. The American flag stands for free labor. It is time that the influence of the American flag should be recognized as an influence of friendship for free-trades unionism.

The strength of the free countries, their backbone, is in free labor, free unions, and in living wages for the families of their workingmen. The poison of communism feeds on poverty and on the oppression and destruction of free unions.

If ever a worker of any land was in need of free and bona fide trades-unionism, it is the worker of the Philippines today who is receiving less than a hundred dollars a month to feed himself and his family.

The right to strike has been practically abrogated by the courts. About 2 years ago, the then secretary of justice declared that picketing on the part of striking employees and laborers was illegal. The workers of the country are herded between a phony labor movement of racketeers countenanced and in league with some Government officials, company unions, and factions of Communist-dominated organizations.

Those workers who want no part of Government or racketeer bondage or communism, and who seek the same ideals in free unionism as the American worker, are squeezed between the police, the courts, and short-sighted big business.

Those workers who still hold high the standards that we Americans believe in, in their efforts against overwhelming odds to preserve the spirit of democracy in the Philippines, look to us for support.

If we are to keep democracy alive in the Orient, we must keep it alive in the Philippines.

And if we are to keep it alive in the Philippines, the Philippine worker must have whatever support we can give him toward achieving free trades-unionism.

The families of the Philippine workers gave aid to our allied soldiers before. Can we justly look for their help again if we stand idly by now and see him ground to desperation between the two millstones of communism and economic need?

A History of Communism in New Deal Washington Down to Truman's Veto of the Communist Control Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, before the New Deal, communism was an underground, outlaw movement in the United States. Barred from the ballot by 18 State legislatures, the Stalinites were without legal standing. Their party was treated as the thing it was, a wrecking movement of Godless outlaws and violent revolutionaries. Four Presidents faithfully had preserved the United States policy of nonrecognition of the lawless Communist Russia.

All this was changed by the New Deal. Early in 1933, soon after President Roosevelt's inauguration on March 4, talk was heard of immediate recognition of the Moscow government. Before the year was out recognition had been accomplished.

Thenceforth, the outlaw breed of wreckers and despoilers of civilization were taken into the family of nations, offered a place at the council table of humanity and, in the United States, invited to become a part of government.

And precisely at this point began the most treacherous betrayal of America since the founding of the Republic.

Today, after 17 years of organized Communist penetration in America, we have the whole story in the public record, the story of Moscow's treacherous infiltration of every major department and agency of our own United States Government, both in Washington and throughout those States in which large Federal payrolls are controlled by the Washington bureaucrats.

On August 28, 1950, Lee Pressman, formerly an attorney in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, testified before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Under oath, he acknowledged that he had been a member of a Communist Party cell in Washington in 1934 and 1935. He named three coworkers in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the first of the New Deal recovery agencies, as collaborators in the Communist underground then operating within the Federal departments under the Roosevelt-Wallace-Tugwell program to reorganize the American economic and political system.

In the 12-year record of the House Committee on Un-American Activities there is no earlier date established for the launching of the Communist network within the structure of the American Government. The Communist cell in the State Department, which came to light in the Alger Hiss trial, began operations in 1938–39. The Marzani cell in the State Department did its work in 1940–43. The Judith Coplon ring in the Department of Justice was active in the years 1943–46. The Amerasia spy ring, which operated in both the State and Navy Departments as well as in the Office of Strategic Services, sent its secrets to Moscow in the years 1943–45. The atomic-energy spy ring did its work in 1942–46. Pressman's testimony was the first from a former Government employee who had been himself a member of the Moscow network in Washington during the first months of the New Deal, dating from March 4, 1933.

The three other Communist Party members who worked closely with him in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration's Kremlin cell were named by Pressman in his testimony as first, Nathan Witt, who later became secretary of the National Labor Relations Board, and shaped our Federal labor policy for years; second, John J. Abt, who was chief of the legal section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration in 1933, became assistant general counsel for Harry Hopkins' Works Progress Administration in 1935, and assistant to the Attorney General in 1937–38; and third, Charles Kramer, who left the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to become general counsel to the Senate Labor Committee, in which capacity he was, with Chairman Robert F. Wagner, of New York, one of the principal authors of the Wagner Act, which gave communism a free hand in the American labor movement.

In a very real sense, Pressman's testimony forms the vital missing link in the Communist trail in New Deal Washington. The many-sided Moscow network which came to light in later years in all the major departments of the Government, was seeded originally in 1933 in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, when Henry A. Wallace was Secretary of Agriculture, with Rexford Guy Tugwell as Under Secretary and top administrator of the first—unconstitutional—incarnation of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

Pressman was first named as an influential king-pin of the Washington Communists in the early New Deal era, in the testimony of Whittaker Chambers, in August 1948. When the House Committee called him on that occasion, Pressman dismissed Chambers' charges as "the stale and lurid mouthings of a Republican exhibitionist." In the same manner, Alger Hiss had denied Chambers' accusations with unrestrained vehemence. Two years—and one Presidential election—were to pass before the record would be completed by Pressman's frank admission—after the Communist aggression in Korea—that he had himself suggested Alger Hiss for appointment as general counsel for the Senate Munitions Investigating Committee in 1935, from which post Hiss had moved on to larger fields of public service in the State Department and the United Nations Preparatory Commission.

After leaving Federal service in 1936 Pressman became a national figure as general counsel for the CIO, at $19,000 a year. As legal guide and mentor to the late Sidney Hillman, Pressman was a moving force in the CIO Political Action Committee, which reelected Roosevelt for the third and fourth terms, put Henry Wallace in as Vice President and then Secretary of Commerce, and extended its stranglehold on Congress.

As long ago as December 1948, the House Committee on Un-American Activities reported:

> Communist espionage has broken through the security forces of the United States Government and made off with secret information of both military and diplomatic plans, policies, and actions. This espionage system has been carefully developed over a period of more than 15 years, and it has been successful to a degree critical to the welfare and safety of the people of this Republic.

It is significant that the development period of this Communist network in Washington—"more than 15 years," as of 1948—links perfectly with Pressman's testimony that his own Communist activity in AAA dated back to the very launching of AAA in 1933–34. Thus, there is now established in the printed public record an unbroken chain of organized Communist activity, at the direct expense of the United States taxpayers, within the very structure of our own Federal establishment, continuously since the first days of the New Deal.

In the light of this public record, the New Deal now stands exposed as the spawning ground of organized communism within the structure of American Government. Under the protective shelter of the New Deal's alphabetical wonderland, communism ceased to be an outlaw, underground movement, to become an active, directing force in government.

Following official acceptance at the White House, communism gradually penetrated every department and agency of the executive branch. When Congress, in 1948, began to expose this Communist infiltration with unanswerable evidence, President Truman ridiculed the work of the Un-American Activities Committee with the flippant rejoinder "Red herring"! But this complacent tolerance of Kremlin-directed communism in Washington had been foretold in an earlier campaign utterance of President Truman, who had said of Stalin, at Eugene, Oreg., on June 11, 1948:

> I like old Joe. He's a decent fellow, but he's a prisoner of the Politburo.

Now it appears our own Harry is a prisoner of a politburo, American variety.

As a fellow prisoner with "Old Joe," President Truman's acceptance of communism as a benign world power came more than 10 years after the House Committee on Un-American Activities had begun a systematic delineation of world Communist sabotage and espionage in the United States.

That committee was set up first by House Resolution No. 282 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, May 26, 1938, and on January 3, 1945, was made a permanent standing committee of the House.

During its first 10 years, under Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, the committee was the object of almost continuous bitter abuse and violent scorn from the White House. Congress was bombarded with petitions and requests to kill the Un-American Activities Committee. Since 1948, President Truman has sought to dismiss all charges of communism in Washington as only more "red herring." Many of his administration leaders in Congress have sought to whitewash it and ridicule the extent of its existence.

Yet this committee's files today hold more than 50,000 pages of testimony supported by literally tons of exhibits, tracing the growth of communism and its propaganda and political organization in the United States.

In 1939 the committee published the names of 10 international CIO unions then under complete domination and control of known Communists.

On October 30, 1939, the committee published the names, positions, and salaries of 563 Federal employees in Washington known to have been affiliated with an avowed Communist-front organization, the American League for Peace and Democracy.

Yet it was not until March 21, 1947—7 years later—that President Truman appointed the Loyalty Review Board, to check on Communists and fellow-travelers in the Federal departments and bureaus.

That Board examined the records of more than 9,200 suspected security risks in the Government service. Only 4,575 of these cases finally were cleared for future Federal employment. In 691 cases the FBI investigation was suspended when the suspected employee left the Government service voluntarily.

Renewing its inquiry into Communist penetration of the labor movement, the committee on March 29, 1944, named 21 CIO organizations as Communist-controlled. Later the committee published a list of 160 educational, political, and propaganda organizations known to be Communist fronts. During the war the committee investigated Communist propaganda broadcasts at Government expense by the Office of Price Administration. This inquiry was abandoned when two subofficials in charge of OPA radio resigned their Federal posts; Later the committee put a stop to pro-Soviet propaganda then being broadcast at Federal expense by the Department of Agriculture. In 1947, Gerhart Eisler was exposed as the No. 1 agent of the Communist International in the United States. Convicted and sentenced to prison for passport fraud, Eisler jumped bail, escaped from the United States aboard the Polish freighter Batory, and soon became Stalin's chief propaganda agent in Berlin.

On May 10, 1948, the House committee reported to Congress:

> The Communist Party of the United States of America advocates the overthrow of our Government by force and violence. * * * The American Communist Party is now, and always has been, under the direction of an international Communist organization dominated by the leaders of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union. * * * In other words, what the Chinese and Greek Communists are doing today is what the American Communists plan to do tomorrow under similar circumstances. * * * The harm that can be done by the international Communist movement in the event of a national emergency must not be minimized.

Evidence that American Communists are financed directly by Moscow is found in the report of the House Un-American Activities Committee for December 31, 1948. After a 5-hour cross-examination of Whittaker Chambers on December 28, the committee reported:

> Mr. Chambers said the espionage ring recruited its personnel primarily in the United States for operation in other countries, including Japan, Germany, France, Finland, and China. Mr. Chambers also disclosed to the committee that, in his position as courier for the party, he on one occasion took a money belt from New York to San Francisco containing approximately $10,000 for the purpose of financing west coast spy operations.

Such was the web and extent of Communist operations in the United States Government as disclosed up to May 1950, when the details of the celebrated Amerasia case was revealed to an unsuspecting American public, through a long-suppressed report of another committee of the House.

Shortly before midnight on Sunday, March 11, 1945, Federal agents entered the offices of the pro-Communist magazine Amerasia, 225 Fifth Avenue, New York. They seized some 1,700 secret documents stolen from the Department of State, War Department, Navy Department, Office of War Information, Federal Communications Commission, and the Office of Strategic Services. Security classifications on these documents ranged from "restricted" and "confidential" to "top secret."

The official report of the House Judiciary Committee on this raid, however, was not made public until May 22, 1950. In presenting the report on that date—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 22, 1950, page 7428—Chairman SAM HOBBS, of Alabama, explained that the original report had been filed with the Clerk of the House in a routine manner on October 23, 1946, during a recess of Congress. It had never been printed.

Over the period of 5 years and 2 months between the Amerasia raid in New York and publications of the Judiciary Committee's report, all the essential material in these 1,700 secret documents had been available to Moscow. During those 5 years the orbit of Stalin's overlordship had expanded from 170,000,000 population in Russia to more than 800,000,000 population in Europe and Asia, including Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, eastern Germany, Albania, the Baltic Provinces, China, Manchuria, and North Korea. But during those critical 5 years of the cold war the American people never were told by President Truman that the most vital military and diplomatic secrets of the United States Government had been stolen by the Kremlin's spy ring in Washington.

Informed observers have expressed the conviction that this case—one of the weirdest in American political history—is the key to America's postwar diplomatic debacle in Asia. The suppression of the Amerasia evidence for 5 years served one great purpose; it sheltered and protected the pro-Communist ring in the State Department until their treacherous work of national betrayal had been accomplished fully.

About 10 a. m. in the morning following the Amerasia raid in New York—March 12, 1945—some of the more important recovered documents were laid before Maj. Gen. William J. Donovan, head of the Office of Strategic Services, and Secretary of State Edward R. Stettinius, in Washington. General Donovan instantly demanded that the material be turned over to the district attorney for immediate grand-jury proceedings, to be started that day, so that the Government officers involved or suspected might be subpenaed en mass, without opportunity to compare notes on their testimony.

But this plan did not go through. President Roosevelt, then in the last month of his life, directed that the case be turned over to the FBI for full investigation. All public discussion of the Amerasia material was to be avoided during the FBI investigation.

Thirteen weeks later, on May 29, 1945, the FBI report to the Attorney General recommended six arrests in the Amerasia case. But on May 31 the Attorney General hastily informed the FBI the whole case must be held in abeyance until the conclusion of the San Francisco conference then organizing the United Nations. Publication of the recovered Amerasia documents, it was contended officially, might embarrass the San Francisco conference, of which Alger Hiss had been named Secretary General. Owen Lattimore, unofficial State Department adviser on Asiatic affairs, had been a member of the Amerasia editorial board from 1937 to 1941.

On June 6, 1945, six persons in the Amerasia case were arrested by FBI agents on charges alleging conspiracy to violate the espionage laws. A few days later these charges were reduced to conspiracy to violate title 18 of the United States Code, having to do with the embezzlement and mutilation of Government documents.

The grand jury failed to return true bills against three of those arrested. But on August 10, 1945, true bills were returned against Phillip Jaffe, the Russian-born editor of Amerasia; Emanuel Larsen, a State Department officer; and Lt. Andrew Roth, of the Office of Naval Intelligence.

On October 2, Jaffe entered a plea of guilty and was fined $2,500.

On Saturday afternoon, November 2, a curious hour when Washington courts are not normally in session, Larsen entered a plea of guilty and was fined $500. This session of court lasted less than 15 minutes.

On February 13, 1946, the last remaining Amerasia indictment, against Lieutenant Roth, was quashed on motion of the Department of Justice.

The net of the Amerasia disclosures, therefore, was six arrests, three releases without indictment, one fine of $2,500, another fine of $500, and one indictment quashed. Somewhere high in the Government powerful forces had succeeded in smothering from national view and public discussion the whole shocking story of 1,700 secret documents stolen from the sensitive departments in Washington for reproduction in a Communist magazine in New York.

To date only the high lights of these 17 years of treasonable betrayal in Washington have been sketched in the public record. Some day, when all the records may be examined, the whole frightful story of New Deal treachery, sabotage, and espionage will be unfolded for public appraisal.

That story will tell exactly how many Communists and fellow-travellers found employment in the Federal bureaus after 1933. It will tell who, in 1945, lifted the ban against enlisting avowed Communists in the United States military services, and why we have as alleged by Browder over 13,000 Communists in the armed services. It will explain why, during and after the war, known Communists and sympathizers so often found themselves in pivotal strategic posts in the State Department.

The broad outlines of the story already are at hand. Lee Pressman has filled in an important gap between 1933 and 1938. The Amerasia case supplies another vital link between 1945 and 1950.

It is now crystal clear that the infiltration is so great that every chance exposure of flagrant Communist intrigue and espionage in Washington since 1933 somehow has been shielded and smothered by determined White House intervention. On every hand, full and complete exposure of communism in the Federal establishment has been obstructed and frustrated from 1933 down to the present hour.

Mr. Speaker, the evidence outlines a picture with many a dark shadow still unexplored. But the evidence is now complete that the Communists have infiltrated one of the great political parties. This admission is reported in a recent review of the Un-American Activities Committee. The Honorable Martin Dies, former chairman of the Un-American Activities Committee, was threatened by Mr. Roosevelt himself. At a conference between the President and Mr. Dies in 1938 at the White House the President warned Mr. Dies that the Democratic Party could not win if the Un-American Activities Committee investigated the Communists in the CIO. Such an investigation, said the President, would cause the CIO to turn against the party and, said he:

> Without their support the Democratic Party would be defeated.

Then after ridiculing Dies for seeing things under the bed the President said:

> There is nothing wrong with Communists. Some of the best friends I have got are Communists.

Perhaps the reason is not far to seek. A President who found Joe Stalin "a decent fellow" in 1948 hardly could be expected to become really indignant and incensed that a foreign power with a propaganda machine "at least equal to that of the United States Marines," actually had penetrated every department of his own government.

Finally Norman Thomas and Earl Browder have announced that the Socialists and the Communists have secured most of their program through the Democratic Party. They have virtually dissolved the Socialist and Communist parties as separate units. They are now masters of the once-great Jeffersonian Democratic Party. Thomas and Browder write with satisfaction and say in effect that:

> Our work is done. We are satisfied. Our followers numbering about 900,000 are now in the New Deal Democratic Socialist-Communist Party—the party of the future.

But a surge of robust patriotism sweeps America today. Our people want a housecleaning in Washington. They demand vigorous congressional action to root out the Communist spies, traitors, and saboteurs. But the people themselves must crusade and make manifest their will.

About the Kerr Gas Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOSEPH P. O'HARA

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much of propaganda, misinformation, and misstatement of facts about the so-called Kerr amendment to H. R. 1758, to clarify the Natural Gas Act of 1938, that I feel a statement should be made in regard to that proposed legislation.

In time, and when the facts are completely brought to light, I am sure the consumers and the general public will understand and acknowledge the truth about this bill.

The consumers will ultimately find out that a vote for the Kerr amendment was in their best interest and an effort to give them cheaper fuel by bringing more and more natural gas to them, and competing in the American way with other fuels admittedly costing more.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Since the passage of the Natural Gas Act of 1938, the Federal Power Commission has had jurisdiction of sales of natural gas shipped in interstate commerce.

This 1938 act specifically exempted "production or gathering of natural gas" from the Federal Power Commission's jurisdiction.

In 1947, the United States Supreme Court decided the Interstate case, which aroused speculation as to whether the Court might not permit the Federal Power Commission to regulate "arm's length" sale of natural gas by independent producers and gatherers to interstate pipeline companies.

Arm's length sales are transactions between two parties which are unlinked by reasons of ownership or control, and which do not violate the Sherman Antitrust Act. Independent producers are those who do not own transmission facilities and have no connection with interstate pipeline firms.

KERR BILL

The so-called Kerr gas bill was to do one thing, and one thing only—it said in clear and unmistakable language that the provisions of the Natural Gas Act of 1938 which specifically exempt the independent producers and gatherers of gas from the control and regulation of the Federal Power Commission meant what it said.

The Kerr bill did not affect the legal authority of the Federal Power Commission as it has existed since 1938.

It did not exempt any company or individual that has been or presently is subject to regulation by the Federal Power Commission.

It did not affect the price of natural gas sold by independent producers.

It did not have as its purpose the increase of the cost of gas to the consumer.

DECREASE IN COST TO CONSUMER

Over the past 12 years, the cost of natural gas to the consumer has gone down 12 percent while the cost of practically every other heating fuel has increased.

FIELD GAS CHEAP

These housewives might be glad to know that 4 cents would be a generous estimate of the field price of the gas they use in a month's cooking. They might also be glad of the reassurance of Speaker RAYBURN, who is at least as well informed on the subject as Senator DOUGLAS, that the Kerr bill would not increase the price of gas by one red cent.

The Daily News is for low gas prices. We are convinced that the way to have them is to encourage producers to find more gas and to sell it to the pipelines. Transmission costs drop as volume increases, and the more high-priced manufactured gas that is displaced by natural gas, the greater the saving. (Chicago Daily News.)

PRESIDENT'S VETO

The President has vetoed the Kerr bill, and therefore the Natural Gas Act of 1938 was not amended as proposed by the Kerr bill.

It remains to be seen how far the Federal Power Commission will go in attempting to regulate the price of gas down at the source, and just what may result regarding the status of independent producers and gatherers and ultimately regarding the cost of natural gas to the consumer.

The following is editorial comment by the Boston Herald, one of the outstanding newspapers of New England, on the President's veto of the Kerr bill.

REGULATORY MADNESS

Here are a few facts that make Mr. Truman's position seem more glittering than sound.

The price of natural gas, like oil and coal, is now unregulated. The FPC regulates the pipelines that carry the gas and also the companies that both produce gas and operate the lines. But the 86 percent of the gas that is produced by the independent companies has been unregulated, and the Kerr bill would have insured that it remained so, against an evident intention of the FPC to take over control. So, if Congress sustains the veto, as seems likely, we shall have all gas going into interstate commerce regulated.

Mr. Truman fears a monopoly because once a pipeline company builds to a gas field it has to take the prices set by the owner of that field, since pipeline can't be shifted easily. Result, he implies, would be rocketing prices.

But someone didn't fully inform the President. No company spends millions building a pipeline to a gas field without making certain that the price of gas won't get out of hand. They aren't that simple in the industry. They make long-term-price contracts, and most gas today is already under 25-year agreements. The President is naive in thinking otherwise.

Competition is further limited, the President says, by the concentration of ownership of gas. It happens that 35 companies control 70 percent of the known reserves, and that among them are those horrible aggregations of capital—Standard Oil and Phillips Petroleum. (Horrible to the liberals.) But even if a single corporation held 70 percent of the reserves, it would still have to set a price that would lure consumers from the fuels they now use. It is like the monopoly of the railroads that no longer exists.

In fact, Mr. Truman's veto may have exactly the opposite effect he intends. It takes heavy capital to find productive gas fields, risk capital, for the danger of loss is great. Risk capital is scarce today, and the standard 6-percent return that regulatory agencies usually allow isn't enough to attract very much.

We now have known gas reserves for 30 years at the present rate of consumption. In 1955 the increased consumption will reduce those reserves to 9 years' supply—unless a sufficient incentive exists to expand exploration and production programs. The oil industry, without price control, has kept about 13 years' supplies in sight for the last 20 years, due to the operation of economic laws Mr. Truman would repeal. Control in gas is likely to mean less gas and higher prices. Less gas, incidentally, for national defense.

But whatever will happen by the President's veto, this passion for regulation is driving us into a kind of economic madness. If we keep coal prices up and gas prices down, what shall we do with oil? Already some of the oil companies with byproduct gas to sell scent a move in their direction, and they may deem it cheaper to burn their gas off than sell into regulation. If the gas price is kept down, the sick coal industry will have to turn up its toes, for price minimums won't save it.

We may as well make our choice now, either we stop our drift into regulation or we must just give up and regulate everything there is.

Representative PAUL SHAFER, of Michigan, said:

VETO IN ERROR

Because many consumers of natural gas are of the opinion that the President's veto has warded off the threat of higher rates for this popular fuel, I believe that it is well that you should know that there is far more danger of higher gas rates now than there would have been had the President signed the gas bill. In spite of all the fog that was thrown up during consideration of the Kerr bill, it was purely a measure simply to retain to the various States the control over their natural gas resources they hitherto have enjoyed; also control of distribution of gas within their borders.

So, I submit to you, that a vote for the Kerr bill was a vote for lowering gas prices to the consumer, and for ever-growing supplies of gas. The Kerr bill was well designed to prevent further socialization of the natural gas industry and to maintain States' rights. It was a bill to protect gas consumers and not to exploit them.

AFTER VETO—APPLICATIONS RECENTLY FOR INCREASE OF RATES

Charges are made that the Kerr bill would have raised the price of gas. What has happened since the veto of the Kerr bill?

On September 2, 1950, I released the following statement to some of the newspapers in Minnesota:

I note in the Twin-City newspapers of August 29, 1950, that the company which supplies Minnesota with natural gas has applied to the Federal Power Commission for an increase of rates. Many other gas companies throughout the country also have applied for increases since the President's veto of this bill.

My political opponents must be for this increase of price which I was against.

If my political opponents' view is to prevail, the prices of natural gas will go higher and higher. There will be a shortage of production of gas, and that shortage, with the increase in demand because of the present large and ever-increasing number of users, will result in higher prices as well as an insufficient quantity of gas for the users.

You will remember what happened during the last days of the OPA, when regulation and control made it impossible for you to obtain meat to feed your families. At that time because of the prospect of continued regulation and price controls on meat the producers just simply did not produce and sell beef, and the consumers could not obtain meat in the stores.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION STATEMENT

In 1947, Congressman PRIEST, of Tennessee, introduced a bill which was in effect much the same as the Kerr bill. Here's what the Federal Power Commission said in a letter dated July 10, 1947, to the Honorable CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, at that time the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to your request of July 9 for an early comment by the Commission regarding H. R. 4099, a bill introduced by Congressman PRIEST, of Tennessee.

The Federal Power Commission urges the enactment of this bill at this time to make it perfectly clear that independent producers and gatherers of natural gas are exempt from the provisions of the Natural Gas Act and the jurisdiction of this Commission.

The enactment of this bill would dispel the uncertainty regarding the status of such independent producers and gatherers which has been created following the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Interstate case. Such action by the Congress now should dispose of this important and noncontroversial matter.

This procedure would enable the Congress to defer action on the many other aspects of natural gas regulation involved in the complexities, uncertainties, and ambiguities of H. R. 4051 (the Rizley bill), to which we referred in detail in our statement of July 1 to you and the members of your committee. As you know, all these problems are being carefully analyzed by the Commission, in cooperation with all interested parties, in the natural gas investigation (docket No. G–580). A full report on this investigation will be submitted to the Congress for its consideration within the next few months.

I am authorized to state that the position of the Commission in this matter is fully in accord with the legislative program of the President.

Respectfully yours,
FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
By NELSON LEE SMITH, Chairman.

CONGRESSIONAL COMMENT

Here's what the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, who was majority leader of the House in the Eightieth Congress, said:

MR. HALLECK URGES ITS ADOPTION

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I trust that we can have a little light on this measure as well as heat.

First, may I say that a bill similar to this, except the opponents of this bill say it went much further, was passed in the Eightieth Congress. It did not come to passage in the other body.

This bill is almost identical with a bill introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PRIEST] in 1947 which was approved by the unanimous vote of the Federal Power Commission. It was approved by the Department of Defense. It was said by the Commission to be in line with the President's program.

In this Congress, the Eighty-first Congress, that bill was introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS]. It was reported by the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on which it was my privilege to serve some years ago. The bill was passed by the House of Representatives and went to the other body where an amendment has been put on, that again may I say quite respectfully from the standpoint of the opponents of the measure should make the bill better rather than worse.

What is the situation that is now before us? Simply this: Shall we adopt the amendment that was agreed to in the other body and be done with this matter, or shall it go on to conference? I say that under the circumstances certainly there is no reason that I can see why anyone who supported the bill before should not support it now.

Now, what are the circumstances back of this legislation? In 1938 legislation for the regulation of the transportation of gas in interstate pipelines was introduced and brought to passage. I was on the committee at the time. I am making these brief remarks here because of the participation I had in that debate at that time. Here is what I said in connection with that legislation:

"In the past few years the interstate transportation of gas in large pipelines at high pressure had been growing by leaps and bounds. Gas is brought from the producing areas in these pipelines and sold at the city gates to the public utilities which distribute the gas to the consumers. It is obvious the distribution of the gas by the local distributing company is subject to State regulation and the interests of the consumers are protected by State regulation. However, the transportation of gas in interstate commerce in the pipelines and its sale to the distributing companies for resale is not subject to State regulation, and as a result we have had a situation under which the price charged the distributing company at the city gate has been fixed wholly by the judgment, discretion, or action of the interstate company. It is charged that in many cases that price is excessive. This bill seeks to regulate those prices."

That is the reason I supported the legislation. Now, then, specifically the question is, Shall the Federal Power Commission extend its control to the production and gathering of gas? May I say at that point that if such control could be so extended, might it not as logically be said that the production and gathering of oil shall be controlled by the Commission as a public utility? Might it as well not be said that the production of coal in the mines shall be controlled by the Federal Power Commission as a matter of controlling a public utility?

The bill that we passed in 1938 specifically exempted by its terms the production and gathering of gas, written in after careful consideration.

A specific question was put to the great chairman of our committee, Mr. Lea, of California, who voluntarily retired from this body a year or so ago. He was asked specifically if it was designed to apply to the production and gathering of gas, and he said this: "The bill does not apply to the production and gathering of gas."

The Commission, may it be understood, has in the 12 years that this law has been on the books never asserted the right to control the production and the distribution of gas. No one ever thought they had any such power under the legislation. I do not think they have now, but as sometimes happens, there was a case in the Supreme Court a few years back, and there were certain words used in the opinion that were outside of the necessities of the decision that seemed to indicate the possibility that the Commission might have the power to invade this entirely local field or such field as has heretofore been said by the Congress to be local, and assert the right to control the production and gathering of the gas. That is the situation that gave rise to the introduction of legislation similar to this in the Eightieth Congress. It is the situation that has given rise to the introduction of this legislation in this Congress, yes, to the adoption of the legislation by the House and the adoption of the legislation with one amendment that I have already referred to by the Members of the other body.

Now, then, I have beyond all of that, may I say, Mr. Speaker, a deep conviction, as I am sure all of you who have served with me know, that if, for instance, the right to regulate the production and gathering of gas at the source is to be invested in the Federal Power Commission, the Congress of the United States ought to make that decision. That power should be granted by the Congress of the United States. It is quite obvious it could not be obtained from any other source rightfully, and to attempt to apply the statute in a way that I say strains the statute is, in my opinion, not the way that the affairs of Government should be administered.

The gas is produced and gathered at the source, even as oil is produced or coal is produced. Then a pipeline company buys it at arm's length from competing producers and puts it into the pipelines. If it goes across State lines it is then in interstate commerce.

Until we passed the act of 1938 there was no power anywhere to regulate the price to be charged for that gas moving in interstate commerce, so to fill that gap, and that gap only, the Congress enacted this legislation.

Carried with that is the right in the Federal Power Commission to control the price of gas at the city gate, to see to it that the city is not charged too much for the gas. Then the matter of fixing the rate to the consumer as he pays it to the distributing company becomes a matter of local regulation. That is all there is to this whole business.

I say again, the Federal Power Commission never asserted this right. As a matter of fact, it specifically disclaimed it in 1947. The Court has not specifically held that it has the right. So I say again, it is simply a matter of clarification and a definite delineation of what was obviously the purpose and intent of the Congress of the United States.

Here is what the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, present Democratic Speaker of the House, said:

SPEAKER RAYBURN REQUESTS AMENDMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, with my long record in this House of Representatives, starting way back, being a member of the subcommittee that wrote the Federal Power Commission Act, being a member of the subcommittee that wrote the Federal Trade Commission Act, and being the author of the Securities Act of 1933, of the Stock Exchange Regulation Act of 1934, and of the Utilities Holding Company Act of 1935, I do not think I could be accused of having any great desire to serve the interests over the people.

If I felt as my distinguished and beloved friend from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER] has indicated he feels, that the Federal Government should own and control all the natural resources of this country, then my position on this and much other legislation would certainly be changed.

We have been going along the other line for more than a century and a half, and our country has grown to be the greatest and the most prosperous country in the history of the world.

The difference between this amendment and the bill we passed in the House is simply this, practically nothing more or nothing less: As a concession to some people who said they wanted to carry on this thing and not make this final, the Senate amendment in which we are seeking to concur today, in addition to the bill that passed the House, says, "We are going to pass this legislation but we want to carry on the study to see whether or not in passing this legislation we have done the proper thing."

In being for this bill, as I was when it originally passed the House and as I am now in favoring concurring in the Senate amendment, I have some pretty good company. The Federal Military Establishment was asked about this bill, and this is the guts of what they said, after all elements of the Department of Defense had studied it:

"Enactment of the bill will remove uncertainties now existing as to the extent of the application of the Natural Gas Act and will clarify its terms. Its effect should be to encourage the development of oil and gas resources and thus would be of benefit to the national security."

That is what our whole Military Establishment says about this legislation.

This bill simply says that the little fellow, who goes out and strikes some gas, is not going to be hauled up to Washington and tried before the Federal Power Commission, and that the independents in gathering, not in the transportation in interstate pipelines or anything of the sort, shall not be placed under regulations that they would be in interstate commerce.

In my opinion—and I state this to you deliberately; I would not deceive you; you know that—this will not raise the price of natural gas to any consumer in the United States one red penny. I think this thing should be gotten out of the way. We should concur in this Senate amendment and then have this study and see where we go from there.

Here's what the Honorable J. PERCY PRIEST, Democratic whip of the House, said:

MR. PRIEST SPEAKS FOR AMENDMENT AS NEEDED AND CONSISTENT

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, because several references have been made throughout the debate in this Chamber last year and in the other body to the Priest bill, references showing that the Priest bill of 1947 is rather largely the same as the bill now pending with the exception of the Senate amendment providing for continuation of a study, I want to take a few minutes to point out one or two important considerations in connection with the bill.

Reference was made by my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HESELTON], I believe it was, to the Rizley bill that was before the Eightieth Congress. The Rizley bill was before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for quite a while. Extensive hearings were held. I was not for that bill; I thought it went too far. At that time the Federal Power Commission came before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They came to my office and requested me to introduce a bill as a substitute for the Moore-Rizley bill. That request came also from the White House.

In a letter to the then chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON], the Federal Trade Commissioner said this:

"This is in response to your request of July 9 for an early comment by the Commission regarding H. R. 4099, a bill introduced by Congressman PRIEST, of Tennessee.

"The Federal Power Commission urges the enactment of this bill at this time to make it perfectly clear that independent producers and gatherers of natural gas are exempt from the provisions of the Natural Gas Act and the jurisdiction of this Commission.

"The enactment of this bill would dispel the uncertainty regarding the status of such independent producers and gatherers which has been created following the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Interstate case. Such action by the Congress now should dispose of this important and noncontroversial matter."

The last paragraph of the letter reads:

"I am authorized to state that the position of the Commission in this matter is fully in accord with the legislative program of the President."

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRIEST. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not a fact that the bill that passed the House last August, H. R. 1758, and the amendment that was passed by the Senate and sent over here, which is before the House at this time, is exactly the same thing and has for its purpose the exemption of independent producers and gatherers of natural gas where the sales are at arm's length?

Mr. PRIEST. Exactly, and that is the law as it has been in effect since 1938. This makes no change whatsoever. It says that a law which has been in effect for 12 years, during which time the retail price of natural gas has declined 12 percent, shall continue to operate on that same basis.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRIEST. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Is it not a fact that if a driller were drilling for oil and found gas, that he would inadvertently find himself in the public-utility business?

Mr. PRIEST. Assuming that the Commission has the jurisdiction which some claim it does, but which the law does not give it, and which was made perfectly clear in all of the legislative history of the act.

Here's what the Honorable OREN HARRIS, said:

COPY OF WIRE TO THE PRESIDENT BY MR. HARRIS, CHAIRMAN, PETROLEUM SUBCOMMITTEE

APRIL 4, 1950.

I want to strongly urge your approval H. R. 1758, Kerr amendment, Natural Gas Act, passed by House and Senate. Speaker RAYBURN, House Majority Leader MCCORMACK, Majority Whip PERCY PRIEST join in wholehearted support this bill. As chairman House subcommittee, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I am thoroughly familiar with this proposal. Committee reported it in my name as chairman, slightly amending original bill I introduced January 24, to fully conform with the purposes and intent of the FPC proposal introduced by Congressman PRIEST, a member of the committee 2 years ago and which was testified by the Commission to be in full accord with your, the President's program. It passed House in August as reported by our committee by a vote of 183 to 131. The Kerr bill as amended to conform to only the purposes and intent of the proposal passed the Senate. It was in different language but the same purpose only with an additional provision of a continuing study by the FPC on the subject in the public interest. The House agreed to the bill as amended by the Kerr amendment last Friday by a vote of 176 for it with 26 Members voting for the bill as passed the House in August being absent and not voting Friday.

This amendment, Mr. President, merely clarifies the intent of Congress when the original act was passed in 1938, to the effect that independent producers and gatherers of natural gas would be exempt from FPC regulations where sales by such producers and gatherers are at arm's length, at or prior to inception of interstate transmission or trunk lines of interstate natural gas companies. It conforms to the FPC order 139 issued August 1947, on being necessary because of confused interpretation Court decision in the Interstate case, June 1947.

This amendment, Mr. President, does not change any procedures or authority exerted in the history of the Natural Gas Act. It does not change the stated intent of the act when passed in 1938. It merely clears up a confused and uncertain status by court interpretation. Grave misrepresentations have been made to the effect it will increase cost of gas to consumers. This I respectively submit is gross misrepresentation. The history of the administration of the act shows the cost on a national average to consumers to gradually be reduced by 12 percent, during the 12 years of the Natural Gas Act administration.

I join with Speaker RAYBURN in confidently stating that this will not have adverse effect on the cost of gas to consumers. On the other hand, it will benefit consumers reducing their fuel cost by making more gas available to them.

The price of natural gas to consumers has steadfastly gone down and the cost of other fuels increased tremendously over the same period of time.

The contention that this is not competitive fuel, I respectfully submit, is in error. The competitive element is in the field where there are thousands of leases from which gas is produced and the competitive element prevails in the usual business way as the big natural gas companies bid for it.

The FPC definitely has authority over rates at wholesale prices for resale and any grossly unfair or unusually high rates as in the past be prohibited by Commission. Furthermore, State utility commissions have regulatory authority over rates by distributing companies and can likewise continue to exert authority where the regulated monopoly business prevails. I urge your approval.

OREN HARRIS,
Member of Congress.

DANGER SIGNAL

There are some who feel that everything should be regulated at the Federal level. Right now natural gas is their target. If they are successful in this attempt, who can predict what commodity will be next to be removed from private enterprise and placed under bureaucratic restrictions? (Senator EDWARD MARTIN, Republican, Pennsylvania.)

CONCLUSION

When the consumers of natural gas in the Second District of Minnesota find that gas is increasing in price as a result of the President's veto of the Kerr gas bill, they will realize that those who voted for the Kerr bill voted in the best interest of the consumers and in an effort to give them cheaper fuel by bringing more and more natural gas to them.

Despite all the hysterical distortions and malicious mistatements—and despite the vicious propaganda to the contrary—it is an unanswerable fact—which time will emphasize—that the President's veto of the Kerr bill has resulted in increased prices to the consumer.

Address by Hon. Joseph R. McCarthy, of Wisconsin, at Prince Georges County Republican Rally, Hyattsville, Md.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by me at a Republican rally at Hyattsville, Md., on September 22, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, something is radically wrong with this Nation today.

Five years ago we had the most powerful military force the world has ever seen assembled. At that time our military juggernaut, with no difficulty, could have rolled across the Elbe River, over the Ural Mountains, across the Siberian Plains and on to the Pacific Ocean without even a noticeable stop for mopping up operations in Korea.

Today, 5 years later, a nation so small that it can hardly be seen on the map thumbs its nose at the mighty United States and degrades us in the eyes of the world. Their Communist forces show such complete disdain for us that they tie the hands of captive Americans and deliberately murder them and then leave them lying in the mud of Korea to notify the world of the contempt in which they hold Americans.

Why? And why also must this Nation use its entire resources to accomplish a task which one of Patton's armored columns would have considered a minor diversion 5 years ago?

Of course, we will win in Korea—but after a vast number of lives have been senselessly squandered and much of the economic lifeblood has been drained from this Nation.

The sands in the hourglass of time are fast running out. We are losing the world to international atheistic communism at a fantastic rate of speed. Five years ago there were within the tentacles of the atheistic communistic octopus 180,000,000 people. Today that figure is over 800,000,000. If this tempo of Communist victories continues, in another 5 years those of us here tonight will be faceless pawns working, living, and dying as ordered by the commissar.

Why? Is it because we are less intelligent than the Communists? Is it because we can't match them in courage? Is it because their devotion to atheism is greater than our devotion to God? Is it because we are less willing to stand up and fight for what we think is right? The answer is "No." Then what is the answer? Is it in our leadership? To that my answer is "Yes," and I challenge anyone to find another answer.

I have been naming names and presenting evidence against those leaders who have been responsible for selling into communistic slavery over 500,000,000 people—those leaders responsible for the creation of Communist stepping stones to American shores.

Those in power in Washington say that this is not so; that those are not the men. Now if I have named the wrong men, then the American people are entitled to know the names of the traitors who plotted the Communist victory in Asia and the dismal American defeat—the greatest defeat any nation has suffered in war or peace.

We must put the spotlight of exposure on those who are responsible for America's continuing disasters. This is important, not for the purpose of exposing past failures, but because those same men are now doing America's planning for the future—men whose shadows will long hover like vultures over the corpse of China and the corpse of Poland—men whose actions today are ripping at the very backbone of freedom in America. Unfortunately, they have become so deeply entrenched that almost every power of the Government is used to sabotage any attempt to expose and root them out.

Now, as you know, I brought to the attention of the Senate some of the evidence of Communists in the State Department. The Senate appointed a committee to investigate. A tip-off of what could be expected came from the administration Democrat leader, SCOTT LUCAS. On February 21, 1950, on page 21106 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he said that the reason for giving the investigation to the Tydings-McMahon committee was to keep any other committee from conducting an investigation. The Senate special investigations committee which was created for the purpose of making such investigations, was barred from looking into this. In other words, the Tydings-McMahon committee was formed to prevent an honest committee from doing an honest job.

The Tydings-McMahon committee has now announced to the world that its job is done. They officially state that there is not a single Communist or pro-Communist in the State Department—that everyone there is an ideal, loyal, normal American.

If this is true, then this Nation is in no danger of communistic enslavement. As a great historian once said, if this Nation dies, its death will not be caused by enemies from without but rather because of enemies from within.

If, however, as I have stated, the LUCAS-created Tydings-McMahon committee has done a dishonest job and was interested in protecting Communists for political reasons, then this Nation has not long to live and the blood of the young men who are today dying in the hills and valleys of Korea stains not only the hands of the masters of the Kremlin but stains also the hands of those men in this Nation who cannot rise above politics—who cannot rise to the challenge of the problems of 1950. Yes, staining—if you please—the hands of those who place cheap political considerations before the welfare not only of this Nation but of civilization as a whole.

It is, of course, easy to make general statements about the incompetence of that committee. Therefore let's get down to some of the specific, recorded examples of how TYDINGS and MCMAHON operated. Then you—the American people—can decide from the record whether they are protecting and hiding Communists and traitors in governments, and whether you want more of it.

Example No. 1 deals with a well-known Communist, Earl Browder. Earl Browder was called by the Tydings-McMahon committee apparently as a character witness for Owen Lattimore. Browder was head of the Communist Party in America. He was Stalin's right-hand man.

Tydings, while trying to get Browder to testify that all our State Department planners were good loyal Americans—the Browder-type of loyal Americans, of course—said to Browder:

"You are defeating the purpose of this inquiry in a way that you perhaps do not realize. If you feel that you could answer, I would be very grateful to you" (hearings, p. 706).

Do you get the awful import of that? Do you get the import of the chairman of our Armed Services Committee saying to America's top Communist, "If you only realized how I am trying to cover up, whitewash, protect, and keep in Government jobs your fellow Communist Party members and their dupes, you would help me."

TYDINGS coaxed and cajoled. Browder finally said: "All right, they are not Communists." TYDINGS then leaned across the table and said, "Oh, thank you, sir."

That is the sort of thing that the Democrat majority, under the leadership of LUCAS, officially approved on July 20 by a straight Democrat Party line vote. If you approve, vote Democrat in November. If not, vote Republican.

Now let's make it clear—when I refer to the Democrat Party, I refer to the administration Democrat Party. As we all know, there are two Democrat groups. There are the millions of loyal Americans who have long voted the Democrat ticket and there is the administration Democrat Party which is no longer an American Party.

In this connection, I'd like to pay high tribute to the over 100,000 Democrats who helped to nominate a Democrat Governor but who refused to take part in the Democrat senatorial primary (something unheard of in American politics).

They, of course, were fully acquainted with TYDINGS' record and wouldn't vote for him—and they didn't know enough about the two fine men who were opposing TYDINGS to make a decision between them—and, therefore, didn't vote.

This type of intelligent action is a good omen for America. It is also a good omen that well over half of those who voted in the Maryland primary, refused to vote for TYDINGS, chairman of the whitewash committee.

Example No. 2: The case of Gustavo Duran, who was one of Acheson's "experts" in the State Department. I presented to the committee a complete and detailed report of Army Intelligence showing that Duran had been active in secret Communist operations in Europe and that he was regional head of SIM, a counterpart of the Russian secret police. Immediately there came from the State Department the usual high-pitched screaming and squealing to the effect that MCCARTHY was a liar. This time they said, "Sure the record is black on that Gustavo Duran, but he is not our Gustavo Duran. This is a case of mistaken identity and MCCARTHY is smearing an innocent man." I thereupon produced pictures of Duran in the uniform he wore at the time he was with the secret police which proved that that Duran was truly the State Department's own Gustavo, who, incidentally, had been quietly promoted on Acheson's recommendation to a higher salaried job in the United Nations. I hold the picture in my hand. His job in the UN is to screen displaced persons and decide which ones should be allowed to enter the United States.

But what did the committee do? Absolutely nothing. Duran was not called. They were not interested in knowing who placed him in the State Deparement, or why Acheson recommended him to a higher-paid job with the United Nations.

If you approve of this dangerous coddling, hiding and protecting of Communists, dupes, and fellow travelers in Government, then vote the Democrat ticket. That is what every Democrat present in the Senate voted to approve. Every Republican voted against it.

If on the other hand you feel that when Army Intelligence gives a detailed account of a man's having been head of European secret police, that then the American people should know why the Secretary of State promotes him to a better job; if you feel that a committee should want to know all about this man, then vote the Republican ticket. That is the only way we will have a decent, honest investigation.

The fight against communism should not be a political fight. It should be a fight between the roughly 150,000,000 honest, loyal Americans against the forces of atheistic communism, for certainly if communism wins there will be neither a Democratic nor a Republican Party. Unfortunately, the men of little minds who control the administration Democrats, and who do not represent the millions of loyal American Democrats, have placed themselves on the side of the Communists, traitors, and dupes in order to gain a short-term political advantage.

Apparently, the Tydings, the McMahons and the Lucases do not realize that they cannot save the face of the Democrat Party if the face of America is lost.

I do not ask the Democrats in this country to desert their party. I do ask them in the name of America to realize that at long last the administration Democratic Party has deserted them and has made it a party which protects Communists and hides corruption.

Example No. 3: This is another typical example of what the Tydings-McMahon-Lucas combine ask you to vote your approval of this November.

This is the case of the man who is now our Ambassador at Large, Philip Jessup. I have here a few of the photostats of the evidence in his case. I hope that each of you will take a copy with you. Keep in mind if you will that this man holds one of the highest jobs in our State Department. His task is to lead the fight against communism in Asia.

In presenting Jessup's case, I stated that he had editorial control of the magazine of the I. P. R. which was officially named as a front for the Communist Party. The State Department again issued the usual press release saying that this was not true, that their Philip Jessup was only one of the 50 trustees of that Communist front and that he did not know what was going on. Now here is the photostat showing that their Philip Jessup was chairman of the Research Advisory Committee which had absolute unquestioned control of this Communist-front magazine, in other words, the head man, the chairman.

Incidentally, the same board of trustees who controlled Jessup's publications, also controlled Amerasia. This magazine was listed by the FBI as, and I quote, "a tool for Russian espionage."

Next are the photostats of $6,000 worth of Communist checks used to support this magazine which preached the Communist line on Asia.

Next is the data on the Communist-front organizations with which Ambassador Jessup was affiliated.

Next is a photostat of a petition, dated February 16, 1946, signed by Jessup in which he follows the Communist Party line and urges that we "at once stop the production of bombs," and that we dump atomic bomb material into the ocean.

These photostats were all sent to the President. After he received the photostats showing that (1) Jessup headed a magazine of a Communist-front organization heavily supported by Communist money; (2) Jessup's affiliation with the five organizations which were officially named as fronts for the Communist Party; and (3) that he had signed a petition urging that we destroy our atomic bomb material, the President took immediate action. What do you think his action was? He immediately gave Jessup top secret clearance to all atomic and hydrogen bomb information. Sufficient copies of these photostats are available for all of you.

Incidentally, when Frederick Vanderbilt Field, self-proclaimed as the Nation's leading Communist, appeared before the committee, he was asked about his relationship with Jessup. His answer was: "I refuse to answer on the grounds that that information might incriminate me."

Later the Tydings-McMahon committee when asked by the press, said they were considering citing Field for contempt. But the millionaire Communist playboy did not like communism quite well enough to go to jail for 2, 3, or 5 years. So he sent word to the committee that he was willing to talk—that he would now tell all. The Tydings-McMahon committee then frantically held a late night meeting. Clearly it would wreck their whitewash plans if Frederick Vanderbilt Field was actually to tell all. So the next day they announced that they would not let this sacred Communist come back and spill everything he knew about Communists in Government.

And incidentally, on page 732 of the hearings, which I hold in my hand, you will find the most fantastically shameful exhibition which you will perhaps ever witness on the part of a chairman of a Senate committee. Mr. TYDINGS here says to Field, the self-proclaimed Communist, "Are those people whom MCCARTHY has named disloyal to the Government of the United States?" Communist Field says, "No, of course, they were not disloyal." And TYDINGS and MCMAHON heaved a sigh of relief and concluded: "That proves they were all loyal."

And we find here in the record which I hold in my hand that Senator MCMAHON leaned across the table and said, "Dr. Jessup, I am proud of you. I am delighted that you are a constituent of mine." And listen to this—I quote verbatim—"I think you are entitled to the thanks of all of our people for the magnificent work which you have done."

If you agree with TYDINGS and MCMAHON that this man who was editor of the magazine of a Communist-front organization, which was supported by Communist money and which spearheaded the Communist Party line—if you agree that this man who was affiliated with 5 organizations which were officially named as fronts for the Communist Party and who signed a petition urging that we destroy our atomic bombs—if you agree with TYDINGS and MCMAHON that here was the type of man we want doing our planning, then vote the Democrat ticket because you will get more of them. But if your stomach is full of this sort of thing, then vote Republican.

Example No. 4 is that of William Remington who was one of the 81 cases which TYDINGS and MCMAHON voted to clear. In their book it was a "fraud" for MCCARTHY to have named him in the first place. When I named him, he was holding a position high in the Commerce Department, working closely with the State Department on exports. As you know, it was the State and Commerce Departments, working hand in glove, that succeeded in keeping the badly needed arms and ammunition from the South Koreans which the Congress had voted for them.

When the TYDINGS-MCMAHON committee said Remington is a loyal American and it is a "fraud" for MCCARTHY to have named him, luckily the House Committee took up his case as did the grand jury with the result that he has since been indicted because of his Communist activities.

Among the photostats being made available to you tonight is one revealing that 8 young men had the job, over a 5- or 6-month period, of cleaning out of the 16,000 State Department employees' files anything which showed them to be either Communists or perverts. The statement shows that these men were hired by the State Department and instructed to do this job. I suggest that you read this signed and witnessed statement.

Incidentally, after this fight to clean the Communists out of Government started, the State Department testified under oath that they had finally gotten rid of 91 perverts. It might interest you to know that as of tonight, 14 of the 91 are already back in Government work and most of them at higher salaries.

Another two photostats being given you are of almost unlimited value in deciding whether the word of the chairman of the whitewash committee can be depended upon—whether he speaks the truth or whether he lied whenever he thought he could get away with it. And I do urge you take these two documents with you.

First is the photostat of the recording made by the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune of the press conference called by Mr. TYDINGS. This is dated June 22—and remember that date, June 22. You will note Mr. TYDINGS stated that the FBI had examined all the files and established as false the statement that any evidence that State Department employees were Communists had been destroyed. This, of course, was meant to be a clincher—the fact that the FBI had examined all files while the committee was looking at them and found that everything was there.

But let's look at the next photostat—a photostat of a letter containing the signature of J. Edgar Hoover which says: "Tydings does not speak the truth. We did not examine the files. We do not know how badly they were raped."

To make this attempted deception even more shameful and to compound the lie, the FBI was ordered, after the committee had ended its farce—and listen to this if you will—the FBI was ordered first to send over all material which should have been in the files in the first place. This was done. Then the FBI was ordered to come over and look over the files and see whether or not the material that it had sent over had then been put in the files. These orders were issued to the FBI so that the chairman during his political campaign might be able to say, "Look, the FBI says now those files, which the committee of course no longer has access to, are complete."

Obviously, if the committee was interested in having the files complete, this order to supply the missing material would have been issued to the FBI before the committee looked at the files instead of long after they were through.

If you want more of that you can get plenty of it by voting Democrat this November. If, however, it makes you sick way down deep inside as it does me, you can get rid of it by voting Republican this November.

And now for the master planner for disaster—Dean Gooderham Acheson. This is the Acheson, who in 1939 before Hiss did all of his damage at Yalta said: "Don't investigate Hiss; I will vouch for him completely." When Hiss was convicted after 10 years of treasonable activities and a record of betrayal, Acheson said: "I will never turn my back on Alger Hiss." This is the Acheson who sent Hiss to Yalta, where Hiss, Gromyko and a third person drafted the Yalta Agreement. This agreement was described by our American Ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, as follows: "As I glanced over the document, I could not believe my eyes. To me, almost every line showed a complete surrender to Stalin."

This is the Acheson who while discussing the Communist victory in China said: "A new day has dawned in Asia." His adviser, Owen Lattimore, described the same Communist victory as "the opening of limitless horizons of hope."

This is the Acheson who notified the world that we would not stand in the way of United Nations recognition of Communist China. Three times he publicly stated that Korea was not included in our defense plan. He thereby gave an engraved invitation to the Communists to take over. Incidentally, the President's last-minute decision to enter the Korean conflict was the first time we have double-crossed Stalin during Acheson's 9 years in the State Department.

Let me give you a brief story and listen to this, if you will, ladies and gentlemen—a brief story of Acheson's aid to the Communists who were fighting to take over Poland.

From October 1945, to March 1947, Acheson's law firm was retained by the Communist government of Poland to obtain a $90,000,000 loan from the United States. The loan was put through and Acheson's firm received a cut of over $50,000, according to his sworn testimony.

During this time, Acheson was Assistant Secretary of State. He admitted in January 1949, that he was charged with sole responsibility of making or refusing that loan.

Fifty million dollars of that ninety million went to equip and arm the Communist army and the dreaded U. B.—the Communist secret police just then being set up in Poland.

He did not do this blindly. He was fully advised as to what the money would be used for. Listen to the words of our Ambassador to Poland, Arthur Bliss Lane, who pleaded with Acheson not to make the loan:

"With the greatest earnestness of which I am capable, I beg the Department not to approve the extension of any credits at this time. When the terroristic activities of the Security Police come to an end, when freedom of the press is restored, and when American citizens are released from Polish prisons—not until then should United States public funds be used to assist the Polish Provisional Government of National Unity."

But Acheson loaned $90,000,000 of your money to the Communists. Ambassador Lane could not stomach this. He resigned to tell his story of the State Department's help to the Communists in his book entitled "I Saw Poland Betrayed." Lane and the other anti-Communists in the State Department went. But Acheson remained. Acheson always remained.

Lenin and Stalin long stressed that the turning point in world revolution would come when China was conquered by communism. William Z. Foster, head of the Communist Party in this country, in December of 1945, said, "The war in China is the key to all the problems of international communism."

Now, let's see how closely the State Department plans tied in with the plans of Lenin, Stalin, and Foster: A short time after Foster's statement, General Marshall was sent to China with secret instructions, which as a soldier, he obeyed. Now who do you think wrote those instructions? None other than Dean Acheson. This is proven by his initials on the blue copy of the instructions which now rests in the Archives.

Marshall's actions were (1) to place an embargo on ammunition to the troops fighting communism; (2) to force the anti-Communist troops to withdraw from the two mountain passes to Mongolia and Manchuria, making it possible for Communist forces to move freely and obtain arms from the Russians; and (3) to force Chiang to reduce his army by more than 1,000,000 men, many of whom, after 8 years of war, having no occupation, were forced to enlist with the Communist forces. 1946 dragged by. Marshall came home. The Communist army—grown from 300,000 to 2,000,000 men—armed, trained, directed, and even officered by the Soviets—was ready for the offensive by late 1947. But the Marshall embargo made it impossible for the troops fighting the Communists to buy ammunition in America or England, the only source.

Marshall was given the job of cutting off all arms and ammunition to the forces fighting communism in China, if they would not agree to take the Communists into partnership. Marshall did this and commented, "As Chief of Staff I armed 29 anti-Communist divisions. Now, with a stroke of the pen, I have disarmed them."

At the time the Acheson group was writing the secret instructions under which Marshall was, in his words, disarming 29 anti-Communist divisions with a stroke of the pen—at that very moment, according to documents supplied by Ambassador to China Patrick Hurley, this same group was "openly advising the Communists to refuse unification * * * unless the Chinese Communists were given control"—a weird, traitorous double-deal, if ever there was one.

Here the treason of Yalta was brought to full bloom. Here was signed the warrant condemning to atheistic communistic slavery 400,000,000 of our allies who fought so well with us during the entire war. Here was signed the death warrant of the young men who have been dying today in the hills and valleys of Korea. Here was signed the death warrant of the young men who will die tomorrow in the jungles of Indochina. Here was signed the death warrant of the young men who will die on the sands of Iran the next day. Here was signed the death warrant of the young men who will die in the streets of Berlin and Paris the day after that.

Now keep in mind that this Acheson-conceived mission of Marshall was launched just a few days after the head of the Communist Party said, in effect, "The Communists must win China to win the world."

Long before this mission of Marshall, however, the State Department crowd was putting into operation the plan for the betrayal of our Chinese allies.

When the war with Japan ended, there was stored in India—as a way-station to China—billions of dollars worth of lend-lease arms and ammunition. We then had the manpower, we had the ships, we had the supply route to promptly deliver those sorely needed supplies to our Chinese allies who were fighting the Communists.

For 8 months, 18 Liberty ships were being loaded with those mountains of ammunition. Loaded they left the port and returned empty time after time to be reloaded and leave again. One hundred and twenty thousand tons of ammunition did those ships take from the ports of India. Every day during this entire 8-month period, the artillery of Chiang Kai-shek remained silent.

Did this ammunition reach the silent guns of Chiang Kai-sheks' army? Ladies and gentlemen, the answer is "No." The State Department orders were: Dump it 200 miles at sea—dump it in the ocean.

And listen to this—all of that vast amount of equipment that was destroyed by us is still carried on the administration's books as aid which we gave to China.

Here in my hand, ladies and gentlemen, I hold a copy of a letter from Maj. Gen. Edward Witsell, the Adjutant General of the Army, in which he admits that this ammunition was dumped in the Pacific Ocean. Of course, there is the usual double-talk. You find the claim that the ammuntion was corroded—that it was improperly stored. Now I was in the Pacific and I can assure you that we just did not store even one bomb where it would be ruined by corrosion—not unless you wanted to be court-martialed.

If you want more of that sort of thing, you can get it easily. Vote Democrat this November.

This problem is right smack in the laps of the American people. If they have had enough, there is only one way to end the bungling and traitorous acts. That is by voting Republican.

If, however, the American people favor dumping into the ocean billions of dollars worth of goods which they paid for and earmarked for the anti-Communist forces in China; if they believe in having that done and then kept secret from them for 5 years with the hope that they would never learn about it; if they favor that sort of thing, they can get more of it by voting for the Tydings - McMahon - Lucas type of whitewash—by voting Democrat.

The Congress last year voted millions of dollars to furnish necessary planes, tanks, antitank guns, rifles, and ammunition so that the South Koreans might be able to defend themselves. We voted one item of $75,000,000, any part of which could be used in Korea. We voted another item of $10,300,000, all of it to be used to arm South Korea. The President signed those two bills without a word of protest. Democrats and Republicans alike, almost unanimously, voted that money. Then what happened? At that point, the State Department stepped in and, ladies and gentlemen, how much of that money do you think was actually spent to arm South Korea? The answer—not one ounce of gunpowder, not a single shot. Out of the $10,300,000 which was appropriated for the defense of South Korea, only $200 was spent and that was to load some baling wire.

We are a patient people. However, I think you will agree that the time has run out for the men who today are covering the tracks of their blunders with plans that will lead us to further disaster.

It does not take a foreign policy expert to realize why China is writhing today under the heel of a Soviet boot. It does not take an expert to realize the extent to which the American taxpayer has bought and paid for the Communist domination of Poland today.

This man, Dean G. Acheson, who worked on the team of world strategy to create a Red China and a Red Poland, should be removed from the high command of our foreign policy at once. The people cannot afford to wait until the elections of 1952.

Let's speak briefly of the trio who have successfully labeled the administration Democrat Party as the party which protects Communists and hides corruption.

I refer to (1) LUCAS, the administration's front man in the Senate who selected TYDINGS and MCMAHON to do their whitewash job; (2) MCMAHON, who bragged on the Senate floor that it was he who read and approved the whitewash report. This is the same MCMAHON who suggested in the early part of this year that the United States disarm and that we give $50,000,000,000 of American money to Russia and her satellites on condition, of course, that Russia would promise to be peaceful. MCMAHON, of course, was sure that Russia would keep her promise after she had spent our 50 billions to build up her industry so that she might be able to successfully fight us; (3) MILLARD TYDINGS, whom the administration made chairman of the Armed Services Committee and the whitewash committee. Those jobs certainly call for a vigorous, fearless, intelligent watchdog for the American people. But what do we get in that job? TYDINGS, the administration's lap dog.

LUCAS provided the whitewash when I charged there were Communists in high places in Government; MCMAHON brought the bucket; TYDINGS the brush.

This trio—TYDINGS, MCMAHON, and LUCAS—in my opinion, have done more than any others in this Nation to shield the traitors, protect the disloyal, and confuse Americans in their desperate fight to clean out the Communists.

These are the men who engineered the whitewash. These are the men who whipped the Democrat Party into line. These are the men who ordered the sideshow and called in their Communist witnesses who obligingly testified: "All's well with the world". This is the trio who paraded before the Nation the most crass and dangerous display of deceit in the history of the Senate.

TYDINGS, LUCAS, and MCMAHON are not themselves evil men. They are men of little minds who tragically are in positions of tremendous power today, at a time when the survival of western nonatheistic civilization hangs in the balance—men of little minds who have neither the mental nor the moral capacity to rise above narrow partisan politics. They are the men who arise on the Senate floor and make eloquent speeches against communism generally, but who promptly yield the whitewash brush when we try to get rid of the individual Communists and the dupes and stooges of the Kremlin.

We can be thankful that in this Nation the people themselves still have the power to clean house. The 152,000,000 American people have the power to get rid of the Achesons, the Jessups, the Lattimores, and the Services. They have the power to say we want in our Government normal Americans, who are for this Nation first, last, and all the time. They have the power to say we will not have the dupes and stooges of the Kremlin nor will we have men who are hip deep in their own failures. It is up to you, the American people. The case is in your hands.

Report to My Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. RHODES

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to report to the people of Berks County, the Thirteenth District of Pennsylvania, whom I represent in Congress. As a Democrat I felt duty-bound to support the 1948 platform pledges the Democratic Party made to the people of the United States before the election of President Truman and Members of the Eighty-first Congress.

I make this report to my constituents because I believe the people want to know what their Representative has done.

The people of Berks County, like myself, are predominantly of Pennsylvania Dutch stock, although we have many other good people of Polish, Italian, German, and other extractions who together make up one of the most progressive and thrifty communities in Pennsylvania or in the Nation.

I know these sturdy people expect their Representative to support the platform of the party on which he campaigned for election. That I have done faithfully. I have supported the Truman administration program on domestic issues such as social security and public housing.

On foreign policy I have supported the administration in economic aid to friendly democratic nations in order to bolster their economies and to strengthen them against Communist aggression. I have also supported military aid for Atlantic Pact nations and for Korea.

In the 2 years I have served in Congress I have received the impression that Congress is just a reflection of the Nation as a whole. The same differences which exist between people at home we find also in Washington.

Differences very often are not held on a very high plane. There is a tendency to evade real issues and to resort to name calling and deception. But, overall, one finds the Members of Congress, whether Republican or Democrat, all good Americans doing and working for what they believe best for the Nation.

Among those with whom I differ I have made some very close friends. There again it is much like back home where I can count among my friends some who have differed with me politically. They include such men as former Mayor John Keim Stauffer, Hunter Rick, Joseph Eisenbrown, Frank Hilton, and others.

My association with community leaders representing people in all walks of life has made it less difficult to understand the views of others on issues which come before this Congress. I have served over the years as a member of the board of directors of the Community General Hospital, the YMCA, the Berks County Red Cross, Community Chest, War Manpower Committee, Rationing Board, Housing Authority, and in many other community activities.

I have sincerely tried to serve, well and faithfully, the people of Berks County. As a lifelong resident of the community whose parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents have been reared in and around Reading and Rockland Township, I believe I understand the sentiments and the wishes of the people I represent.

In my younger days as an apprentice printer I learned to know and admire such men as the late Thomas Shoemaker and Danny Hoch, with whom I worked for many years at the Reading Eagle, and who later served so well as a Member of Congress.

I have been confirmed as a Lutheran as were both my children, but I have always tried to be tolerant in respecting the convictions and the rights of others.

In my younger days I was very active in amateur athletics. I believed in good clean sport as a builder for strong bodies and minds and lasting friendships.

As in sports, I believe that politics should be clean. Differences should be honestly and fairly discussed and decisions made on what is deemed best for the greatest number.

It was in that spirit, so prevalent among the Pennsylvania Dutch, that I have served as a Member of the Eighty-first Congress.

FULL-TIME SERVICE

This Congress has broken a record for long sessions. I have been absent only 1 day except for the short period I was back in Berks County during my primary election campaign.

I have given my full time and attention to the job. Every possible courtesy was given to my constituents. Each person who contacted me got my fullest cooperation regardless of who he was or to what political party he belonged. I tried sincerely to represent all the people of my district and I am certain that those who found it necessary to seek my cooperation and help will so testify.

I have publicly offered to attend any meeting of any group of interested citizens to discuss, debate, or answer questions on any of the important issues that came before this Congress. I take this opportunity to repeat that offer. I especially welcome requests from groups and individuals who may differ with administration policies which I have supported.

I have opened an office in the Reading Post Office in order that I can always be in close touch with my constituents. The office is located on the second floor of the Reading Post Office where any citizen of Berks is welcome to bring his problems.

I have had the honor and opportunity to preside over the House of Representatives, on one occasion, substituting for the Speaker of the House, SAM RAYBURN.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT

I endeavored to get favorable action on improving the Railroad Retirement Act. Perhaps my long association with problems of laboring people has made me very sympathetic to the needs of retired workers. The big rise in prices and living costs has made increased benefits for the former railroad workers long overdue. Because Reading has large railroad shops, many Berks citizens would benefit by the improvement of the Railroad Retirement Act.

SOCIAL-WELFARE LEGISLATION

After I left high school I worked as a printer for many years at the Reading Eagle Co., and continued my education by going to school at night. I became acquainted with problems which affected working people and I began to understand the need for legislation to protect our citizens and their families during times of distress which come with industrial accidents, unemployment, advancing age, and other misfortunes. I became an ardent advocate of social security when opposition was most bitter and powerful. In Congress I immediately gave my full support for improved social security. I wanted disability benefits included in the present law. I favored a much wider coverage so that many additional millions of people not now protected would be covered. I consider social security a great institution today. It has raised the health and moral standards of our people and has materially helped in bringing prosperity to our people and progress to the Nation.

It was very interesting to me to see how long-time Republican opponents of social security were forced to accept and support the improved social-security bill that we passed in this Congress. They used to call it statism and welfare state legislation. They said it would mean slavery for the American people. Now today they vote for this most far-reaching welfare measure of the New Deal. But this Republican opposition did keep us from getting some of the improvements that many of us thought were so necessary.

I tried to get a provision in the social-security law which would help aged people who are not covered by social security. Many did not have the opportunity for coverage and benefits before reaching age 65. They must depend on State public assistance.

I consider our old-age-assistance laws in Pennsylvania most unjust and inadequate. Many needy aged folks are denied public assistance on flimsy excuses about relatives who are expected to support them. That policy destroys many good family relationships. It puts a burden upon many young people with incomes not adequate for their own family needs. It also embarrasses the old folks, many of whom suffer in silence because of our disgraceful State public-assistance law.

Since the Federal Government contributes to State public-assistance funds, I tried to make it mandatory that States like Pennsylvania be forced to liberalize the law to qualify for Federal funds. I introduced a bill which would force States to abandon the policy of refusing aid to aged people on the grounds that support must come from relatives.

ECONOMY

I voted for all the proposals of the Hoover Commission for economy in Government that came to the House floor. I was opposed to such false economy moves by the Republican leadership which voted to make blanket appropriation cuts which would cut the efficiency and effectiveness of the Federal Bureau of Investigation—FBI—and other essential Government agencies.

TAX LEGISLATION

I have favored taxation based on the ability to pay. I favored and fought with the liberal Congressmen for immediate enactment of an excess-profits tax before this Congress adjourns.

I considered it unfair to raise taxes on low-income families and on incomes under $5,000 a year without taxing war profits which were mounting rapidly since Korea.

I have introduced a bill which would raise personal income-tax exemptions to $1,000 in order to take the lowest income groups out of the tax-paying class. This group is already heavily taxed because of many hidden and indirect taxes they pay when buying the necessities of life.

NATURAL RESOURCES

I have favored legislation to preserve and develop our natural resources. I voted for expansion of TVA and have favored other great power-development programs, soil conservation, and flood control. I supported legislation for rural electrification and telephones. All of which I contend helps make our Nation more strong and our people more prosperous.

I opposed the bill to remove restrictions from the gas monopoly. That bill would have resulted in big increases to the consumers of gas in the Nation.

VETERANS

Pennsylvania has the honor of having more war veterans serving as Members of Congress than any other State. I am proud to be one of these veterans and a member of Gregg Post, American Legion.

I have supported legislation to aid the veterans of the Nation. I was especially active in pressing for adequate hospital beds for veterans in need of hospitalization and medical care. There is a serious bed shortage and I have opposed the reduction in hospital beds and the closing of veteran hospitals as false economy.

From personal experience and contacts I have learned of the need for legislation to aid World War I veterans who are suffering from varied physical defects causing them serious financial problems and loss of jobs. For that reason, I supported pension legislation to aid the men who served their country in time of need. Many of their ailments are the result of war service although the records do not always show it.

COMMITTEE WORK

During my term in Congress I served as a member of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. On a number of occasions, I served as chairman of subcommittees. I played an active part in bringing several important bills to the House floor after undue delay because of strong opposition inside the committee.

One of these bills was to increase the salaries of low-income postal employees. Another was a bill to restore the postal service, the curtailment of which I opposed as another example of false economy. I have opposed the policies which put the Post Office Department in a bad light because of the big deficit charged against it.

I have asked that subsidies to magazines and newspapers, to railroads, steamship lines, and airlines be charged directly to the Government rather than against the post office. The policy of listing such subsidies as part of the postal deficit is misleading and deceptive and gives the public a false picture of the post-office management. The maintenance cost of public buildings used by the Department of Agriculture, Treasury, Labor, Armed Services, and other Federal agencies is wrongly charged against the Post Office Department. I have opposed this policy believing that the people are entitled to a true picture of the Nation's postal service.

ALASKA AND HAWAII

I have supported statehood for Alaska and Hawaii. I consider statehood for these territories important to the security of the United States. We need the complete loyalty of the citizens of these outposts and the granting of statehood would give full citizenship to these people and strengthen their ties and loyalty to our country.

I supported the administration bill to remove the restrictions on the sale of oleomargarine. On a teller vote I supported the Granger amendment in regard to restrictions on coloring. I felt that some compromise which might be acceptable to the dairy farmers would be a step in the right direction.

When the amendment was defeated on the teller vote I then supported the administration on the roll-call vote on the oleo issue.

SUBVERSIVES

I supported legislation designed to curb Communist and subversive activities. I voted for the appropriation for the Committee on Un-American Activities at this session of Congress. The committee has been most effective in this Congress. It did not resort to cheap political trickery and smearing which discredited the committee in the Eightieth Congress under the chairmanship of J. Parnell Thomas, and which caused me to oppose the committee appropriation bill in the first session.

New members added to the Un-American Activities Committee in the Eighty-first Congress, including Representative FRANCIS WALTER, of Pennsylvania, gave prestige to the committee, which was far more successful in its work, accomplished with fairness and dignity.

I have always believed that the most intelligent and most effective method of fighting communism is to raise the economic and health standards of the American people. Depressions, lack of decent housing, lack of adequate care for the aged and needy, make it possible for Communist propaganda to take root.

Social security, public housing, unemployment insurance, high employment, and prosperity have done much to prevent people from being influenced by Communist propaganda.

The recent declaration of the national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Charles C. Ralls, supports my position. Rails announced that the VFW is opening a campaign against communism here at home by trying to reduce the poverty, hunger, and misery on which communism breeds. The VFW has decided on a wise course by taking positive action to eradicate the conditions that nurture communism.

KOREA

Communist aggression in Korea brought prompt action by President Truman for military resistance. Republican opponents of the President criticized what they called our unpreparedness to meet the invaders. But the records show that these same critics opposed economic and arms aid to South Korea and to other anti-Communist nations.

The events since the Communist attack gives promise that Korea may be a great turning point in history, and perhaps the end of Communist advance and the beginning of its decline.

Korea has given new strength to the United Nations and added moral and spiritual strength to the free people of the friendly democratic nations in their fight against Communist totalitarianism.

Despite the terrible sacrifices, and despite the constant danger of world conflict, Korea does hold out much promise of preventing another world war and in building for world peace.

I have been deeply moved by the heartaches of parents and families of young men who have been called to the service or who are fighting in Korea. Nothing is more difficult to answer than communications asking why we must always have war and killing. They want to know why their boys have to fight on foreign shores.

Of course, there are many reasons and answers why we must resist the forces of aggression and tyranny. It is essential for our own security as a Nation and for the survival of human freedom.

GENERAL MARSHALL

When Secretary of Defense Johnson resigned Gen. George Marshall was nominated by President Truman to succeed him. I supported legislation to pave the way for the approval of General Marshall.

I consider criticism of General Marshall by the Republican leadership to be most unfair because Marshall is a man of great ability and wide experience. He was one of the great war leaders and is one of the great men of our time.

Party politics should not be used to discredit one who has served his country as General Marshall has. His selection strengthens the faith of the free peoples of Europe and Asia in the United States, as they hold General Marshall in high esteem.

The Botanist, Passaic, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON CANFIELD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, more than 75,000 copies of the Botanist, a publication by and for the employees of the Botany Mills, Inc., Passaic, N. J., are mailed monthly to people throughout the United States. Every Member of Congress receives a copy.

I wish that millions of copies of the August 1950 issue could be distributed to the Communist countries behind the iron curtain. A running story of activities in one of our country's greatest mills, it would provide a most effective answer to those seeking to malign and distort our way of life.

The August cover carries a photostatic reprint of the American's Creed by William Tyler Page, and the first story is that of the seventeenth annual picnic of Botany's Foremen's Association at Fairlawn, N. J., on August 13, when 1,500 fun-loving adults and children were entertained by the Botany band and chorus and treated to tantalizing eats, games, and prizes, the latter including a large number of television sets and household appliances.

The President's Corner is a monthly contribution by Col. Charles F. H. Johnson, who heads this great organization and in the current issue he indulges in some down-to-earth comment on troublemakers and liars. Speaking of the Russian worker, Colonel Johnson says:

In 1941 he could purchase one-tenth as much food as a United States worker, while today it is only one-thirteenth. Most Russians—live on black bread and it takes 7 weeks of a worker's full pay to buy a suit of clothes.

In other parts of the President's Corner Colonel Johnson discusses the dangers of foreign imports, the need for domestic economy as we build up our armed strength to repel aggressors, and he indulges in a tribute to the longshoremen who refused to do business with and for Russia.

The August issue is replete with pictures of the children of Botany workers and, of course, there are "shots" of Botany products and style shows. There is a special article giving information on social-security benefits and an editorial page with quotes from world leaders.

Here are just a few of the hundreds of personal items:

Gene Roehrich of the billing department has just completed a total of 22 years for Botany. Ann Anderson, of the wool shoppe, is spending a week at Atlantic City and another week at Middletown, N. Y. Altha Griffin, of the drawing department, is vacationing at New Orleans. Arthur and Eva Garand, of the twisting department, are motoring to Canada. Congratulations to a grand old couple who have been Botany employees for a long time and are now celebrating their forty-ninth wedding anniversary—Mr. and Mrs. Scheirek. Maj. Gen. Irving J. Phillipson, our director of industrial relations, has been named head of the Passaic City Civil Defense Council. Helen Mahalko and Tillie Wierzbecki are thrilled over their recent cruise to Bermuda. Carl Lombardo, of the wool store, was recently honored by an appointment to the Lodi Board of Health. The Botany baseball nine are now leaders in the City Industrial League. The Botanist's photo contest ends October 2. Charles Macek, an oiler in the engineering department, and Stanley August, foreman in the weaving yarn cellar, are proud of the record catch of 90 bluefish made by their party on a recent fishing trip off the Atlantic Highlands. Stanley Byra, office janitor, is a member of the Fiftieth Armored Division band of the National Guard and is at Pine Camp, N. Y. for 2 weeks' training maneuvers.

I congratulate the editorial staff of the Botanist, which includes Mary E. Sattan, editor and business manager; Edward Gras, sports editor; Howard Greene and John Gregory, cartoonists; Walter Carlock, staff photographer; and numerous reporters who make contributions.

Among the quotes on the editorial page is this one from Abraham Lincoln:

I like to see a man proud of the place in which he lives; and also live that the place will be proud of him.

Report to the People of the Eighth Congressional District of Wisconsin—IV

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BYRNES
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith a report to the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Wisconsin on my voting and attendance record during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress.

The report includes all record votes, quorum calls, and my votes on other important measures acted on in this session of the Congress. The purpose of this report is to collect in one place and in concise form information which is scattered through some 15,000 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It also contains information which is not obtainable from any public record but which I feel should be available to the people of my district.

The descriptions of the bills and the amendments or motions as contained in the report are for the purpose of identification only; no attempt is made to describe the legislation completely or to elaborate upon the issues involved. I believe this word of caution is advisable in view of the fact that the descriptions used are taken from the official titles of the bills which unfortunately do not always reflect the nature or true purpose of the legislation. Upon request, I will be pleased to furnish more complete information concerning any particular bill, as well as a summary of the issues involved and the reasons for my vote.

The furnishing of this report continues a service I began in the first session of the Eightieth Congress. This is the fourth report of my voting and attendance record. These four reports show how I voted on 654 issues which have been before the House of Representatives. Based on the quorum calls and the record votes, they also show an attendance record of 95 percent. The report follows:

AN EXPLANATION OF TERMS

Of necessity the report contains parliamentary and legislative terms with which the reader may not be familiar. An explanation of some of these terms may, therefore, be helpful:

A. A quorum call consists of a calling of the roll of Members to determine whether or not a quorum—a majority of Members—is present. No business may be conducted when it is found that a quorum is not present.

B. Recommittal: Generally, on all important bills, a motion to recommit the bill to a committee, with or without instructions, is voted upon by the House before it votes upon passage of the bill. If such a motion is adopted, it means that the bill will be changed, delayed, or even killed. However, when a motion to recommit is accompanied by instructions, the vote generally indicates whether the Member is in favor of or opposed to the change in the legislation proposed by the instructions and does not necessarily indicate his position on the bill as a whole. A motion to recommit with instructions, if adopted, does not kill the bill.

C. The type of bill can be determined by the letters which precede its number. All bills that originate in the House are designated by an H; those that originate in the Senate, by an S. There are four main types:

First. H. R. (S.) designates a bill which, when passed by both Houses in identical form and signed by the President, becomes law.

Second. H. J. Res. (S. J. Res.) designates a joint resolution which must pass both Houses and be signed by the President before becoming law. It is generally used for continuing the life of an existing law, or in submitting to the States a constitutional amendment, in which case it does not require the signature of the President but must be passed by a two-thirds majority of both Houses.

Third. H. Con. Res. (S. Con. Res.) designates a concurrent resolution. To become effective it must be passed by both the House and Senate but does not require the President's signature. It is used to take joint action which is purely within the jurisdiction of Congress. Many emergency laws carry the provision that they may be terminated by concurrent resolution, thus eliminating the possibility of a Presidential veto.

Fourth. H. Res. (S. Res.) designates a simple resolution of either body. It does not require approval by the other body nor the signature of the President. It is used to deal with matters that concern one House only, such as changing rules, creating special committees, etc.

D. Rule: Important bills, after approval of the committee concerned, go to the House Committee on Rules where a rule, in the form of a House resolution (H. Res.), is granted covering the amount of debate, consideration of amendments, and other parliamentary questions.

E. Conference: Representatives from both Houses of Congress meet in conference to work out differences existing in the legislation as passed by the two bodies. Upon conclusion of their conference, a report is submitted to each House setting forth the agreements reached. Each House then must act by way of adopting or rejecting the report in whole or in part.

F. Ordering the previous question: A motion to order the previous question, if adopted, shuts off further debate on the question before the House and prevents further amendments to such proposition.

G. A bill may pass, or be defeated, by one of the following kind of votes:

First. Voice vote: The Speaker first asks all in favor to say "aye," then those opposed to say "nay." If there is no question as to the result, this is sufficient.

Second. Division: If the result of the voice vote is in doubt, the Speaker asks those in favor to stand, then those opposed to stand. He counts in each instance and announces the result. If he is in doubt, or if demand is made by one-fifth of a quorum, then—

Third. Tellers are ordered. A member on each side of the question is appointed as tellers, and they take their places at each side of the center aisle. Those in favor walk through and are counted. Those opposed do likewise. The result settles most questions, but any Member, supported by one-fifth of a quorum, can ask for a roll call. This privilege is guaranteed by the Constitution.

Fourth. Roll calls place each Member on record on the particular measure involved. Each Member's name is called, and his vote recorded. Roll calls constitute the official voting record of the House. The results of the roll calls are indicated in parentheses in the record above. The "yeas" are shown first; the "nays" last.

Poland Will Rise Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, time and again I have raised my voice in protest against the unrighteous treatment that was accorded Poland at Yalta. It is a wrong that must be righted. This is our obligation as a freedom-loving nation. I expressed my views on this subject in an address I delivered at the dedication of the Polish-American Community House on Saturday, March 18, 1950, at Camden, N. J. In accordance with the request granted to me by the House, I am including that address as part of my remarks. It is as follows:

I deeply appreciate the invitation that you have given me to participate with you on this memorable occasion that means so much to your organization and the civic life of the city of Camden.

The Polish population in our city is one of the most progressive and civic minded segments of our entire population. This organization and the splendid building you have erected to carry on its activities is evidence of this fact that cannot be disputed. I congratulate you most sincerely.

As I have said on other occasions, and I repeat it now, there is no nationality that is more thoroughly embued with patriotism, love of America, and the principles upon which it is founded—liberty, freedom, justice, and equality for all—than those of Polish ancestry.

The history of Poland through the centuries and up to and including the present time demonstrates that the Polish people have always been a liberty-loving people. They have sacrificed, fought, and died in their homeland and in this land for liberty and freedom. No people have been more consistent in their attachment to the principles that underlie freedom and true democracy.

Our Nation shall ever be appreciative of the high order of your patriotism, exemplified by those two outstanding Poles—Generals Kosciusko and Pulaski—who assisted us in winning our independence. The spirit that they displayed has ever been a worthy example of the patriotism displayed by all Poles in each of our national emergencies.

The greatness of Kosciusko and Pulaski is indicative of the greatness of Poland. The spirit of these two men has always been a true example of the spirit of Poland. Wherever freedom needs a friend there you will always find Poland the first to bleed and suffer. No soil of any nation the world over is so saturated with blood shed for freedom as it is in Poland. There in that land at all times freedom had a loyal and trusting friend. Kosciusko and Pulaski are dead—but their spirit still guides Poland and its people.

Let us go back just a few years to 1938 and 1939. The whole world was afraid of a little paperhanger from Austria, then the big man of Europe. The leaders of the world licked the boots of the tyrant. They went to Munich. Chamberlain even took an umbrella with him, hoping that he might get the privilege and high honor of protecting the paperhanger from the rain. Shaking in their boots the powers of Europe appeased and fought for the favors of the big man of Europe. Even the mighty Red bear of Russia embraced the madman of Europe and plotted with him the murder of small and helpless nations.

In all the world during these tragic years, 1938 and 1939, there was only one nation and one people courageous enough to call the paperhanger's bluff. True to the spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski, the people of Poland said, "We care not what course other nations take, but as for us we shall stand up and fight. The cause of freedom is at stake. We would rather fight and die for that freedom than lick the boots of any tyrant."

How courageously the people of Poland fought is written in the records of recent years. To the last man, woman, and child they stood up. In the long struggle there could not be found in Poland a single quisling. The spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski was prevalent in the hearts, minds, and breasts of every single Pole—fighting and dying for their freedom, as well as ours.

Meeting the mightiest military power in all history, they fought on. Alone they bore the brunt of the killers of Europe. After 19 days of glorious resistance, they were stabbed in the back by one of Hitler's pals—Stalin of Russia. The bank robber of Georgia—not a Russian—and the paperhanger of Austria—not a German—were now butchering and dividing the spoils and carcass of prostrate Poland. Now Poland was attacked from both sides by two of the mightiest powers the world had ever known. Still they fought on. Still the spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski urged them on. Never in the history of mankind has there been such an exhibition of glorious courage and resistance. Poland did not get lend-lease to spur on their courage. The spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski was all the inspiration these people needed.

As members of the Polish-American Congress, you know the story full well. Poland was not a warring nation. All they had to offer was courage, life, and blood. But that was not enough to stop the bank robber of Georgia and the paperhanger from Austria. Poland was overrun and destroyed. The paperhanger enslaved the Poles in the west in labor and concentration camps and the bank robber from Georgia took the Poles from the east and sent them to Siberia.

But it takes more than murder to destroy the spirit of Poland. Enslaved and betrayed by the rest of the world, Poland still fought on. They fought harder and longer than any of the Allies of this war. A few months after Poland fell, a Polish Army was fighting in France in the Maginot line. When mighty France folded up, the Poles were the last to lay down their arms in the Maginot line. From there the Poles went to England. Six months after Poland fell, 12,000 Polish boys were flying in the British Royal Air Force. They shot down one out of every five planes during the London blitz. One of the Polish squadrons was named the Kosciusko Squadron.

The only help the Allies sent Norway was a small contingent of Polish boys and what was left of the Polish Navy. All this after Poland was destroyed and overtaken by the Red and Brown Fascists of Europe. By now Hitler was running wild in Africa. It was a group of Polish boys that gave Hitler his first defeat at Tobruk. This after Poland had been overrun. This Polish Air Force helped in the evacuation of Dunkerque. So did what was left of the Polish Navy. The spirit of Kosciusko will never be destroyed, nor will the spirit of Poland.

What American is there who does not remember the deadly battle of Monte Cassino Hill? It was a Polish general and a Polish Army that captured that murderous fortification and paved the road for the Allies on their march to Rome. Nor did Poland refuse to play a part in the invasion of Normandy. Side by side with the Allies, Polish forces marched through France, Holland, Belgium into Germany. Never in the annals of history have so few done so much for the cause of freedom and humanity. Wherever there was a fight there you found Poland. The first to resist—the first to be destroyed—yet out of the ashes of that destruction Poland contributed manpower for the air forces exceeded only by the United States and England. The first to resist and the first to be destroyed—yet Poland provided fighting troops in an amount larger than all the nations combined outside the United States, the British Empire, and Russia.

If this were all it would be more than enough. But the people who stayed in Poland—what part did they play? True to the spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski the people of Poland organized the largest and most effective underground in Europe. Every Polish man, woman, and child was a part of that underground. The Polish underground was the most effective weapon the Allies had in their march through Europe. In one uprising—the Warsaw uprising—alone, in August of 1944, 250,000 Polish men, women, and children laid down their lives. Even though betrayed by its own allies, the underground fought on. With true Kosciusko spirit, they had faith in Almighty God.

The courage and the sacrifice by Poland in this last war has no parallel in the annals of history. More than 8,000,000 of her people gave their lives. That comprises almost one-fourth of her population. When in the annals of man has any nation paid so high price for freedom? If Kosciusko and Pulaski were alive today they would be proud of their native land and its people, to whom freedom means more than life, and to whom freedom is so priceless that it can never be compromised.

But I am sad to say that there is one thing Kosciusko and Pulaski would not be proud of. I might also say that there is one thing Lincoln would not be proud of. I might add that there is one thing that decent people of the world over are not proud of. It is the shameful and unprecedented betrayal of a brave and a gallant people by its own allies.

Poland has had a sad history. It was dismembered time and again. Three times before the nineteenth century—the fourth time by a bank robber and a paperhanger in fateful September 1939. But these partitions were by enemies. That is to be expected and endured. If you, as a person, are robbed by your enemies, it is sad but understandable. However, when you get robbed by your own brother or sister, that is hard to understand, let alone endure. Yet that is what happened to Poland. It was partitioned by its brothers and enslaved by its brothers, as a result of the crime of Yalta. What a shameful reward to a brave and gallant people—a people who gave us a Kosciusko and Pulaski, and a people who gave 8,000,000 dead for the same cause for which we gave more than 300,000 dead.

Shame on us. Shame on Britain. Shame upon the world for such cowardly appeasement. Shades of Munich. Shades of Chamberlain. But Munich is a Sunday-school picnic compared to Yalta, and Chamberlin a Sunday-school teacher compared to the big men of Yalta. I say Yalta will go down in history as worse than Munich and its conspirators worse than Chamberlains.

What did Poland ask for its sacrifice? Did they ask for four or seven billions dollars from American taxpayers? No. Did they ask for the atom bomb? No. Did they ask for us to ever bail them out and rebuild Poland? No. Poland did not even ask for bread.

Then what did Poland ask? They merely asked for their own land and their own government. In the name of truth, mercy, and freedom Poland had a right to expect that simple and honorable request to be fulfilled. But the answer Poland received from one of the White House palace guards was, "You Poles are just like the Irish; you are never satisfied."

So lo and behold—all this gallant blood of Poland was shed in vain—because Poland by the acts of greedy and power-hungry men of Yalta—lies prostrate again. But mark you, fellow citizens—Poland is not this sad drama's closing act. Its tragic curtain will rise anew again and again. On Poland's gashed breast today the beast of Red communism plants his hunger and counsels what nation's breast shall next be gored. This is just the beginning. There will be more and more stupendous slaughters of the free.

To gallant Poland we can well say—as other nations fall one by one—then and only then will they know what it means to be betrayed like Poland was betrayed. When these nations fall one by one they will miss Poland. As they fall one by one and plead for mercy on bended knee—then and only then will they understand the glory that belongs to Poland.

To you members of the Polish-American Congress, I wish to say that the fall of the Polish eagle, caused by betrayal, is big with fate to man. If the New World is to begin by a broken word, it would be better not to be born. Our own strife is coming. You cannot sell out the freedom of your friends and neighbors and keep your own secure. The beast of Red communism from the ashes and blood-soaked soil of betrayed Poland shall forge the fetters and fate of our sons yet unborn. It will not be a kind fate. It will be a hideous, murderous, and shrieking fate. Today it's Poland—tomorrow it will be another—after that another, one by one, and us, too. It is nearer than you think. Someday and soon the world will understand the words, "Poland's setting star is the world's disaster-rising morn."

In conclusion, Poland, the world will someday mind how you bore the brunt of fate and how you bled for humankind. Poland, so hallowedly have you played your part that freedom-loving people everywhere have your name written on their heart. Poland, your sorrow in nobility transcends. Your conquerors' and betrayers' joy make their own cheeks blush. But shame never has and never will tinge the cheeks of Poland. Thank God that Poland never has and never will change her conscience, cause, and name for all the wealth and all that goes with a felon fame.

Poland might be dead for awhile. Poland has died before. But the spirit of Poland has never died and never will die. The spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski inspire Poland to rise again and live again as it has before. Why do I say that?

I say Poland will arise and live again, because the Polish people have a patriot's spirit, an unconquerable spirit. Just a few days ago, for instance, 50 young Polish orphans left India for the United States to seek haven in various convents in America. When they boarded the ship in India, in unison they sang "Jescie Polska nie Zginela," which means Poland is not yet lost. All the orphans of Poland, morning, noon, and night, sing in their hearts, "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 250,000 Polish troops who bled all over the world for their freedom and ours. They are now in the beet fields of Canada and in the mines of England, but morning, noon, and night, they sing "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 12,000 gallant Polish airmen scattered over the four corners of the world without a country and without a home, and morning, noon, and night, they sing "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 6,000,000 Poles in America, proud and happy citizens of our own native land, yet morning, noon, and night, they sing, "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." There are 25,000,000 Polish people being tortured under the heel of Red communism in Europe, but morning, noon, and night, in their hearts and minds are the words of the immortal Polish song "Jescie Polska nie Zginela." That is the spirit of Poland; that is the spirit of Kosciusko and Pulaski. It is an unconquerable spirit that will never die.

I say that Poland will arise and live again, because they have a profound affection for their native land. I might mention that it is an old custom in Poland that when a citizen leaves that country, his last deed is to pick up a bit of Polish soil to take with him so that it can buried with him in case he never returns to Poland. Such profound affection for a native land is unique among all people of the world.

I say Poland will arise and live again, because the Polish people everywhere have an abounding faith in Almighty God. You can steal their country and the Poles will be sad, but they will sing and pray, "There is a God." You can murder their loved ones, but the Poles will sing and pray, "There is a God." You can destroy every last segment of their nation, and the Poles will pray and sing, "There is a God."

With the immortal spirits of Kosciusko and Pulaski, with profound and everlasting love for their country, and with an abounding faith in Almighty God, Poland will arise again, and live again, and be forever free.

Tragically, but with no surprise, honest Americans now learn the sad truth that the architect who at Yalta was largely responsible for the selling out of Poland to Communist Russia, was none other than the convicted perjurer in America, Alger Hiss. Tragically, we now learn that he was the planner appointed by President Roosevelt and our State Department who had the most to say regarding the future of Poland at Yalta. Poland today is a sad victim and lies prostrate because of the work of Alger Hiss.

As Americans, we must repudiate this unrighteous work at Yalta and declare ourselves openly and loudly for a free and independent Poland. If we do not do so then the moral fiber of America has become weak. Let us show to the world that our moral fiber has not weakened, and that the true spirit of America still lives.

Communism Is a Big Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD H. VELDE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Peoria (Ill.) Star:

COMMUNISM IS A BIG ISSUE

Nothing in the administration of President Truman has proved him more wrong in judgment, in the opinion of the people, than the adoption of the Communist control bill by both Houses of Congress and by an overwhelming majority in each.

Both the Senate and the House are Democrat in majority. The President had declared his opposition to the tough legislation against Communists. But the opinions of constituents back home were obviously more important to Members of Congress than were the demands of the President and leader of their party.

President Truman has lost much public confidence through the years by his refusal to take a realistic view of American Communist activities. He could not have helped knowing that they were in high Government positions, but it was politically embarrassing to recognize their presence there, and the President, as always, placed political expedience above the greatest good of all. At any time he could have declared that he inherited a gang of Communist government employees from the Roosevelt administration, but that, too, would have cost him votes.

So President Truman chose to bluff it through. With characteristic flippance, he called the investigation of Alger Hiss a political "red herring." That wisecrack may have been the beginning of the end for Mr. Truman. Alger Hiss was convicted, only of perjury, but of perjury in such a connection that he was proved to have aided a Communist spy while Hiss held a responsible position in the State Department.

President Truman might have let the people know the truth about the shameful scandal, the Amerasia case. He chose not to. But the people were not deceived. They just lost a little more confidence in their President.

A thorough investigation of charges that Communists still wield big influence in the State Department might have contributed much, last spring, to our national security. But the President saw it as political suicide for the Democratic Party. So his hatchetmen, led by Senator TYDINGS, broke up that investigation and substituted a whitewash which protected the Reds whom all Washington knows still occupy important places in the State Department.

When it became apparent that Congress was going to give serious consideration to legislation to bring American Communists under control, President Truman was still enjoying false hopes that he had wisecracked and whitewashed Communists out of the public mind. He told Congress he would veto the stringent measures under consideration.

The answer of Congress was not only a blow to the President but was definite evidence that Communist activities in the United States are a major political issue in the 1950 elections. After the decisive action of Congress, whoever uses the hackneyed expressions, "witch hunt" and "Red baiting" is likely to evoke nothing but laughter.

The people are awake at last to the motives and methods of the Red fifth columnists in America, and not even the President can long stand against aroused public opinion.

Civil Defense Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Lexington (N. Y.) Herald of August 31, 1950:

CIVIL DEFENSE NEEDED

One day some 30 years ago, when reporters were scarce, a red-haired youth came into the office of the Lexington Herald and said he would like to have a job to work at night so he could go to school in the daytime. He was hired and went to work and completed a term at the university before other events called him away. At any rate, GORDON CANFIELD, of Paterson, N. J., is now a Republican Member of Congress, highly respected on both sides of the aisle for his intelligence and patriotism. He is worried now, as many others, about the problem of civil defense.

CANFIELD'S views are given more than passing notice. He kept on working on newspapers and studying, too, and was graduated from the New Jersey Law School, at Newark. Then he came to Washington as secretary of Representative George Segar, of Passaic, N. J., whom he succeeded. While a secretary he kept on going to school and completed law studies at National University. He has been a Member of Congress five terms and is a member of the Appropriations Committee. He was in the Signal Corps in World War I and World War II and also served in the merchant marine. He was in London during the robot blitz, was requested by General Eisenhower to make an inspection of Buchenwald and went with a congressional committee to visit Nagasaki and Hiroshima.

Today, as he points out, civil defense on the national level is headed by Dr. Paul J. Larsen, Director of Civilian Mobilization for the Security Resources Board. However, Dr. Larsen is virtually limited to authority in planning and making recommendations.

There has been much study about civil defense including the Hopley blueprint and other reports. Until a crisis developed there was very little chance to put these plans into action.

It is apparent, however, that if there is a real war of world-wide proportions this will be one of the most essential measures of defense. Even the tactics of Stalingrad wouldn't be of value in dealing with modern instruments of war.

A civil-defense plan ought to be Nation-wide in scope and coupled with the military defense program.

No doubt strong measures will be developed and in calling for them ahead of time, Congressman CANFIELD is undertaking to exercise that type of vigilance which may be necessary to protect not only liberty but life itself.

Partial Payoff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINGATE H. LUCAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Fort Worth Press of September 20, 1950:

PARTIAL PAYOFF

President Truman has asked and received the resignation of Robert N. Denham as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

That, coming just ahead of the congressional elections, is an obvious payoff to Philip Murray, William Green, and other union leaders for their political support, given in the past and avidly desired in the future, of the President and his branch of the Democratic Party.

It is, to be sure, only a partial payment.

Mr. Truman has not been able to deliver on his promise to bring about repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

That's what the union leaders really want, and want more than ever just now, since it would restore their power to enforce legalized closed shops and impose compulsory union membership on present and new workers in expanding defense industries.

AFL craft unions, in particular, used such power ruthlessly to enrich themselves in World War II. They exacted outrageously high fees and dues from workers seeking jobs on defense projects—workers who, in countless cases, got only what amounted to temporary work permits and never were given the real or theoretical benefits of full union membership.

But Mr. Truman has failed to convince many Democrats and most Republicans in Congress that the Taft-Hartley Act is as bad as he and the union leaders say. He could have had it modified, to meet reasonable objections, but he could not get it repealed and the biased Wagner Act restored.

So, as the next best thing, he has ousted Mr. Denham, whom the union leaders denounce as an enemy of labor. He tried unsuccessfully to do that a few months ago, by asking Congress to abolish the independent office of general counsel to the NLRB, in the name of Government reorganization. Now he has done it on the theory that the general counsel must be someone who will work in harmonious relationship with the NLRB's members.

When the Taft-Hartley Act became effective in 1947 Mr. Truman appointed Mr. Denham and the NLRB members and told them that, much as he disliked the new law, he wanted them to enforce it as written and as Congress intended.

Mr. Denham and the members have differed frequently, and at times bitterly, as to how the law should be enforced. The relationship certainly has been far from harmonious—but whether that was the fault of Mr. Denham or of the Board members is a quite different question.

This newspaper believes that Mr. Denham tried conscientiously and courageously to enforce the law as Congress wrote and intended it, and a preponderance of court decisions seems to support that belief.

What results from harmony between a new general counsel and the Board may please the union leaders and enhance their power. How well it will please the rank and file union members and the general public remains to be seen.

Short Memories Are Convenient

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Wall Street Journal, Wednesday, September 20, 1950:

SHORT MEMORIES ARE CONVENIENT

Sometimes people who live in glass houses insist on throwing stones.

We have in mind W. Averell Harriman. According to the United Press, Mr. Harriman let loose a political blast at Senator TAFT yesterday. The Ohio Senator shouldn't be reelected, Mr. Harriman says, because he follows policies in line with "Communist objectives."

If there is an iota of truth in this, it has escaped our attention. But we'd like to ask Mr. Harriman a couple of questions.

Who was Ambassador to Russia during the war when we were playing footsie with Joe Stalin? Who helped arrange, and who attended, such conferences as those at Yalta and Potsdam, which encouraged Russia's postwar expansion into the Far East and into western Europe?

In case you can't wait for the answer, we'll give it to you—W. Averell Harriman.

Stop Sending Material to Russia and Its Satellites That Can Be Returned in Bullets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the special committee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, investigating shipments of critical and strategic materials, I have been astounded to learn the extent of the laxity that exists in the conduct of our export control program. The investigation has demonstrated the necessity of immediately tightening up our whole control policy as well as the procedures under which it is operated.

It was the purpose of Congress in passing the Control Act to prevent the exportation from this country of all materials in short supply and which are important from the standpoint of maintaining our national security. The necessity for such a policy has been apparent for a long time. It is plain that Russia is planning and preparing for an aggressive war. That such is the opinion of the administration cannot be denied, as otherwise there would be no sense in our spending billions of dollars to strengthen the nations of western Europe. Furthermore, the Korean war is unmistakable evidence of the purpose and interest of Russia.

Under these conditions there is no other sensible policy to adopt than to stop the shipment of critical and strategic materials to Russia and its satellite countries. To do otherwise will undoubtedly bring the same results that followed our shipment of scrap iron to Japan prior to World War II. It was returned to us in the form of bullets that carried death to our American boys.

But, the strange situation that has developed as result of our investigation arises from the fact that, notwithstanding our policy not to ship to Russia and its satellites, yet, we do ship these materials to western European nations, supposed to be our friends and allies, and they in turn ship the same or similar goods of their own production to Russia, and its satellites. To what extent this has been done our committee is endeavoring to find out. The only excuse that has been offered by the Government witnesses, from the Departments of State and Commerce and the ECA who have appeared before us, is that we cannot control the policies of other nations. It seems strange to me that under the circumstances now existing, whereby we are extending billions of dollars in military aid to protect them from Russia, that we cannot even influence them to do what is so obviously necessary for their own security as well as our own.

I am inclined to believe that the reason that western European nations have carried on these practices with Russia, and the countries behind the iron curtain, and the reason we have not cracked down upon them, is because there is too much of a willingness or desire to keep open trade channels for the financial returns that follow. I am not insensible to the advantages to be gained by trade, but when it means traffic in critical and strategic materials that can later mean death to our boys then it is indefensible and those who engage in such trade are unpatriotic.

It is furthermore my opinion that the names of all persons who have facilitated traffic of this kind should not be held secret as is now being done by the departments of Government. I am hopeful that there will be a change in this policy of secrecy in the near future.

The limitations of these remarks will not enable me to give in detail the quantities and dollar value of the materials being shipped to Russia, and its satellite from western European nations. The amount is astounding. It is a general practice and seems to be on a business-as-usual basis.

It is unfortunate if we cannot stop this dangerous practice upon the part of European allies, but, that is no excuse for our not closing the loopholes in our own procedures and policies, that now make it possible for the countries of western Europe to obtain critical and strategic materials from us and pass them on to unfriendly hands. It is our duty to know where and to whom the goods are to be ultimately delivered. We should not permit critical and strategic goods to go out of this country to be sold on the open market. It is an open invitation to Russia and its satellites to buy. There should be a certification required from the exporter as to the end use to be made of the material, and, a check made by our representatives in the country to which the materials are shipped to make certain that the materials are to be used for a useful and legitimate purpose and not to be transshipped to Russia or to any nation within its orbit of influence. The matter is so important that, in my opinion, we could with propriety require the nation to whom we ship to make the certification. If we withheld shipment until such a guaranty was given, I am certain it would be given and without any great delay.

It is time for this Nation to be realistic. We cannot carry on business in critical and strategic materials as usual. The times are too critical. Our danger is too great. Let us make certain that we do not make again the same mistake we made in shipping scrap iron to Japan prior to World War II. This time let us use common sense.

Address by Hon. Robert S. Kerr, of Oklahoma, Before Oklahoma State Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, in accordance with permission heretofore granted, I submit for printing in the RECORD, an address to be delivered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] before the State Democratic Convention at Oklahoma City, Okla., on September 23, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Oklahomans, it is good to be back home "out where the sky is a little bluer; out where the sun is a little brighter; out where the hand clasp is a little warmer." It is good to be back home.

It is wonderful to be in a great Democratic convention.

I am happy to be here with the nominees of my party for our State offices. I want to pay a tribute to each and every one of them.

I want to salute our nominee for Governor, the Honorable Johnston Murray. Some Republicans have made great efforts to create doubt in our party as to his Democracy. Let us meet this issue head on.

I have personally known Johnston Murray most of the years of his life. I honor him as a working Democrat. I knew him as the chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of Kay County in 1940. I knew him as chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of the Eighth Congressional District in the early thirties. I knew him as chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of Oklahoma County in the early forties. I knew him again as a Democratic elector chosen by the Democrats of Oklahoma in 1940 and again in 1943.

I'll tell you why the Republicans are seeking to create doubt as to our nominee for Governor being a working Democrat. They are trying desperately to camouflage the fact that their nominee for the United States Senate is not and never has been a working Republican.

Proving the eligibility of Johnston Murray to walk with Thomas Jefferson is easy. Qualifying Bill Alexander to march shoulder to shoulder with Abraham Lincoln is impossible.

The Republicans in Oklahoma have chosen as their nominee for Governor a typical, reactionary Old Guard Republican. In fact, they picked the oldest and coldest they had. Bill Alexander can't find any New Deal measure he would repeal. Jo Ferguson can't find any he would keep.

We know from experience how a Governor can prevent progress in our State by fighting the development of Federal projects. I know of no man more hostile toward flood control, and the development of hydroelectric power, irrigation, and reclamation than Jo Ferguson.

During the past 8 years, the close cooperation of a Democratic State administration with a Democratic national administration has meant much to Oklahoma in the development of her natural resources.

I know this important program would be jeopardized if Jo Ferguson should become Governor of Oklahoma. The people can't afford to let that happen.

I am happy to be here today in the company of my distinguished colleagues in the United States Congress.

I want to pay tribute to one of Oklahoma's greatest Democrats, the Honorable ELMER THOMAS. We are proud of the outstanding service he has rendered our State throughout his long public career.

The man who will take his place in the United States Senate is one of Oklahoma's finest sons. He has achieved acclaim for himself and fame for his State as the very distinguished Congressman from the Fifth District, the Honorable MIKE MONRONEY.

All Oklahomans can well afford to be proud of their congressional delegation in Washington. Each one is serving his State vigorously and effectively on an important committee.

Over in the First District, where we needed a Congressman so badly for so long, a fighting Democrat, Dixie Gilmer, was elected 2 years ago. He is now serving on the Judiciary Committee. We aim to keep him there.

The Second Congressional District has long been well represented by one of our hardest working Congressmen, BILL STIGLER. He is a member of the all-important Appropriations Committee.

Down in "Little Dixie" the Democrats of the Third District are mighty well satisfied with their "Little Giant," CARL ALBERT. He is an influential member of the Agriculture Committee which handles Federal legislation affecting Oklahoma's foremost industry.

The Fourth District is ably represented by one of the outstanding first-term Congressmen, TOM STEED. He is on the Education and Labor Committee.

The Democratic nominee for Congress in the Fifth District is the very capable former State Senator, John Jarman. We will welcome him to Washington.

TOBY MORRIS will return to Congress by the overwhelming vote of the people of the Sixth District. He is a member of the Public Lands Committee and Chairman of its Subcommittee on Indian Affairs.

In the Seventh District, the genial and very active VICTOR WICKERSHAM will return to Congress as a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee.

GEORGE HOWARD WILSON has made one of the finest Congressmen the Eighth District has ever had. We are determined that he shall continue to represent them on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

I am proud to be a part of this team of courageous Democrats.

I am honored to join them in reporting the progress that has been made in the Eighty-first Democratic Congress.

We not only point with pride to its accomplishments, we pledge ourselves to still further and greater progress in what will be the Democratic Eighty-second Congress.

The attendance and spirit of this convention spike the rumors and refute the claims that the ranks of Oklahoma's Democracy are divided. Those claims have been made by Republican candidates; those rumors have been spread by Republican newspapers. They were born in Republican hopes for an otherwise unattainable victory. But, my fellow Democrats, those hopes have died aborning.

Some of our Democrats may be a little mad at other Democrats. But we are all much madder at the Republicans. It is true that the Democrats have been calling each other names, "so-and-so's" and all that, which is bad, quite bad. But listen—are you listening? The Republicans have been calling the Democrats "Socialists" and "Reds." Now they label us "Un-American." And that is worse, much worse!

Yes; a few weeks ago, on every highway, Republican billboards branded Democrats as Socialists. The storm of protest from this insult caused the Republican high command to change its strategy. They are now covering up those same billboards with signs which read: "Vote Republican—Vote American".

Who are these holier-than-thou, self-righteous paragons of patriotism who claim the exclusive right to be called Americans? Republicans have a perfect right to solicit votes on the basis of their program and for their nominees. I do not approve of either, but I would fight to preserve the rights of both.

As Democrats, we are proud of our record of devotion to our Nation. Democrats have met every test of service, fidelity, and sacrifice to our country. Whether on the field of battle or on the home front, we have fought and worked side by side with all the other tens of millions of loyal Americans. Today, we are stunned to hear Republican candidates ask the citizens of Oklahoma to vote Republican—not as Americans—but in order to qualify as Americans.

I do not believe these Republican nominees are entitled to a single vote until they have apologized for this affront to the patriotism of the people of Oklahoma.

We are here to call the Democrats to arms. This is a privilege we cherish, a responsibility we are happy to fulfill. We are not here to meet a Republican challenge. We are here to hurl a Democratic challenge to the Republican opposition.

We are here to haunt them with the record of our achievements—achievements won by the Democratic Party in spite of Republican opposition. We are here to taunt them with our purposes and plans for a brighter future—purposes which they do not comprehend—plans which they do not understand.

Yes, we are here to lay down the gage of political battle on the basis of what the Democratic Party has done and will do, and on the basis of what the Republican Party has not done and cannot do.

But while Republican leaders have mighty little to show for it, they are never idle. They can brag more and complain louder; they can whip up more fear and confusion, without justification, than any other group of political leaders I ever saw.

In this regard, I am reminded of some verses of scripture. I am sure the Republican nominee for the United States Senate will bear me no ill will if I refer to the scriptures. My acquaintance with Holy Writ is limited, but I have long known that it is both nonpolitical and bipartisan.

The rantings of the Republican leaders remind me of the first verse of the second Psalm: "Why do the heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing?"

But they cannot escape the pronouncement in the fifteenth verse of the ninth Psalm: "The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made, in the net which they hid, is their foot taken.

As I understand this majestic language, it means about the same as saying that they got caught in their own bear trap.

Let me say, my friends, that I have no personal differences with the Republican nominee for the United States Senate. I cherish him as a personal friend. I respect him as a minister of the Gospel. He had convinced me that he had been divinely called for that work. Imagine my surprise when I saw how easy it was for him to be seduced by the lure of political ambition.

When I first knew Bill Alexander was thinking about running for the United States Senate, he claimed to be a Democrat. He was asking the Democrats to send him to Washington to "liberalize the Democratic Party." The next I heard of him, he had become a Republican candidate. He now asks the Republicans to send him to Washington to "conservatize" the Republican Party.

A few months ago, Oklahoma newspapers carried the headlines that on the following Sunday, the Right Reverend William H. Alexander would advise his congregation—and the world—whether or not he would run for the Democratic nomination to the United States Senate. Many came that Sunday morning to hear the fateful decision. It was given to them. It was then dramatized and publicized as few political events in our history have been. He told the people that he had spent the long hours of the previous night on his knees in his study. He said he had wrestled with himself and prayed with the Lord until the early morning hour. He told how the Lord put his arm around his shoulder and said: "Bill, go and get into the race for the Democratic nomination to the United States Senate."

In obedience to the heavenly vision, he became a Democratic candidate. He said he was doing just what the Lord had told him to do.

Then, lo and behold, a few weeks later, the people of this State were astounded by a strange announcement from Bill Alexander. He said he had abandoned his purpose to seek the Democratic nomination as directed by the Lord. He then declared himself a candidate for the Republican nomination to the United States Senate.

Now, what Bill Alexander hasn't told, and what I challenge him to tell the people of Oklahoma is: With whom did he wrestle? With whom did he sit up all night? And whose arm was around his shoulder when he changed his mind? I know the Lord didn't change because the Bible says: "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, today and forever." Hebrews 13: 8.

Bill's refusal to do as the Lord told him reminds me of the story of Jonah. Now you know what happened to Jonah. He refused to go where the Lord told him to go. He insisted on going where he wanted to go. And old Jonah wound up in the belly of a whale! In just 3 days, he saw that he had made a terrible mistake—whereupon he repented.

At the latest report, Bill was still ignoring his divine order to seek the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate. He is still hobnobbing with the Republicans. Now I have often felt sorry for old Jonah down there in the belly of the whale, but I would a lot rather be there than in the hopeless fix that Bill is in.

Now, then, he tells us he is going to bring Roy Rogers and his famed horse, Trigger, to Oklahoma to team up with him in his campaign. That sure will be something. I can see them now—Roy Rogers, Trigger, and Bill, sweeping across the Oklahoma prairies running for the United States Senate. Now, Roy Rogers wouldn't be such a bad candidate if he had the right identification and the right affiliation. But he isn't on the ticket; he isn't even a citizen of Oklahoma.

Then, there's Trigger, and I'll say this for Trigger—he plays the part of a horse and looks and acts a lot more like a horse than Bill does like a United States Senator. But the people of Oklahoma can't vote for Trigger; we can't vote for any horse—not even a whole horse. That leaves only Bill of this barnstorming trio. And, my fellow Democrats, I don't believe the people of Oklahoma are going to vote for him.

Mr. Alexander came to Washington the other day. He was previewed by Republican Senators, interviewed by the press, and star-viewed by the women. One reporter said he talked more and said less than any candidate he ever saw. The women said he promised more and performed less than any speaker they ever heard. One Republican Senator said that Bill had the greatest wind-up, but the weakest delivery he had ever witnessed.

I heard him on the radio program, "Meet the Press." Boy, oh boy, what a wind-up. He pitched out a lot of wild and sarcastic generalities. He denounced all past legislation of the New Deal and all future plans of the Fair Deal. Then, in broad and sweeping language, he condemned them as socialism.

After the vigorous windup, the press began to call on him for delivery. They pressed him for specific answers. I never knew a man get more embarrassed. His face was redder than his hair and his generalities were down to his shoe tops.

It was soon apparent that his campaign was to create false fears and was supported only by phony phrases. He was struggling in political quicksand where it was too treacherous to stand still and too thin to walk forward. How long, oh, how long will it be before the Republican Party will nominate candidates to high office who will offer the people something except opposition to progressive legislation by calling it socialism?

I challenge the Republican nominee to the United States Senate to tell the people of Oklahoma what legislation enacted by the Democratic administrations of the last 17 years is socialistic. I dare him to tell the people of this State which of these laws he would repeal. Under withering cross-examination by the press, I heard him admit that he wouldn't repeal social security, bank insurance, unemployment insurance, slum clearance, or the TVA.

In a recent speech, he has endorsed rural electrification, and referred to what he calls his farm program. I wish time would permit me to show just how ignorant he really is about a farm program. He says he is against controls, but favors 100 percent parity. If he favors 100 percent parity, he has no business in the Republican Party. The Republican Eightieth Congress enacted a farm program providing for 60 percent of parity, not without, but with the most rigid controls of production.

He says he would make the farmers of Oklahoma free. If he had either memory of the past or knowledge of the present, he would know that Oklahoma farmers are free today—that their emancipation proclamation from poverty, privation, depression, and want was issued early in 1933 by a Democratic Congress and Democratic President.

And what a contrast their freedom of today is to the freedom they knew during the 12 long years from 1921 to 1933. They were free then—free to sell their cotton for 4 cents a pound; free to sell their oats for 10 cents a bushel, their corn and wheat for 20 cents. They were free to mortgage everything they had to try to buy meat and bread for their families. They were free to pay up to 25 percent interest on the money they borrowed. Then, when their ability to borrow was exhausted, they were free to starve to death without the slightest interference from a Republican Congress or a Republican President.

"Stop, look and listen!" All of our farmers are keenly aware of how they have prospered in these 17 years of Democratic administrations.

In 1930, Oklahoma's total farm income was less than $150,000,000. In 1945, it had grown to $457,000,000; in 1949, it was very close to $700,000,000. Mr. Alexander, we dare you to tell Oklahoma farmers that this is un-American.

In 1933, just a bare fraction of the farm families in Oklahoma were blessed with electric service. Today, over 60 percent of them have been rescued from drudgery and darkness through rural electrification. And it is our purpose to expand this program until the lights shine and electricity is working in every farm home.

Is that socialistic, Mr. Ferguson?

Before 1933, Uncle Sam never did anything about conserving and rebuilding the soil. Today, Oklahoma farmers and ranchers have 81 soil-conserving districts which cover all of our State except small portions of two counties. And the Eighty-first Congress has stepped up and broadened this program.

Until a few years ago, Uncle Sam never tried to help the farmers get out of the mud. Since 1944, one dollar out of every three of Federal highway aid has been spent on farm-to-market roads. In August of this year, a Democratic Congress provided for an even better farm-to-market road program. This was accomplished in spite of bitter Republican opposition.

Is this socialism, or un-American, Mr. Ferguson?

And my fellow Oklahomans, thanks to a Democratic majority, the Eighty-first Congress has a proud record of service to all the people.

It has moved with wisdom and courage to meet the needs of peace and the requirements of war.

Among the outstanding accomplishments, in addition to those already mentioned, are the following:

A better farm program, including higher price supports for Oklahoma crops, more adequate crop storage space, and a vast expansion of rural telephones;

An expanded social security covering an additional 10,000,000 people and providing greater benefits to those already covered;

Constructive school aid legislation;

The most comprehensive urban and rural housing program in the Nation's history;

Authority to the President to reorganize and streamline executive departments and agencies for greater efficiency and economy;

Legislation increasing minimum wages from 40 to 75 cents an hour;

The finest legislation in history for the development of our natural resources. This includes much that is vital to Oklahoma. Authority for the comprehensive survey and planning for the Arkansas-White and Red River Basins is just a part of what was done for Oklahoma;

More adequate provision for veterans and their surviving dependents;

More substantial allowances to families of servicemen;

An expanded military preparedness program that will make this Nation impregnable;

Bold but sound legislation to enable our country to secure and develop that cooperation with other free nations which gives us the best possible chance for world peace;

An integral security law that will enable us to prevent and stamp out the growth or expansion of any Communist or other subversive effort here at home.

Listen, Bill Alexander, and you, Jo Ferguson—Are you listening? Are these measures socialistic or un-American? If so which one? My fellow Oklahomans, it is time for these Republican nominees to "put up or shut up!"

We will never forget 1932 when there were more than 14,000,000 Americans seeking jobs that did not exist and work that could not be found. Thirty-two thousand small businesses went bankrupt in that one year. Literally thousands of banks closed their doors. The American economy collapsed. This Nation was driven to its knees in depression and despair. These things we suffered under the Republicans

Today, after 17 years of Democratic administration, we are the most prosperous Nation on the earth. The number of gainfully employed has increased from 38,700,000 in 1932 to 62,400,000 today. Our national income has risen from $39,000,000,000 in 1932 to something like $250,000,000,000 today. I cannot remember when a bank has failed in Oklahoma, during these years, where the depositors lost a penny. And yet, Republican nominees are now asking the people to vote against the party that has brought these things about.

What reason do they give? They say they are against socialism. They are against the Fair Deal. They want the people to vote against the New Deal. They claim they want you to vote "American".

There is nothing new in this Republican bid for support. All they want to do is take over and operate that which they had neither the vision to plan nor the ability to construct. It's the same old version of the same old Republican song. They sing it at every election. It goes like this: "Anything you can do, I can do better; anything you can sing, I can sing louder; I can sing anything louder than you."

I have heard of "free wheeling" for a number of years, but what the Republicans are trying to give the people of Oklahoma is nothing but "free spieling."

They have grown fat in a prosperity they could not create. They are secure in an economy they do not understand and which they constantly predict will soon collapse.

From the citadel of this abundance, Republicans continue to hurl their smoke bombs and tear gas, smoke bombs of confusion, tear gas of opposition.

The people don't mind these smoke bombs or the tear gas. But, the Republican Old Guard, finding out how ineffective these two weapons are, have recently devised another which is even less worthy. They have now begun to use stink bombs.

One was exploded a week ago yesterday on the floor of the United States Senate by Republican Senator WILLIAM JENNER of Indiana. I heard this Republican Senator slander one of the greatest Americans of all time. In my book there is no finer patriot than Gen. George C. Marshall. And yet I heard this Republican Senator actually call General Marshall "a living lie and a front for traitors."

Since the President named Marshall as Secretary of Defense, I know every American fighting man feels more confident. I know their families, without exception, feel more secure. One hundred and fifty million Americans were thrilled when the news was flashed that George Marshall was back at the helm. And yet, Republican Senators voted 2 to 1 against the bill to permit the President to bring him back.

All this demonstrates how low they will stoop to oppose and smear the Truman administration in a vain effort to gain their own selfish, political ends.

A few years ago these same men were hurling criticism at another Democratic captain. They persecuted him, too. The harder he worked the more vicious were their false charges. I said then, and in the light of the proof of passing years, I repeat now: The greatest President since Lincoln, the most courageous humanitarian of our time, democracy's most intrepid and peerless leader in a hundred years, was Franklin D. Roosevelt.

When he died the mantle of leadership passed to the shoulders of another. He is a man of humility but he is as brave as he is humble. Sure, he has made mistakes, even as you and I. I have seen him veto bills that should have been signed. I have seen him sign bills that should have been vetoed. I have heard him speak when he should have been silent; I have seen him silent when he should have spoken. But I want to say to you that one of the most courageous, loyal, patriotic Americans I have ever known is that stout-hearted man from Missouri, President Harry S. Truman.

The good thing about Harry Truman is that most of the time he is right. The awful thing about the Republican leadership is that most of the time they are wrong.

The Jenner stink bomb was their worst. Others nearly as bad had been set off by MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin, and SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas.

But, none of these stink bombs hurled by a desperate opposition has damaged the Democrats. They only reflect on the Republicans who throw them. Their odor lingers on.

My fellow Oklahomans, there are solemn decisions ahead. One will be made by the people of Oklahoma on November 7.

The people know that the Democratic Party has served them best, both in peace and in war.

The Democratic Party seeks their support on the basis of its record of service.

Under Democratic leadership we are today doing what we failed to do after World War I. Woodrow Wilson believed that the League of Nations could prevent another World War. The Democratic Party believed that the welfare of our country and the peace of the world required responsible cooperation between peace-loving nations to prevent aggression. The Democratic Party was defeated, however, and the hope for the League of Nations was shattered.

That which we had failed to prevent moved in to haunt us. The aggression that we failed to kill while it was yet aborning forced World War II upon us. It reached such awful proportions as to threaten our very existence as a Nation. All of our strength and that of our Allies was required, and we succeeded then only after the most heroic and sacrificial effort in history.

Sadder but wiser, we said it must never happen again. We resolved to profit by the mistakes of the past and so we led in the creation of the United Nations. Its only purpose is to prevent aggression and conquest. Its only aim is to achieve peace. Its only goal is to help build a world in which all nations, including our own, may develop their own security and promote their own prosperity. It is the servant of its members. We will keep it so. We will never permit it to become a world government nor any other kind of government.

The events of our lifetime have proved that this Nation cannot secure these priceless objectives alone. Isolationism is as dead as King Tut, and not nearly as well preserved. Either, we work within the United Nations and make it work for all its members, or we face the constant threat of war, without any hope for peace.

We are today engaged in a mighty effort to make the United Nations succeed. Within the framework of the United Nations, we are helping to wage the Korean war. Our fighting men march under two flags—under the stars and stripes of Old Glory, and under the globe and olive branch of the United Nations. Our purpose is to prevent aggression, if possible. Failing that, we are determined to stop it where it starts.

My fellow Oklahomans, do not ever lose sight of this fact. The United States of America is the most coveted prize spurring the greedy and avaricious lust in every aggressor in this world. It matters not what devious trails the men in the Kremlin and their partners in crime may travel, their ultimate goal—yes—their prime objective is to seize and plunder the fabulous riches of America.

Here is where man's hope for a better way of life has found its finest fulfillment. And if we would avoid the terrible task of meeting and stopping aggression on our own shores, we must stop it beyond the seas.

This will require eternal vigilance and complete unity of physical resources, mental effort, and spiritual strength. This will require sacrifice and devotion higher than we have ever known.

But, by doing this, we will be working for ourselves and not for foreign masters. Our sacrifices will be to preserve our security, not to enrich those who would conquer us. Our sacrifices will be those of free-men and not of slaves.

As we look into the future and understand the tasks ahead we feel a deep humility, but no fear. We have the confidence which comes from the knowledge that our party has kept the faith.

We know our cause is just.

We know our purpose is right.

On November 7 we choose our leaders for the years just ahead.

We have achieved our present security and prosperity under democracy's banner.

Under Democratic leadership, we have won two World Wars and are now winning the present world-wide struggle against the powers of darkness.

Under that proud Democratic banner and with that peerless leadership America can and will move ever upward and onward.

Let Us Not Accept the Theme That Bigness in Industry Is Within Itself Bad, and That Bigness Means Monopoly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a double-edged campaign is being carried forward throughout the world today to destroy individual freedom. One phase of this campaign is easily recognized—the direct, physical attack which our boys are so courageously meeting and repulsing in Korea. The other phase—while just as dangerous to individual liberty—is not so easily recognized or understood. It is the indirect attack upon the minds of the people and is based upon the anti-Christian principle that if you repeat a lie often enough, some people will accept it as truth, regardless of all evidence to the contrary.

An example of this is the oft-repeated charge that unless we curb the power of big business monopolists in this country, free enterprise will be destroyed and the American worker will be enslaved in an imperialist Fascist state controlled by the big-business monopolists.

Such a charge is, of course, predicated on the belief that big-business monopoly already exists in this country. If this is true—and it remains to be proved—then it can only exist because of the failure of the antitrust division of the Department of Justice to enforce existing antitrust statutes.

In my 30 years as a Member of the United States House of Representatives, I have been a consistent foe of all types of monopoly—whether big business, big government, or big union monopoly. A subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee conducted lengthy and exhaustive hearings into the question of the existence of a big-business monopoly in this country.

An impartial study of those hearings will establish that no evidence—acceptable in any court in this country—was produced to prove that a big-business monopoly now exists in this country.

In spite of this, the charge is repeatedly dinned into our ears that "we must take immediate steps to curb monopoly in this country or free enterprise will be destroyed and the workers will be enslaved by the monopolists."

Considering this oft-repeated, unsubstantiated charge, I wish to call the attention of the House to an article by Willard Edwards published in the Washington Times-Herald for September 20, 1950. In this article, Mr. Edwards exposed the new program of the American Communist Party as laid down by its Chairman, William Z. Foster, in an article written by Foster and published August 11, 1950, in the official organ of the Communist Cominform, the Soviet propaganda agency. In that article, Foster, according to Mr. Edwards, wrote:

> It must be solidly emphasized that our [American Communist Party] orientation is for a people's front government stated in terms adapted to American conditions. The trade-unions and every other organization of the workers and their allies would have to throw their whole strength into the struggle for a people's front.
> One of the most important factors is the development of a deep economic crisis. It is possible in the United States, during such a time, to elect a coalition, anti-Fascist, anti-imperialist government. A people's front party would have to orientate to the left or it would be destroyed. It would be compelled to attack monopolists in their economic military, and political spheres.
> It would have to orientate toward nationalization of banks and industries, breakup of big landholdings, the beginning of a planned economy, elimination of reactionaries from all State institutions. Such a people's front government operates within the framework of the bourgeois state, curbing the power of the monopolists.

And American Communist Party Chairman Foster closes his new policy pronouncement with this dire warning:

> Eventually, the Soviet army must play the decisive role.

Again, from the September 1950 issue of Intelligence Digest, published in London and recognized throughout the world as an authority on secret plans and programs of the Soviet, we are told that orders have been issued from Moscow to all teachers in schools in satellite countries behind the iron curtain to continually and consistently preach to their students that American workers are the slaves of big-business monopolists and the Communist world revolution cannot meet with complete success until the power of American monopolists is curbed.

Is this, then, the real source for this demand to "curb monopolists" in this country?

Let us remember that our one great secret weapon which has helped us win two world wars and which is helping our boys in Korea to win that battle for individual freedom is our mass production system. That system is entirely dependent upon the coordinated activity of the three great components of our free enterprise system—little business, medium business, and big business. Destroy any one of these three components and you destroy our secret weapon—our mass production system—which is so greatly respected and feared by the Communists. Let us not be tricked—by lying propaganda—into helping the Communists, the enemies of individual liberty—to destroy one important component of our mass production system—big business. Let us not accept this un-American theme that bigness is, within itself, bad, and that bigness means monopoly.

Upholsterers' Union's Fine Resolutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of the House two resolutions adopted by the general executive board of the Upholsterers' International Union, AFL. It seems to me that they are timely, forceful, and constructive expressions of the best American trade-union sentiment. They deserve very wide circulation both in America and overseas.

The resolutions follow:

RESOLUTION OF WARNING ON PHONY COMMUNIST PEACE PETITION FOR DUPES

Whereas the launching of fully armed and long prepared military aggression by the North Korean puppets of Stalin's Communist Russia on June 25, 1950, clearly shows that the Communist dictatorship of Russia has taken up the course of world domination by deception, infiltration, and military violence in which Stalin's one-time ally Hitler died amid world-wide destruction and bloodshed only 5 years before; and

Whereas the world-wide Communist fifth column for paralysis by propaganda, disruption, and sabotage of the free world, maintained by the Russian Communists under the form of National Communists Parties ever since it overthrew the only democratic government ever to exist in Russia, has now swung into action along with the North Korean puppet troops; and

Whereas one of the main Communist efforts now in operation in the United States is the fraudulent world peace appeal, launched on the world by the international Communist apparatus of the World Committee in

Defense of Peace in Stockholm in March of 1950 and in the United States by the Daily Worker and assorted stooges on May 1 and directed through a so-called peace information center in New York; and

Whereas the sole purpose of this petition is to distract the attention from Stalin's armed aggression by protesting the possible use of atomic weapons, the only field in which the Communist dictatorship has not built up overwhelming superiority over the free world, which mistakenly rushed to disarm after the death of Stalin's one-time pal Hitler; and

Whereas those subscribing to this fraudulent world peace appeal petition are consciously or unconsciously making themselves part of the Communist enemy's sabotage and conquest apparatus: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the general executive board of the Upholsterers' International Union of North America directs this resolution to the attention of the officers, members, families, employees, and friends of the union and asks their cooperation in exposing this Communist maneuver and its sinister purpose and in taking appropriate action against any sponsor of such petition; and be it further

Resolved, That in accord with the mandate of our twenty-sixth biennial convention, this general executive board endorses the bill proposed by Congressman WALTER, of Pennsylvania, for complete registration of Communists and their organization in the United States and directs our political education department to consult with friendly political leaders on the possible State and Federal legislation for complete registration, identification, and disclosure of the source of financial and other support by all organizations seeking to influence public opinion in our free and open society in accordance with the recommendations of the 1947 report of the President's Commission on Civil Rights.

RESOLUTION OF APPROVAL AND SUPPORT OF OUR GOVERNMENT AND THE UNITED NATIONS IN KOREAN CRISIS AND SOVIET COMMUNIST WAR ON PEACE AND ALL FREE PEOPLES

The general executive board of the Upholsterers' International Union in its August 1950 quarterly meeting on behalf of the union members in the United States and Canada expresses its unanimous and enthusiastic support of their governments and the United Nations in their prompt action to meet with force and truth the military attack of the Communist aggressors upon the Republic of Korea and upon the peace of the world in June of this year.

We recognize that this is only the beginning of the post World War II open military phase of Communist aggression against the peace, resuming the stage reached once before in the attacks on Poland, Finland, and the Baltic countries when the Russian dictatorship was the open ally of its brother Nazi dictatorship of Hitler in 1939 and 1940, and that the Soviet regime has been conducting its cold war against world peace and order since it denounced its peace treaty with Turkey in 1945 before the end of World War II and entered upon the imperialist course of the czars on a round-the-world scale.

We pledge our support to our governments and the United Nations in the enduring effort to control the effort of Stalin and his evil Communist Party machine dictatorship to make themselves the heirs and assigns of Hitler and we will support governments in every necessary and effective measure to preserve the peace in the greatest possible measure until the Communist dictatorship dies and its fanatical forces disperse as did those of Genghis Khan and all the bloody imitators of the great conquerors and murderers to this date.

We recognize that the curbing of the present-day conqueror can only come with the organization of preponderant force through the instrumentality of the United Nations representing all the free and independent nations of the world and such subordinate alliances of the free countries such as the North Atlantic Pact and Pan-American Defense Union. We solemnly recognize further that until the aggressor is so overawed, or if he resorts to full-scale war, destroyed, that we as citizens of free nations must make the sacrifices necessary to rearm and live in at least a semiwar economy for possibly 10 or more years ahead. We believe most earnestly that given plain-spoken and vigorous leadership such as that given by President Truman to the United States and other free countries in the United Nations upon the launching of the North Korean attack in June, the people of the democracies like ourselves will make the sacrifice and exert the self-discipline required to win the peace and the freedom which alone makes peace permanent and worth having.

Democracy to win the peace with freedom requires only that the principle of equality of sacrifice be put at center of all special armament and defense measures and the overwhelming majority given leadership and the always selfish and profiteering few the minimum of coercion required to gain success in the greatest common enterprise of all time, world peace, and order with freedom.

Facing a world in which the aggressor dictatorship of communism has temporarily acquired military superiority in every arm except atomic power, we urge upon our countrymen and the freemen of the world in the great contest and sacrifices ahead the mighty spirit of John Dickinson of Pennsylvania's proud boast to a nearly defeated Continental Congress here in Philadelphia—that "our towns may be destroyed, but they will grow again. We compare them not with our rights and liberties." Only a determination to prefer death to loss of liberty in the literal sense of Patrick Henry can win the peace for the free world in 1950.

We respectfully submit this resolution of our principles and desires to our President and Members of Congress and to the Ambassador of Canada for transmission to his government on behalf of our Canadian members and to our members for their certain ratification in action to our Nation's political leaders in this crisis that tries men's souls again.

Our Social-Security System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, one of the outstanding achievements of this Eighty-first Congress is the enactment of a law expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This law extends security in their old age to 10,000,000 additional Americans as a matter of their earned right, not as a matter of charity or a public dole. It raises social-security benefits to conform with higher costs of living.

I believe that our social-security system should be extended even further, so as to cover all working men and women. But the new law passed by the Eighty-first Congress is a great step forward, and I was glad to cast my vote for it.

In view of the widespread interest in this law I think it will be helpful to set forth the changes in our social-security system which it brings about.

MAJOR CHANGES SUMMARIZED

Summarized in a few sentences, the major changes are:

First. Larger benefits: The people of Illinois now receiving social-security payments will find that in the checks to be mailed out October 3 their benefits will be, on the average, roughly, 75 percent greater than they have been. For those who will retire after June 1952 benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

Second. Broader coverage: On January 1, 1951, many Illinoisans who up to now have not been covered by social security will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm, self-employed persons in business for themselves, such as grocery-store, retail-store, or gas-station owners, will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Third. Easier eligibility: In general, it will take fewer years of social-security coverage before you are eligible to draw benefits. Specifically, persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of social-security coverage can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker as well as survivors and dependents will be able to earn $50 a month as against the present limit of $15—without losing their benefit payments.

Here, in more detail, are the answers to questions I think will be of most general interest:

HOW MUCH LARGER BENEFITS?

First, how much larger will benefits be under the new law? Benefit increases will go to two main groups of people: (a) those who are currently receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952. These are called new starts. Let me explain more fully how the new bill affects each of these groups.

IMMEDIATE INCREASE AVERAGE SEVENTY-SEVEN AND ONE-HALF PERCENT

There are approximately 188,828 people in the State of Illinois who are now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October—their September payments—they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple:

An Appeal to President Truman To Revive American Shipbuilding Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the situation with respect to the shipbuilding industry of this country has become so serious that I have communicated directly with the President. I have brought to his attention the distressing condition resulting as a result of 3,000 workers being laid off at the Camden, N. J., yard of the New York Shipbuilding Co. I have emphasized the importance of having a long-range shipbuilding program to provide continuity of employment, as otherwise skilled workers are lost to the shipbuilding industry. We cannot afford to let this happen as it seriously weakens our defense effort in times of emergency.

My letter to the President reads as follows:

SEPTEMBER 23, 1950.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of United States,
White House,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I wish to call to your attention the distressed condition of the shipbuilding industry in this country. Many shipyards that have had long and honorable careers in ship construction are closed and the workers disbanded.

Last week 1,000 skilled workers were laid off at the New York Shipbuilding plant at Camden, N. J. This week 2,000 more have been laid off. This is a serious matter from the standpoint of the distress it brings to the discharged workers and their families. It is likewise serious from the standpoint of our national defense. It takes time and effort to build up an efficient shipbuilding organization of skilled workers. Such an organization cannot be gotten together overnight. Consequently, when such a force is disbanded it is a serious blow to our national security when an emergency, such as the present Korean incident, comes upon us without warning.

Giving full consideration to the present necessity for an expanded shipbuilding program, it seems strange to me that it has become necessary at this time to lay off 3,000 shipworkers at the Camden yard of the New York Shipbuilding Co., either because of change of plans, lack of plans, or policy for a long-range shipbuilding program.

May I respectfully call to your attention that foreign shipyards are busy, even in Japan. I am informed there are 17 shipyards busily engaged there in building ships. At the same time our shipyards are closed, or shortly will be, if work is not provided.

I am bringing to your attention the distressing situation that presently exists at Camden, N. J., as an illustration of what is happening, or, has already happened, throughout our country. I appeal to you to take immediate remedial action through appropriate departments of Government to the end that there be an immediate resumption of shipbuilding, and the adoption of a long-range program that will prevent the feast-and-famine condition that has heretofore and presently exists in the shipbuilding industry.

I am enclosing with this letter copies of the remarks I have made in the Congress during the last few days relating to the conditions existing at Camden, N. J., at this time, and, also copy of Courier-Post editorial, issue of September 18, 1950, that is one of the strongest and most logical appeals for a realistic shipbuilding program that it has been my privilege to read.

I will deeply appreciate your giving this matter your earliest consideration to the end that relief may be speedily granted.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,
Respectfully yours,

CHARLES A. WOLVERTON,
Member of Congress.

General Mobilization in France Is Reported To Be Impossible at the Present Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the translation of an ominous article appearing in the De Gaullist Weekly Carrefour on the military position of France. I am among those who believe we ought to take the risk of endeavoring to strengthen the forces in western Europe that are still free. But we ought to be fully aware of the desperate gamble that is involved. The translation of the article follows:

GENERAL MOBILIZATION IN FRANCE IS IMPOSSIBLE AT THE PRESENT TIME

(By Albert Palle)

Thunder strikes. Simultaneously, the U. S. S. R. invades Norway whose coasts she wants to control, and Turkey in order to close the Black Sea. At the same time, she strikes at the center. The Communist armies of Poland, eastern Germany, and the Soviet armored divisions roll toward the West. All the pacifist masks of the "peace-fighters" are being discarded. This is general war.

This is not a foolish hypothesis. The war in Korea proves it. Invasion threatens the French territory once more. Within 2 years. Within 6 months. Tomorrow, perhaps. And if it came tomorrow, what would we do?

WHERE ARE OUR SOLDIERS?

Mr. Auriol would surely issue a proclamation. He would say, "I have given orders that the land, sea, and air forces proceed to meet the aggressor." This is the best that may be said under the circumstances, and it is close to what Mr. Truman said after the Communist aggression in Korea. And afterwards? The ministers will be looking at each other in surprise. "Armies," they will say, "what armies?"

"But, yes," the Minister of National Defense will answer, "armies I do have, and you'll see, I am going to give them their order." But he will also make a retreat. "By golly," he will say, "I forgot. We don't have a chief of staff of the armed forces. To whom shall I give my orders? There is going to be jealousy." He will ring for the guard and hiss at him: "Tell them to mobilize." The guard will do his best.

There will be posters. "How; what?" the French will cry. "Where are we? Indeed, only yesterday my deputy told me that butter is more valuable than guns. Help! How about our benefits, and our salaries, and social justice, and Christian charity, and Aunt Mary's money-marriage?" "My poor man, it's all over so far as Aunt Mary is concerned; some of the Red-Star Kalmucks have taken her as their girl friend. * * *"

Then the French will let out another big yell: "Our soldiers, where are they?" But only one cavernous voice will answer them, the sinister echo of a well-known voice, that of Mr. Ramadier: "We have accomplished the minimum. Soldiers? There aren't any. They cost too much."

This is the truth: On July 25 of this year we have no national defense. The way things are going, there is no indication that we shall have one by next Easter or by next Trinity Sunday.

SWITZERLAND SPENDS MORE ON HER DEFENSE THAN WE DO

We shall have spent 420,000,000,000 [francs] this year for national defense, not to mention the additional appropriations for investments. But these amounts do not have the relative importance which is customarily ascribed to them.

Since 1946 the progress in military expenditures has been the following:

	Billions
1946	185
1947	245
1948	312
1949	388
1951	500

But as of 1950, if the percentage point of military expenditures used to be 2.1, that of the budgetary expenditures has gone up to 2.46, and the retail price index to 2.84. The proportion of the military expenditures is, then, less today than in 1946. Since the liberation our military expenditures have decreased:

According to the report on budgetary expenditures: from 33 percent to 26 percent;

According to the report on public expenditures: from 33 percent to 20 percent;

According to the report on the national income: from 6 percent to 4.5 percent.

The supplementary 80,000,000,000 foreseen by Mr. Pleven for 1951 will not in any way upset this development. They will not permit the strengthening of the military potential, but only cover the costs of wage and price increases.

Let us remember, for purposes of comparison, that in the United States, before the Korean war, the percentage of the military expenditures, according to the report on public expenditures, was 33 percent, and according to the report on the national income, 7 percent. Today, these figures have risen to 75 percent. The American military budget is over five times the total French budget.

In fact, we have never spent less on our defense, except in 1924, 1925, and 1926. The smallest country behind the iron curtain spends relatively more than we do. We spend much less than Switzerland, Spain, Yugoslavia.

ONLY NINE DIVISIONS

What forces do these insufficient sums permit us to maintain? In 1950, the active members of the land, sea, and air forces total 598,028 men, to which should be added 52,000 gendarmes. The 47,000 members of the R. S. C. (Republican Security Company) are not considered as belonging to the army but fall under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of the Interior.

The army proper comprises 310,000 men stationed in France, north Africa, Germany, and Austria. Another 174,000 men are based in overseas territories, 131,000 of whom are fighting in Indochina.

The number of fighting men available in Europe and Africa hardly permit the formation of nine divisions (French type) which are supposed to have an active soldier contingent of 332,000 men.

In fact, this active soldier contingent is even smaller than it appears to be. If the period of service under the law is twelve months and a half, it has, in effect, for budgetary reasons been reduced to six months and a half. On the other hand, exemptions, dispensations, permissions, have to date been handed out in a miraculously liberal manner. As late as 1948, there were 85,000 exemptions for a contingent of 340,000 men. This year the Assembly voted the dispensation from (active) service for conscripts classified as "auxiliary service." This law deprives the army of 6,000 men able to fill desk and maintenance jobs. And what is one to say about this measure, unanimously approved by the Committee on National Defense, excusing from service the oldest sons of abandoned unwed mothers?

What weapons do these land forces have? Until a few months ago they used the leftovers of the armaments of the first army. Last year Mr. Max Lejeune bought 37 used (armored?) cars which were stored in Belgium. After modernizing these cars we should have at our disposal today 440 medium- and light-weight cars dating from the last war. This old war matériel is divided among two armored and three infantry divisions. In principle, the new American matériel should permit us this year to begin to reequip these five divisions with new armaments. Four others would receive the old matériel of the former. Let us mention, however, that according to the report on provisions, the shipment of the American arms is very much delayed. On the other hand, since the equipment of one armored division costs eighty billions, we receive, in principle, only one hundred and fifty billions [worth] of new armaments in 1950. It is doubtful that under these conditions it is possible to arm five divisions effectively with new equipment within the prescribed time limit.

Does our manufacturing industry develop at such a rate so as at least to compensate for the inadequacy of the American armaments? But only 27 percent of the credits are earmarked for war matériel. From 1949 to 1950 there were cuts to 30 percent on certain items, notably for manufactured goods whose "programs," according to the spokesman for an assembly committee, "are cut to pieces."

What kind of weapons do we manufacture? For our land forces, only light weapons. However, according to Mr. Pleven, models should be ready "within a few weeks." We should also have a good automatic "Panhard" machine gun, a tank destroyer, a heavy, 50-ton car, and various light weapons. But it really wasn't models of which there was talk already last September. Their manufacture has not been undertaken.

It is undoubtedly the insufficiency of the key skeleton organization which constitutes the most sorrowful aspect of our military distress. The defeat of 1940, the bondage, the split in the army which resulted from the loyalty of some to Marshal Pétain and of the rallying of others around General de Gaulle and the resistance, the purge which no doubt affected tens of thousands of career officers, the lack of equipment of the regimental staffs—all these factors have caused a grave crisis in the key skeleton organization. A single example will go a long way.

At Saint-Cyr, before the war, there were four candidates for one position. Today, there are less than two candidates. Also, certain specialists say, the niveau of Saint-Cyr has fallen very low, below the B. S. (bachelor of science). In fact, the élite elements who had always been present in the army no longer suffice to raise the average level.

As concerns the noncommissioned officers, the crisis is still more serious. Their salaries are at starvation levels. The long-term enlistments continued to dwindle until 1949. In the meantime, according to Mr. Plevin, the total long-term enlistments this year have risen to 2,688, as over against 2,100 in 1948. But this slight improvement does not make disappear the Army's grave lack of noncommissioned officers and career soldiers.

Under these circumstances it is easy to understand that the training of the troops can only be mediocre; not to say, impossible. In other words, the mode of incorporation obstructs all effective organization of training. The contingent is, in effect, incorporated in two sections, half a contingent every 6 months. As 3 months are required to give the troops basic training, it is the result of this system that over a period of 1 year the active trained force varies from single to double [training]. These variations involve inevitable disorders in the appropriations and a serious lowering of efficiency in training. Finally, there is no longer a uniform doctrine to which the instructors on all levels may refer.

The weakness of the contingent, and therefore of the armed forces immediately available, is extremely obvious. Can we, in turn, count on a large number of properly trained and key reserves? The situation is still more serious in that field.

Outside of the small armistice army of the forces of the fighting French, of those of the First French Army, the classes that became eligible for service between 1940 and 1946 received no training other than sometimes very cursory training in the Maquis. There has been no training of reservists since 1940. The Government is only now beginning to set up programs to remedy this situation. In fact, all training of reserves is impossible within the framework of the present credits for military expenditures.

Likewise is mobilization impossible today. No doubt there are mobilization plans in existence. They are pure abstraction. Without adequately trained reserves, without weapons, without equipment, without key units (cadres), the mobilization can only be effected on paper.

To top this memorial—a triple flop. There is no chief of staff on whose person the parties have been able to agree. Today there exists a civilian secretariat of national defense, and a military secretariat which is a staff committee without a chief. Since the liberation, no government has been able to force approval of a law on the organization of the national defense. No law on the programs, key units, active service, has been voted. In other words, there is no French military policy nor an organization of the armed forces possible. And the political powers are chiefly responsible for our military flop.

THE LEAST EFFORT

The training period under the law is 12½ months. In England, it is 18 months. The first step in strengthening the military would involve the doubling the time of service. It has been rumored that the French Government would favor this measure. The Minister of National Defense flatly denied this.

IMPACT OF THE WAR IN INDOCHINA ON THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

We maintain 174,000 men overseas, 135,000 of whom are in Indochina. The latter are all volunteers. The war in Indochina deprives the French army of its best elements. Furthermore, the replacements draw a great number of career key units (cadres) from our metropolitan units. The key organization of the metropolitan forces and their training are in a state of disorganization.

The growing of the active forces in Indochina has resulted in a reduction in the active forces in the other territories. In Madagascar they will be cut in half within 2 years, the A. O. F. (East African Corps) by 20 percent.

As to the four hundred and twenty billions in budgetary credits, one hundred and forty billions are absorbed by overseas France, 85 percent of which are reserved for Indochina.

It might be emphasized that France has been able to find 135,000 volunteers for the fight in Indochina. That is a remarkable result. And yet, the moral isolation of those fighting soldiers is deplorable. Insulted by the Communists, suspected by the Socialists, in no way protected by the government forgotten by the nation, their sacrifice is great. Every year there is a starlight county fair for the second D. B. (Armored Division) who have certainly deserved this (expression of appreciation) for their country. But what is done for the soldiers of Indochina?

MISERABLE PAY

The army pay is the same as in 1939. A soldier's pay is 6 francs per day, plus a tobacco allowance which, in effect, raises the pay to 12 francs per day. In grade 1 (an officer's) candidate with more than 5 years of service gets close to 17,000 francs a month; a sergeant, 11,000 francs. These figures speak for themselves.

THE ACME OF ANARCHY

"We have come to know, successively, a combination of the Minister of the Armed Forces and Minister of Armament. Then we have come to know a Minister of National Defense with an Undersecretary of State for (War) Matériel. Then we have come to know a Minister of National Defense with two Secretaries of State" (statement of a deputy of the majority).

CONDEMNATION OF A SYSTEM

"Experience has taught me that in spite of all the good will of the chiefs of government, for them the task of national defense is not the first order of business" (statement of a deputy of the majority).

AN ELECTION SLOGAN

Everyone repeats it in the assembly, in the press, in the streets: "The financial situation does not permit us to do more in military matters." Mr. Truman also said it on the eve of the Communist aggression in Korea. This did not prevent him from increasing his military budget by 75 percent 2 weeks later. It is not the budget which must dominate the national defense, but the national defense must dominate the budget.

THE ASSEMBLY HAS OTHER THINGS TO THINK ABOUT

"I believe that there is something dramatic in the present circumstances in seeing the national defense budget discussed before a so poorly equipped parliamentary assembly" (statement of a deputy of the majority).

Excess-Profits-Tax Hearing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following notice of public hearing of the House Ways and Means Committee to consider excess-profits-tax legislation released to the press by Chairman ROBERT DOUGHTON, is inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD:

Chairman DOUGHTON, of the House Committee on Ways and Means, announced today that the committee has scheduled public hearings on an excess-profits tax to begin Wednesday, November 15, 1950, and that the time for receipt of applications to be heard will terminate with the close of business on Friday, November 1.

Meanwhile, in compliance with the directive of the Congress and in order to have an excess-profits-tax bill ready for consideration by the House when it reconvenes on November 27, Chairman DOUGHTON stated that the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation will, within the next week or so, begin a series of conferences with the staff of the Treasury Department. It is contemplated that these conferences may result in the preparation of a report on excess-profits-tax proposals for submission to the committee which may then be used as a basis for testimony before the committee.

Witnesses desiring to be heard should address their application to the clerk, Committee on Ways and Means, room 1102, New House Office Building, Washington, D. C., in time to be received by November 1. Chairman DOUGHTON said, "The committee desires that, whenever possible, a single spokesman be designated to appear for an industry group in order to expedite the hearings."

The Tidelands Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON
OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I have today received a resolution from the Freeport, Tex., Lions Club addressed to the Congress of the United States of America. It reflects a widespread feeling concerning the title to the Texas tidelands—a feeling with which I am in entire accord.

I hope that Members of Congress will read the resolution with care and that they will bear it in mind when acting on legislation designed to clarify the tidelands controversy.

The resolution follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

On June 5, 1950, the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a 4 to 3 decision which attempted to give title to the Federal Government of the tidelands off the shore of Texas. In 1845 the United States Government entered into a written contract with the people of Texas which specifically provided that these lands would remain the property of Texas after the Republic of Texas became a State. This decision of the Supreme Court, if allowed to stand and become effective would be a clear-cut breach of this contract. Today, more than ever before the United States is looked upon over the entire world as the example of a democratic country which keeps its obligations and treaties faithfully and to the letter. The United States of America should not allow the world to witness it breaking a contract, which its representatives made in good faith, and has stood for over 100 years.

In writing its decision, the Supreme Court refused to allow the attorney general of Texas to present and develop the multitude of evidence he had regarding this case. In making its decision the Supreme Court completely ignored the historical facts which are relative to this case. The entire citizenship of Texas is greatly disturbed and insulted by this action. The documented facts of history stand, regardless of the varied political interpretations which come and go with the generations of time. We, the people of Texas, ask you to look at the facts:

1. After winning its independence from Mexico on the battlefield of San Jacinto in 1836, the first congress of the Republic of Texas fixed its limits by a boundary act of December 19, 1836, as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Sabine River, and running west along the Gulf of Mexico three leagues from land, to the mouth of the Rio Grande." Thereafter, in 1837, President Andrew Jackson advised the Congress of the United States as follows:

"The title of Texas to the territory she claims is identified with her independence."

2. On April 12, 1844, after formal negotiations, a treaty was signed between Texas and the United States, providing for the annexation of Texas. In this treaty Texas was to give up its public land and property. The United States was to assume the public debt of Texas and was to annex Texas as a Territory. On April 22, 1844, President Tyler sent this treaty to the Senate of the United States, which on June 8 voted and defeated the treaty by a vote of 36 to 16. One of the main reasons stated on the floor of the Senate for the defeat of this treaty was the allegation that Texas' lands were worthless and would never amount to enough to pay the indebtedness of that Republic. One Senator said, "Let Texas keep her lands and pay her own debts."

3. Accordingly, the same Congress submitted a counterproposal to the Republic of Texas for annexation. From December 10, 1844, until February 14, 1845, 17 drafts of a counterproposal came before the United States Congress. Some of these had provisions which would have required Texas to cede its minerals, mines, salt lakes, and springs, and to give up its land and mineral rights. None of these proposals passed. Finally Representative Milton Brown of Tennessee, who had previously introduced a resolution stipulating that Texas cede her minerals, offered again the general proposals of his original resolution, but omitted the ceding of mineral clauses, which his earlier resolution had contained and which had just been defeated in the rejection of an amendment of Representative Burke, of New Hampshire, which stipulated that Texas cede its minerals and mines. Brown's revised resolution was adopted by a vote of 120 to 98. Thus the claim of the United States to the minerals of Texas was considered and rejected by the House of Representatives in its formation of the resolution which was submitted to and accepted by the Republic of Texas as the basis of its admission to the Union.

This House resolution that finally passed contained two paragraphs; the first proposed that Texas should be admitted to the Union as a State, with a republican form of government adopted by the people of Texas and approved by the Congress of the United States. The second paragraph specified the details of the annexation; namely, that the constitution of the new State must be submitted to Congress before January 1, 1846, and that new States, not exceeding four in number in addition to the State of Texas might be formed out of Texas. The most important of these specific provisions was that Texas was to retain its public debt and was to retain title to all of the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within the limits of the Republic of Texas. Nothing was in these first two paragraphs about equal footing with other States.

The United States Senate amended this resolution and added a third paragraph which gave the President of the United States the option at his own judgment and discretion to negotiate the annexation of Texas by treaty which would admit Texas into the Union on an equal footing with the existing States, instead of submitting to the Republic of Texas the proposals of the first and second paragraphs as prepared by the House.

President Tyler chose not to exercise this option to negotiate by treaty and instead submitted the provisions of only the first two paragraphs of the joint resolution. President Anson Jones of Texas submitted this to the Texas Congress, which unanimously approved it, and then called a convention of the people of Texas to prepare a State constitution and to ratify the acceptance by the Texas Congress. This convention passed an ordinance of acceptance which states, "* * * we, the deputies of the people of Texas, do ordain and declare that we assent to and accept the proposals, conditions, and guaranties contained in the first and second sections of the resolution of the Congress of the United States * * *" On December 29, 1845, James K. Polk, President of the United States, signed a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States, which referred to the offer by the United States and the acceptance of Texas of the provisions of the first and second paragraphs of the initial joint resolution of March 1, 1845, which made the offer, and declared that effective upon December 29, 1845, and upon those terms, Texas was a State in the Union. Thus, although the President of the United States was authorized by the third paragraph of the resolution, at his own discretion to offer Texas an opportunity to come into the Union on "equal footing" by treaty, he instead submitted the alternate proposal which outlined specific provisions allowing Texas to retain her lands. The proposal actually submitted to and accepted and ratified by Texas contained no mention of the "equal footing" idea.

One of the specific proposals, conditions, and guaranties offered by the United States in good faith and accepted faithfully by the people of Texas was that Texas was to retain the public domain which had belonged to it while it was an independent nation. These lands consisted of an estimated 237,906,000 acres of public lands which extended to three leagues offshore. The new State of Texas retained the General Land Office, which had been established by the republic to administer the ownership of these lands. And for over 100 years Texas has had possession of these lands and has administered them accordingly, and its ownership has been recognized by all parties, including the United States Government.

These are the facts of history. It is not the romantic imagination of Texas, nor is it a wishful dream of ours. It is true, pure, and clean factual history. To violate this written contract made in good faith by both parties and kept by both for over 100 years is to cast a dark shadow of dishonor upon the whole of American life, public and private, which rests upon the integrity, the faithful observance of agreements.

Four members of the Supreme Court of the United States, less than a majority of the full nine member court, have ignored the provisions of the annexation contract by which Texas retained these lands and minerals. In justification therefor, these four members have cited and relied upon the alternative "equal footing" provision which was never submitted by the President of the United States to Texas and was never considered, accepted, or agreed upon by the Republic of Texas. It was contained in none of the proposals to or negotiations with Texas except the above-mentioned alternative and rejected third paragraph. The result is that an alternative proposal which was rejected both by the United States and Texas has been allowed by the Supreme Court to control over the proposal specifically submitted by the Congress and people of Texas, and which provided that they retain all lands "lying within its limits."

The ruling of the Supreme Court should not be allowed to stand. As Chief Justice John Marshall said, suits involving constitutional issues and treaties should not be decided by less than a majority of the full Court. In no event should four members of the Court, over the protest of three dissenters, be allowed to break a provision of the solemn contract between the United States and the Republic of Texas and take away from the State 2,680,000 acres of land which has been in its possession for over 100 years. If the Court persists, then Congress should remedy the injustice.

Since it was a joint resolution of Congress which established the provisions of Texas' affiliation with the United States, we, the people of Texas, appeal to you whose high privilege it is to make the policies of this Nation, to uphold the dignity of our great country by enforcing the agreements made by our predecessors over 105 years ago. Today, the United States is the leader of nations in the fight to uphold the high moral principles of honor, and good faith in government. Now, while its representatives are negotiating treaties and agreements with nations all over the earth, is no time for the Government of the United States to exhibit to the world that it will stoop to the depth of regarding a written document made in good faith by two nations as a "scrap of paper." The people of Texas cannot accept such a conduct of government. We respectfully urge that the Eighty-first Congress by a joint resolution uphold the honor and dignity of the Twenty-ninth Congress and support the provisions of its annexation agreement with Texas, and declare that all right, title, and interest in the public domain of Texas, including its tidelands, three leagues into the sea, remains and is vested in the State of Texas.

Passed by the board of directors of the Freeport (Tex.) Lions Club this 28th day of August, 1950.

F. W. ARRINGTON,
President, Freeport, Tex., Lions Club.

Health Legislation That Has Provided Additional Facilities and Research Programs for the Benefit of Our People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it has given me a great deal of personal pleasure to have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This committee has an exceedingly extensive jurisdiction covering outstanding activities such as all forms of transportation, including rail, bus, motortrucks, inland and coastal waterways; communications, which includes radio, television, telephone, telegraph, and cables; security exchange and certain types of investment legislation; Federal power, relating to interstate transmission of all forms of power, including electricity, natural gas, and related subjects; Federal trade, which covers trade practices; civil aviation, and all that relates to the operation and control of all types of civil aircraft; food and drugs, to insure safety and honesty in the administration of such to our people; Bureau of Standards, relating to scientific development; enemy property, to provide for the administration and settlement of alien property in the custody of the Government taken over by it as a result of the last war; petroleum, in all its different aspects, including production, refinement, distribution, and sale.

The last, but by no means the least, is the jurisdiction over public health. It is this more than any other subject within the jurisdiction of our committee that has given me a feeling of genuine pleasure and appreciation of doing something constructive and worth while for all of our people.

The accomplishments of our committee, and in which I feel honored to have had a part, have been widespread, and have materially advanced the welfare of our people. The work of the committee has covered those subjects in which it was particularly appropriate for the Federal Government to supplement by Federal aid activities within the several States and territories. Care has at all times been observed to keep these Federal programs within limits that would preclude the Federal Government from taking over, substituting or replacing private practice of medicine or the conduct of private institutions carrying on medical services or research activities. The whole thought and purpose is to supplement and encourage all such endeavors and thereby make greater progress and advancement in the cause of human welfare.

I include, as a part of my remarks, a partial list of bills that have come out of our committee and are now law. I am pleased that some of this legislation bears my name, and all of the bills have had my active support. The list is as follows:

Federal Security Agency, Public Health Service—Statutory authority for grants for health services

	Authority
Venereal-disease control.	Sec. 314 (a), Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 693, as amended), Public Law 410, 78th Cong., approved July 1, 1944.
Tuberculosis control.	Sec. 314 (b), Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 693, as amended), Public Law 410, 78th Cong., approved July 1, 1944.
General health	Sec. 314 (c), Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 693, as amended), Public Law 410, 78th Cong., approved July 1, 1944.
Mental health	Sec. 314 (c), Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 693, as amended), National Mental Health Act, Public Law 487, 79th Cong., approved July 3, 1946.
Heart disease	Sec. 314 (c), Public Health Service Act (58 Stat. 693, as amended), National Heart Act, Public Law 655, 80th Cong., approved June 16, 1948.
Water pollution	Sec. 8 (a), Water Pollution Control Act (62 Stat. 1159), Public Law 845, 80th Cong., approved June 30, 1948.
Hospital survey and planning.	Sec. 613, Public Health Service Act (60 Stat. 1042, as amended), Hospital Survey and Construction Act, Public Law 725, 79th Cong., approved Aug. 13, 1946.
Hospital construction.	Sec. 625, Public Health Service Act (60 Stat. 1045, as amended), Hospital Survey and Construction Act, Public Law 725, 79th Cong., approved Aug. 13, 1946.
Cancer control	Annual appropriation act.
Rapid-treatment centers.	Do.
Venereal-disease demonstration.	Do.

It is very gratifying to realize the extent to which our State of New Jersey has directly benefited, under the above laws, by way of Federal grants for the conduct of the various activities in our State health service. Payments to the State of New Jersey for health services from 1945 to 1950 are as follows:

I am particularly proud of the fact that the Hospital Construction Act has already proved highly beneficial to the First Congressional District in the construction of two new hospitals that have come within the provisions of the bill since its passage in 1946. I refer to the allotments made in 1949 and 1950 to Our Lady of Lourdes Hospital, Camden, N. J., amounting to a total of $173,760, and allotments in the same years to the Salem County Memorial Hospital, Salem, N. J., amounting to an aggregate of $445,960. Of course, it will be realized that the counties of Camden, Gloucester, and Salem have likewise shared in a substantial way in the disposition of the funds allotted to New Jersey for the conduct of health services from 1945 to 1950, amounting to the aggregate total for the State of New Jersey of $3,815,432.54.

I have introduced a bill modeled after the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation legislation and designed to solve the problem of health services in the Nation without socializing medicine, even as the FDIC secured deposits without taking over the banks.

The key point is that by reinsuring the heavier losses for health insurance it will be possible for the local Blue Cross, Blue Shield, and other local farm cooperative and union hospitalization and medical care plans to give much more attractive and comprehensive contracts to the subscribers at a reasonable charge. Within a brief space of time this should cover the medical economic problem in the Nation.

The bill will largely solve this health problem without bringing the Government into the patient-doctor or patient-hospital relationship. It will confine the Government's contact to the local voluntary insurance nonprofit associations.

The bill is, of course, a first draft and is subject to improvement and modification as it is analyzed and considered by various interested groups, professions, and associations.

The Eighty-First: The Did-Something Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this article from Newsweek magazine for the week of September 25 to my mind sums up with a pat on the back the work of the Eighty-first Congress.

I supported practically every measure that Newsweek gives Congress credit for, except the increase in price support for cotton and peanuts. I have made several speeches on the fact that I am for a sensible farm program but not one completely out of hand. As a farmer myself, I feel that I know that most intelligent farmers do not expect a program which cannot be justified on either moral, political, or social grounds.

I believe that all of the people in my district will be interested in knowing just exactly what the Congress did, and when a magazine like Newsweek gives this editorial pat on the back, I think that is an endorsement not only of the Congress but of your Congressman, who had a great deal to do with the fine record of the Eighty-first Congress. The above-mentioned editorial follows:

THE EIGHTY-FIRST: THE DID-SOMETHING CONGRESS

The Eighty-first Congress, wearily packing to go home, could look back on a prodigious amount of completed work. Here are the important things it has done since going to work in January 1949, after the 1948 election.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Authorized wage, price, and credit controls, rationing, allocation of war-essential materials, and Government assistance to defense plants.

Appropriated, after the Korean war broke out, nearly $17,000,000,000 additional funds for the armed services and for military aid abroad.

Removed limits on the size of the Armed Forces, authorized a 70-group Air Force, extended selective service for a year, included doctors, dentists, and other professional men in the draft, authorized calling up of the National Guard and Reserves.

Voted allowances to dependents of men in service.

Authorized $596,000,000 Army, Navy, and Air Force construction at bases in United States and abroad.

Authorized $350,000,000 naval ship construction

INTERNAL SECURITY

Required Communists to register and authorized their confinement in wartime.

Authorized summary dismissals, for security reasons, in 10 Governmenta agencies.

TAXES AND NATIONAL ECONOMY

Increased tax rates enough to produce $4,500,000,000 additional revenue to meet defense needs.

Repealed oleomargarine tax.

Extended rent control on local-option basis.

Authorized Federal insurance of bank deposits on accounts up to $10,000.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

Authorized $3,100,000,000 in economic aid abroad under Marshall plan, point 4, etc.

Authorized $1,200,000,000 military aid to friendly nations in Europe, Near East, and Asia.

Abolished discriminatory provisions of the Displaced Persons Act and liberalized it.

SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH, AND WELFARE

Extended social security to 10,000,000 more persons and doubled benefits.

Expanded Federal housing for moderate-income families, raised limit on Government's purchase of mortgages, liberalized financing for FHA-insured rental housing.

Provided 3-year Federal-aid program for school construction in Federal impact areas.

Established National Science Foundation and authorized United States Public Health Service to support research in rheumatism, arthritis, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

Accepted 20 proposals to streamline Federal establishment, rejected 7.

AGRICULTURE

Authorized $2,000,000,000 increase in CCC borrowing capacity to continue farm price supports, and increased acreage eligible for price support by 1,200,000 acres of cotton and 100,000 acres of peanuts. Made 1950 potato crop subject to producer agreement on marketing quotas.

Transportation and Its Related Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the study of transportation and its problems by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been one that the committee has carried on over a period of years. It was first started by Hon. Clarence Lee, who for upward of 26 years was a member of the committee and in more recent years its distinguished chairman. During my chairmanship of the committee, in the Eightieth Congress, I continued the study. In the work that was done by the committee during these years of study the committee was greatly assisted by Dr. Fredericks, a member of our staff, and, a professor at the University of Maryland. Words cannot adequately describe or do just credit to the valuable and painstaking help that was rendered by him. Much of the thoughts and views I have expressed in the speech I delivered before the Camden Traffic Club and its guests on Monday, May 15, 1950, and, which by unanimous consent granted to me, I herewith make a part of my remarks. It reads as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, OF NEW JERSEY

It is a pleasure to be present with you this evening, although I do not think I am entitled to the honor you bestow in inviting me to address such a distinguished group.

During my service in the House of Representatives, covering nearly 24 years, I have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for most of that time. It has been a privilege that I value very highly to have had the opportunity of service on such an important committee.

There is no committee on the House that has such widespread jurisdiction, nor covers as many varied and important activities as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is the third oldest committee, having been set up by the Congress in and continued through all the intervening years until the present.

The jurisdiction of the committee covers a wide field of activities. It has legislative jurisdiction over all forms of transportation operating on land, inland waterways, certain types of coastal carriers, and air. It also has jurisdiction over interstate power, Federal trade, all forms of communications, including telephone, telegraph, cables, radio, and television. Also over petroleum, security exchanges, public health and science, Bureau of Standards, Weather Bureau, and, believe it or not, in the last few days our jurisdiction extended even to slot machines or "one-arm bandits," as they are commonly known.

I realize that of all these subjects you are interested most in transportation. Hence my remarks this evening will relate to a short history of its development in this country, the growth of regulation pertaining to it, and if time permits some reference to existing problems and possible solution.

The transportation industry of the United States is composed of water, rail, highway, pipeline, and air carriers. These different carriers did not all come into being at one time or in the same way. They did not all come within the area of Federal regulation for the same reasons, at the same time or in the same manner. As they have all developed it has become apparent that each has its own economic problems; each is highly competitive with the others; yet each is a most useful part of our transportation system.

Today the United States has the best transportation system in the world. The intercity carriers operated 78,372,000,000 passenger-miles of transportation and hauled 890,848,000,000 ton-miles of freight in 1947. To handle this traffic, the carriers employed 2,800,000 people and paid $6,000,000,000 for labor. Carrier-operating revenues were $13,000,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1948. To help support the Government it paid out in income taxes alone $1,500,000,000 for the year 1944. In addition, the users paid over $590,000,000 during 1948 for excise taxes imposed as a wartime measure in part to check civilian uses of transportation.

Transportation effects the daily life of every citizen of the country. Hence, each citizen has a stake in the transportation system whether he is a manufacturer, shipper, merchant, traveler, or individual consumer. Good service and reasonable rates are his immediate interests in transportation system.

The user being a typical American will continually demand that the system and the function it performs be constantly improved. To meet these user demands in the face of constant changes in business conditions, growing Government regulations and diminishing financial returns constitute the major problem confronting the transportation industry today.

To assure good service at reasonable cost, Government and business jointly must try to maintain and further develop an efficient and dynamic intercity transportation system—rail, highway, air and water—for moving mail, raw materials, goods, men, and machines. Furthermore, it must be fully appreciated by all groups and individuals that the transportation system assumes greater and greater importance to the national economy and security as the country continues to grow and develop.

At the outset, it is evident that the further development of a strong and healthy transportation system in the United States will require encouragement of proper government attitude toward existing problems and a sincere desire by all concerned to arrive at practical and acceptable solutions.

And, regardless of shipper and carrier desires, it must be recognized that public interest is always paramount.

Public interest dictates that the carriers be given a healthy business atmosphere in which to operate—one that is not burdened with excessive and duplicating taxes and other adverse features that discourage traffic, such as the continued use of the wartime imposed excises.

This interest also requires that competition be maintained between the various forms of transporation on a fair basis. Only through such terms of competition will the users profit and the transportation industry become stronger.

Public interest further calls for legislative adjustment in transportation regulations so as to promote and encourage development of a well-balanced transportation system capable of greater flexibility in its operation to meet changing demands in requirements of today and the foreseeable future.

Transportation, like any other business, must expect to share good and bad times. Unless transportation investments are attractive in good times, the public will not risk its money and the development of the industry will be retarded. The users, general public and carriers will suffer because of the resulting inadequate service. Recognizing how important it is to keep the transportation industry functioning as a strong, healthy, and financially sound business, and to keep transportation service the best in the world, free to grow and able to keep pace with changing economic conditions, it is necessary that all forms of transportation be afforded a healthy business atmosphere in which to operate, competitive opportunities which will conserve for the public good the advantages of each, and that they be regulated only to the degree clearly required by the public interest.

DEVELOPMENT OF REGULATION

At this point it might be well to consider the development of regulation during the past as it applied to the several types of carriers.

Railroads

Federal regulation of railroads began with the Act to Regulate Commerce in 1887, which has two major objectives: (1) to insure a just and reasonable rate structure, and (2) to prevent discriminatory practices. The Interstate Commerce Commission was established for the purpose of carrying out these objectives. Owing to the open hostility of the railroads and a series of court decisions which left the Commission no power to fix rates and control long-and-short haul discriminations, Federal regulation was relatively ineffective for 20 years. In 1906, however, the Hepburn Act, added greatly to the powers of the Commission; extended its jurisdiction to include express and sleeping-car companies, pipelines, and industrial railways; granted the power to fix maximum rates after complaint and hearing; extended Commission powers to include those of inspection and audit; and directed the courts to enforce the orders of the Commission, provided they were "regularly made and duly served."

A new phase of regulation began with passage of the Transportation Act of 1920. Prior to this time regulation had been directed mainly toward securing just and reasonable individual rates. Congress now realized that the railroad system of the country must be placed on a stable basis, and that rates should, therefore, be high enough to enable the railroads to perform their function in the economy of the country. To this end the act provided that rates were to be established to afford an opportunity for the carriers, as a whole or in groups, to earn a fair return upon the aggregate value of their properties used in rendering transportation services. This act also gave the railways permission, subject to the Commission's approval, to form pooling arrangements and combinations. It gave the Commission control of new construction, of abandonment of existing lines, and of other aspects of service; and it also gave the Commission supervision over security issues and provided for the establishment of new machinery for controlling labor disputes.

The Transportation Act of 1940 was fundamentally a product of the competitive situation which had developed in transportation, and its primary object was to restrain this competition, at least to a limited extent, and to strengthen the railroads in particular. In this act Congress broadened the declaration of the national transportation policy which had previously been partially enunciated in the Motor Carrier Act of 1935 and the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938. Especially vital points in the policy, as stated in 1940, were the following: Impartial regulation of all modes of transportation, preservation of the inherent advantages of each type of transportation, promotion of sound conditions in the transportation industries, condemnation of destructive competitive practices, and encouragement of fair wages and working conditions. Decision as to the actual meaning of these elements of policy was left in the hands of the Commission. This act also liberalized the Commission's authority over combinations, pooling, unifications, mergers, and acquisition of control of railroads.

Pipelines

Federal regulation of pipelines (other than those transporting water or natural gas) was first established by the Hepburn Act of 1906, which declared them to be common carriers and placed them under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Since these pipelines transport only liquids in bulk, which move in large and continuous volumes, their operations are intimately related to the producing and refining branches of the oil industry. Practically all the lines are integrated with the operation of oil companies and no important lines are operated by interests not affiliated with the oil industry.

Water carriers

The act to regulate commerce of 1887 and the Panama Canal Act of 1912 provided for some regulation of water transportation, but only in connection with services rendered jointly with railroads or by water carriers under the control of railroads. However, it was not until the adoption of the Shipping Act of 1916 (amended in 1920) that general Federal regulation of water transportation was provided.

This act created the United States Shipping Board and required common carriers by water operating in interstate commerce to file maximum and joint rates with the Board. Such rates were to be reasonable and might be fixed by the Board if found to be otherwise. Other provisions of the Shipping Act were directed toward the interrelations between water carriers. More legislation applicable to water transportation was provided in the Intercoastal Shipping Act of 1933, as amended in 1938. This law required common carriers engaged in the intercoastal, coastwise, and Great Lakes service to publish and observe actual rates of charge; made it necessary to give 30 days' notice of changes in rates; and authorized the Shipping Board to suspend proposed changes in rates for a period of 4 months. The Maritime Commission was empowered, after 1938, to prescribe maximum and minimum rates for common carriers on the high seas, and maximum rates for such carriers on the Great Lakes. In the intercoastal service the Commission had limited jurisdiction over the rates of contract carriers.

The Transportation Act of 1940 added the present part III to the Interstate Commerce Act. With important exceptions, this act extended Federal regulation to all common carriers in interstate transportation on the inland waters and oceans, and transferred the regulatory functions of the Maritime Commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Motor carriers

In the earlier years of highway transportation, the legal status of motor-vehicle operations was loosely defined. Generally, the only laws applicable to motor highway transportation were requirement for the payment of State license fees for the vehicles. It soon became apparent, however, that there was a need for regulations as to size and speed of vehicles. Therefore, starting in 1913, most States passed laws limiting the gross weight of motor vehicles using their highways. These laws, however, applied only to the vehicle itself with no regard for the nature or purpose of its use.

The next development was a growing public appreciation that some distinction ought properly to be made between the use of the highways for pleasure, or as an incident of ordinary business activities, and their commercial use for profit by operators of motor transport for hire. This led to the start of Government regulation of the business of commercial highway transportation.

Until 1935, all regulation of highway transport operations was under the exclusive jurisdiction of the States. State regulatory legislation provided for fairly thorough and comprehensive supervision of commercial carriers, but there often was little or no provision made for the enforcement of their statutes. Until 1925, regulation by the States applied not only to operations which took place wholly within their boundaries, but it was believed that they also had power to regulate interstate traffic at the same time, and to the extent that it took place within the boundaries of a State. In that year, however, a decision of the Supreme Court denied to the States the right to exercise any but a limited control over operations which crossed State boundaries. This decision left a wide gap in the regulation of the business of highway transportation and a large number of operations became exempt from all control since all an operator need do, to exempt himself from any legal control of his business, was to cross a State line, even for a short distance.

Such lack of control of rates or service, either State or interstate, at this particular period in the development of highway transportation encouraged chaotic conditions and, particularly after the start of the general business depression in 1929, brought into the carrier field many unreliable operators. The industry was wide open and competition was virtually unrestrained. Public and industry recognition of this bad situation in the business of highway transportation brought about enactment of the Federal Motor Carrier Act of 1935, which became part II of the Interstate Commerce Act.

The act of 1935 applies to motor carriers the same principles as those underlying the regulations of railroads but went further than any previous legislation dealing with transportation as it contains a broad declaration of congressional policy. Important objectives of this policy were to preserve the inherent advantages of motor transportation, foster sound conditions in the motor-carrier industry, promote an adequate motor-carrier industry, promote an adequate motor-carrier service at reasonable rates, encourage coordination among the different agencies of transportation, and facilitate cooperation between Federal and State regulatory authorities. With certain exceptions, the Interstate Commerce Commission was given jurisdiction over motor-vehicle carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce as to rates, services, and other operations.

Except for safety regulation the exemptions included (a) school busses, taxicabs, hotel vehicles, trolley busses, and motor vehicles used incidentally to aircraft transportation; (b) motor vehicles controlled and operated by farmers or farmer cooperatives and those engaged in transporting agricultural products, livestock, or fish for hire; and (c) motor vehicles used exclusively in distributing newspapers. Those exemptions apply to substantial volume of interstate traffice. Probably accounting for the largest tonnage of exempt freight movement is that which applied to trucks used in hauling livestock, fish, and agricultural products (and no other freight) for hire.

Air carriers

Prior to 1925, the only legislation pertaining to air transportation had to do with rates of pay for carrying mail. Under this and subsequent legislation, the Postmaster General exercised some authority over and prescribed the extent the location of airmail and passenger service. This legislation was repealed by the Air Mail Act of 1935, which placed supervision and control of airlines under the Government agencies. The Department of Commerce was given power to regulate safety and was charged with the development and maintenance of airways. The Interstate Commerce Commisson was given authority to set fair and reasonable rates for mail pay. Mail contracts were to be awarded by the Post Office Department under competitive bidding, subject to specified maximum rates.

However, financial results from operation of air transport continued to be highly unsatisfactory, leading to a difficult financial situation for some of the airlines. The Congress then enacted the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, which set up a Civil Aeronautics Authority, with broad powers to regulate carriers engaged in scheduled air transportation, and their rates, and to issue certificates of convenience and necessity for entrance into operation. Under a Presidential reorganization plan in 1940, the Civil Aeronautics Authority was transferred to the Department of Commerce, but the five-member tribunal administering economic regulation retained its independence as an administrative body, with the title of Civil Aeronautics Board. Thus, the regulation of air transportation is separately administered from the regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of all other types of common-carrier transportation. In addition to its regulatory functions the Civil Aeronautics Board is also charged by law with the promotional duty to foster and encourage air transport and to protect the annual revenues of certificated airlines by adjustment in payments for carrying mail.

Freight forwarders

Freight forwarders perform services between the shippers and carriers. As such they assume the responsibility for shipments while in the course of transportation, and charge rates covering the entire service. They come under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, through the addition of part IV of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1942. By the law the Commission was granted substantially the same authority over forwarders that it had over the carriers already within its jurisdiction. It is also provided that forwarders cannot lawfully control any carrier, but that carriers may acquire control of forwarders on the grounds of promoting greater efficiency. In addition, forwarders are not allowed to use any but common carriers in providing their services, thus eliminating the contract carriers by water, highway, or air.

THE NEED OF A NEW APPROACH

The perfect hodgepodge of enactments characterizing the development of our national transportation policy from 1887 on down, the result of attempts to comprise the conflicts between various competing and opposing carriers as they have been brought under Federal jurisdiction, leaves us now with too much regulation, too much conflict in regulation, and a system better adapted to conditions of the past than today. The function of government in transportation now extends far beyond public need and too little is left to management.

What we need is an honest and objective approach to the entire problem so that we may adjust our national transportation policy to conditions now existing in fact, not in theory.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION INQUIRY

Congress is aware of the necessity of reappraising our existing regulatory policies and providing an over-all national transportation policy that will more fully recognize present-day conditions and requirements.

In furtherance of this objective, a national transportation inquiry was authorized by House Resolution 318, adopted March 7, 1946, during the second session of the Seventy-ninth Congress. This resolution authorized and directed the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to investigate the transportation situation with a view to recommending legislation that will result in a consistent public policy fair to all competing agencies of transport, to the using and investing public, and to labor, to the end that the country's commerce may be moved with the greatest possible degree of economy, safety, and dispatch.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce immediately thereafter began its work by preparing a list of topics suggesting many of the postwar transportation problems faced by the country and by carriers and users of their services. This list, accompanied by an invitation to discuss these suggestions, was widely circulated. Though addressed to individuals and organizations, it was an invitation to anyone who had experience, knowledge, or constructive suggestions, which he felt might be helpful, to submit his views to the committee. By this means it was hoped that any defects and injustices prevailing under existing transportation laws would be brought to light accompanied by proposals of remedies. The effort to secure such opinions was conceived by the committee as the first step toward adjusting legislation and administrative control to a new set of transportation conditions; toward the improvement of our national transportation policy; toward what might develop into a comprehensive rewriting of our transportation policy and its implementation by new legislation.

Nearly 500 statements were received. These were analyzed and summarized in House Report No. 2735 (79th Cong., 2d sess.). It was recognized from the beginning that these statements were necessarily ex parte made without open hearings or an opportunity for cross-examination. Nevertheless, they were an important contribution to the basic information required in the survey. The results of the study were published in the hope that further discussion by interested parties would develop prior to the formulation of any new over-all transportation legislation.

ACTIVITIES DURING EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

The continuance of the national transportation inquiry by the committee was authorized by House Resolution 153 of the first session of the Eightieth Congress, approved on May 12, 1947, and it did so by continuing its fact-finding activities with a view to (a) submitting the issues of the transportation problem for study and recommendation of various economic groups of the country; and (b) drafting for consideration of the Congress any essential changes which might be found desirable in our national transportation policies. In this process the committee operated on the general basis that all transportation agencies were engaged in useful and necessary work; that the services of the various types of carriers constituted a basic industry of the Nation; and that Government regulation should be designed as a constructive aid to the public and to the carriers. The committee assumed that the broad purposes of regulation contemplate that the Government should use its regulatory powers to secure good services and fair treatment to the public; exercise just and reasonable regulation of the carriers; and maintain fair competition based on privately owned transportation facilities.

Subsequent to the publication of the report on the national transportation inquiry, in the closing days of the Seventy-ninth Congress, numerous interested groups and individuals proposed to aid the committee further by doing additional work on various problems covered by the inquiry. Such assistance was welcomed by the committee; but at the same time it was pointed out that little progress would be possible, with so complicated a problem, if the various groups adhered to past procedures, usually involving promotion of their own particular theories and positions. The committee sought, so far as possible, a common meeting ground where all our transportation agencies can unite in justice to the public interest and with fairness between them in their competitive relations to each other. By encouraging additional study on the part of those disposed to carry on such work it was the hope of the committee that every appropriate step would be taken to reconcile points of view and bring about common accord on the issues of the problem. The committee thought we should retain all that is good and where deficient improve our system of regulation which has developed based upon principles applicable to conditions existing 30 years ago rather than those of the present.

The work of those cooperating with the committee reached a point, in April 1948, where it was deemed advisable to hold the first public hearings in connection with the inquiry. Hearings were, therefore, conducted. These dealt particularly with the following current problems of our national transportation policy: (a) Should or should not the regulation of all common-carrier forms of transportation be centralized in one agency? (b) Under present conditions of national defense and competition among carriers, what should be the policy of the Federal Government regarding promoting one or more types of common carriers and in aiding others? (c) Do our present regulatory bodies, working within the framework of existing statutory authority, have sufficient scope of authority and operate under administrative practices adequate to deal with the rapid movement of economic events?

Witnesses appeared at this hearing, made statements, and were questioned by members of the committee. Results confirmed the position of users of transportation services and the carriers which had already been brought to the committee's attention by the written statements filed with it at the start of its inquiry.

Subsequently, hearings were held on the defense aspects of the national transportation policy. Testimony on our defense transportation system come from the various carriers and the industries supplying them with maintenance materials and equipment. In its examination into the status of our national transportation system from the point of view of national defense, the committee was conscious of the experience preceding and during the last war and was concerned with what this past performance may have meant, and left to us in the way of a vital transportation system; of our ability again to meet such an emergency demand, and of the changes which have taken place or may be occurring. Witnesses appeared, made statements, and were questioned by committee members as to their present financial and manpower resources, condition of physical plant and equipment, and their ability to handle any increased demands for service.

Testimony presented at this hearing again emphasized the indisputable fact that the national security requires an adequate and efficient transportation system, and that all types of carriers can best contribute to that security when they are enabled to maintain their properties and their organizations in sound condition, both physically and financially. There can be no adequate transportation system in wartime unless there is, in time of peace, a sound and efficient group of carriers. The basic capacity must be built into the whole transportation system when time, materials, and labor are available—conditions which do not apply after an emergency develops. Good transportation requires planning, which takes time; and it requires execution of the plans which takes not only time but competent management, an adequate supply of materials and a reasonable relationship between revenues and expenses. Governmental policies looking to these ends are in the public interest, both in times of actual or threatened national emergency and in times of peace.

In addition to the activities already mentioned, the committee conducted two special studies as a part of the national transportation survey during the Eightieth Congress. One of these was concerned with transportation in Alasaka (H. Rept. 1272, 80th Cong., 2d sess.) and the other with public aid to air transportation (H. Rept. 1612, 80th Cong., 2d sess.).

COOPERATIVE PROJECT ON TRANSPORTATION POLICY

During the Eightieth Congress various organizations were of assistance to the committee. Among the organizations of special assistance have been Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Transportation Association of America, Aircraft Industries Association, Association of American Railroads, National Federation of American Shipping, American Trucking Associations, Air Transport Association of America, Freight Forwarders Institute, National Industrial Traffic League, National Association of Motor Bus Operators, National Council of Private Motor Truck Owners, Automobile Manufacturers Association, American Railway Car Institute, American Automobile Association, American Waterways Operators. One of these, the Transportation Association of America, undertook to cooperate on a scale beyond anything that has heretofore occurred in this country with a view of solving our transportation problem. This association, with some 8,100 business enterprises and hundreds of individuals as members, undertook to create the machinery for a complete reappraisal of transportation and the national policies and regulation with respect thereto.

Obviously, such a project involved the creation of an organization competent to appraise the economic issues involved and to seek public reaction in all areas of the country. It was necessary, therefore, to first define the areas of common interest among users, investors, labor, and carriers; and, having done so, to establish a procedure to interpret and implement these interests. A steering committee composed of leading shipper, carrier, and investor representatives was formed to gather the issues, instruct the association's legal and research divisions as to the studies required for each issue, and then submit the subjects, with research analysis, to various panels located in different sections of the country. Panels were organized, including groups representing users of transportation, investors in transportation enterprises, and transportation agencies.

After the various panels have studied and debated the issues and reached tentative conclusions, the results will be reviewed by 21 regional forums in areas of common economic interest throughout the country. The personnel of the regional forums are experienced leaders of agriculture, industry, finance, labor, and transportation, and range in number from 30 to 75. Each forum will test opinions of all localities in their areas as well as farm, trade, and civic groups. A real grass-roots appraisal of the individual problems entering into the national transportation policy is, therefore, obtainable.

As a result of consideration of panel proposals, each forum submits its conclusions to the association, supported by economic argument in support of, or rebuttal to, the panel recommendations. If conflict arises between any forum and the national panels, or between forms, the association will establish the machinery for further efforts to reconcile differences. If complete reconciliation is not reached, procedures provide for successive steps by which the majority and minority views of either panels or forums will reach the association's board of directors and will be included in the board's final report. The purpose is to obtain a constructive proposal to improve our system of regulation where found necessary irrespective of what the law or practices may be at present and regardless of conjectures as to what the Congress will or will not accept.

Probably never before has a national economic problem been approached for solution on such an elaborate basis as this cooperative endeavor. The opportunity is here provided for the information and suggestions of all interested persons and groups to be considered by persons selected from the different areas of the country. All persons interested in transportation problems can give of their experience and skill to the solution of the great economic problems of transportation under democratic processes and with the purpose of giving primary regard to the public rights in the operation of our transportation system.

CONTINUING THE SURVEY

It has been claimed that we lack a clearly defined and thoroughly integrated national transportation policy and that such a lack has continually hampered the constructive, free development of transportation service in the United States. This possible lack of a definitive and constructive governmental policy has been held in large part to be responsible for what is now referred to as our national transportation problem. There are many aspects to this complex problem which now assume the great importance of adapting our laws and administrative practices to meet present day and future economic and competitive conditions. Not only are the issues broad but the legislative field is as broad as the problems themselves.

In approaching the many problems, it must be realized that they involve a general transportation system, a system composed of important competing agencies including railroads, highway, water, air, and pipelines. The problems are, moreover, complicated by the fact that each of these types of transportation is capable of performing a service that in some respects has advantages over all of its competitors. This makes the transportation problem of this Nation essentially one of competition. Some way must be found to use the different types of carriers with a view to best serving the interest of the shipping and traveling public and at the same time with fairness to the competing agencies. In this connection, it must be borne in mind that to a very large extent, all forms of transportation have been developed without proper coordination with one another. Each has its own economic problems; each is highly competitive with the others; yet each is a useful part of our transportation system.

Transportation is a vast enterprise of the Nation and basic to our economic welfare and its importance. The public necessarily pays a tremendous bill for all of its transportation services, both through direct charges and taxation. The services of all agencies intimately touch the daily life of every citizen. Those engaged in agriculture and industry are dependent on efficient transportation to move their products to consumers at the lowest practical cost. This Nation cannot prosper, and can scarcely exist, without an adequate and efficient system of transportation. Therefore, in the light of profound changes in the economy of the transportation industry and its relation to the country, it is apparent that we must adjust legislation and administrative control to the new conditions of today and those of the foreseeable future.

At the same time it seems to be agreed that no regulation should be imposed upon, or continued in force with respect to, any means of transportation unless such regulation is specifically required in the public interest; likewise, that no regulations should be imposed on any means of transportation merely because the public interest requires that it be imposed upon one or more other means of transportation. With this understanding of the problem, it is not the committee's intention to arbitrarily rewrite the law, but it is within its province to consider whether some regulations, now law, should be (a) continued with their present application; (b) extended to some or all other means of transportation; (c) further limited so as to exclude some or all of the means of transportation to which they are now applicable; or (d) modified in some respects, and, as so modified, then extended or limited in their application.

The widespread interest in transportation with so much effort being expended by various groups throughout the country is evidence enough of the necessity for a continuing activity by the committee and an increasing interest by Congress. It is essential that our transportation system, composed as it now is of various types of carriers, be kept efficient, particularly in view of possible decreased traffic which may come in the future. If income cannot be maintained there is a decided question as to what may happen in any period of depression. While our carriers must expect to share good and bad times with the rest of the country, the country should be greatly interested in securing their efficient operation at all times.

In any private enterprise progress is made through the investment of the savings of many people who are free to choose where they put their money. Transportation enterprises are no exception. If they are to go forward in the service of the commerce of the United States, the postal service, and the national defense, transportation investments must attract investors on the basis of their economic value. This state of affairs is not achieved by deprivations of well-deserved and well-earned Government aid; nor by threats that regulatory acts must impose unwarranted restrictions; or that there must be compulsory consolidations between carriers; nor by rate hearings that leave carriers hanging so long over the precipice of bankruptcy that stockholders give them up for lost.

In a popular form of government, the sound solution of the national transportation problems can be founded only in an informed public understanding that makes it able and willing to deal constructively and justly as between both carriers and the public. When the public understands and supports such policies, Congress will be able to accomplish much more to approve such policies as will best serve the Nation as a whole.

This transportation survey was conceived and is pursued with a design to contribute to that great purpose.

Johnson Committee Busy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. R. POAGE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Temple (Tex.) Daily Telegram of September 19, 1950:

JOHNSON COMMITTEE BUSY

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON'S "watch-dog committee" on the war effort has already more than justified its existence, and is just getting well started.

Primarily, the specially appointed committee, generally similar to the Truman committee of early World War II, has worked to jolt certain Government branches, including parts of the Military Establishment, out of what Senator JOHNSON aptly termed their "siesta psychology." But it also halted the pending sale of an important synthetic rubber plant, and had a "freeze" put on all proposed sales of war-surplus properties.

The committee plans now to tackle such points as the sudden price jump in natural rubber, Alaskan defenses, steel inventory and capacity, and manpower policies.

Clearly, this committee, if it continues to operate above the political level, with the good of the Nation its only objective, can accomplish a great deal. It can be not only the "watchdog" but the governor and regulator which makes our war machine run smoothly. And there could hardly have been a better choice as its chairman than Senator JOHNSON, who is young enough to be an aggressive leader, has long Washington experience, and enough military background to be of value.

Who Is the Liar Now?—Who Was Right on China Policy, Dr. Judd, the Washington Post, or General Marshall?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, General Marshall starts his job as Secretary of Defense under a cloud. The Washington Post, in an editorial for September 22, 1950, raises the serious question of the General's veracity in connection with his mission to China. This is no light matter, but the record is clear that Mr. Marshall by his own testimony did not recall where he was the night before Pearl Harbor.

The Post used fancy language in the editorial when it charged:

General Marshall was less than candid in his testimony about China before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

And so forth. The New York Times reported that Marshall disavows China policy. Mr. Marshall testified that the policy had been announced in Washington when he was en route to China, says the editorial. This left the impression that before Marshall started for China he did not know just what his mission was or else he was to be advised later. It is no wonder the Post is amazed.

So the editor puts the lie on George Marshall and proceeds to say:

Let us look at the record. General Marshall departed from Washington within an hour or so after the President's announcement of China policy, December 15, 1945. He carried with him not only the documents, but also a personal letter from the President which epitomized the policy in these words:

"Specifically, I desire that you endeavor to persuade the Chinese Government to call a national conference of representatives of the major political elements to bring about the unification of China and, concurrently, to effect a cessation of hostilities, particularly in North China."

Elsewhere in the letter the President said: "I understand that these documents have been shown to you and received your approval." The President restated this policy on December 18, 1946. In the course of it, he said: "I asked General Marshall to go to China as my representative. We had agreed upon my statement of the United States Government's views and policies regarding China as his directive."

There you have it, Mr. Speaker. Is the general downright forgetful or was his statement to the committee one of avoidance in view of the debacle of our foreign policy in China? Was the President in error when he says that Mr. Marshall and he agreed on policy in China? Or is it the truth as stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], who long ago expressed the opinion that Marshall was a dupe for Communist sympathizers in the State Department. It is crystal-clear that he was, Mr. Speaker.

It is also clear that the Truman-Acheson policy for China was to effect a coalition government in China, but Chiang Kai-shek refused, to his great credit. This administration cannot deny appeasement of the Red Chinese.

When Marshall accepted the China assignment, Mr. James Byrnes was Secretary of State and he has stated that the job was to bring the two groups in China together. The Post editorial concludes by saying:

General Marshall had his eyes open and his mind receptive when he accepted it.

And this statement puts the lie on Mr. Marshall once again.

Mr. Speaker, the editor of the Washington Post on the following day, September 22, 1950, again hit hard in an editorial and charged that the President sidestepped a question about Marshall's mission to China. It said:

It is odd, looking over the Truman statements on China policy and General Marshall's subsequent exposition of that policy, to think of General Marshall as a robot, speaking lines after he had been cranked up.

Could it be, Mr. Speaker, that the general will be a robot for Acheson and Truman as Secretary of Defense? It could be, in view of the record today. Surely the public's faith in General Marshall has been impaired by this exhibition.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I include the editorial of the 22d, so all Members may read it. It follows:

ALAS, POOR CLIO

The President preferred to sidestep a question at his press conference yesterday on the concurrence or otherwise of General Marshall in the instructions which he took with him on his mission to China in 1945–46. Mr. Truman says he was a special envoy of the President, and went to China to carry out the President's written instructions. In other words, the general even in his retirement behaved like a good soldier, and the general's disclaimer at the Senate committee the previous day of any responsibility beyond that thus stands unqualified on the historical record. It will now be added to the Republican indictment of the State Department in the November elections.

It is odd, looking over the Truman statements on China policy and General Marshall's subsequent exposition of that policy, to think of General Marshall as a robot, speaking lines after he had been cranked up. There can be no precedent for it. When a person of General Marshall's eminence is given a mission, the usual thing is to talk over the instructions, so as to find out whether the envoy believes in and approves of his mission. Only in that way can you be sure of a sincere prosecution of the mission. General Marshall's career has hitherto supported the view that this has been his practice. "Give me the facts," he is wont to say, "and I will make up my own mind." The function of State Department officials in the China matter was to dish up the facts; as hired help they could do no other.

The understanding that this newspaper has hitherto entertained about the Marshall mission was the logical one—that when civil disorder broke out in China the diplomatic experts supplied the briefs on all possible alternatives of American action. One was nonintervention (which would have been our own preference), another was all-out intervention on the side of Chiang Kai-shek, yet another was all-out intervention on the side of the Communists, and the fourth was mediation. These alternatives are said to have been given to General Marshall. He is said to have plumped for mediation. If, in spite of the Truman assurance in 1945 and 1946, he wasn't consulted, and urged mediation on the Chinese without having committed his own beliefs, then the situation is passing strange.

The way that the public has been misled both on the GOP side and on the administration side on China is hard to stomach. The President has avoided the issue before; now he avoids it again. The administration seems ashamed in 1950 to acknowledge what in 1945 was regarded by almost everybody in America as a noble experiment. So the buck is passed to the hired help, and the Republicans are left with more material further to tar and feather the career officials. In sympathizing with them, let us also condole with the muse of history.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] has been castigated by the editors of the Washington Post for his position on China. His views were based on first-hand knowledge of the facts; the Post editors on what somebody in the State Department told them. Now if they are the men the public expects them to be as responsible newsmen, they should be big enough to apologize to Mr. JUDD.

A Tribute to Dr. Ralph Bunche, Winner of the 1950 Nobel Peace Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, a great honor has come to a great man. Dr. Ralph Bunche has been awarded the 1950 Nobel Peace Prize for his services as United Nations mediator in the Palestine war, in arranging armistice agreements between Israel and the Arab States.

He is the eleventh American to win this honorable award. In being awarded this honor he joins a group of distinguished Americans who previously received this high honor. A group composed of Theodore Roosevelt, Elihu Root, Woodrow Wilson, Charles G. Dawes, Frank B. Kellogg, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, Jane Addams, Cordell Hull, John R. Mott, and Emily G. Balch. The honor is increased by the fact that it is reported that there were 28 persons nominated for the award this year, including President Truman; Winston Churchill; Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, of India; and George C. Marshall. Something of the greatness of the man can be judged by the modest manner in which he received word of the award. He replied:

I accept it with deep humility.

The service for which Dr. Bunche received the award was a most difficult task. Something of the extreme difficulty, as well as dangerous character, of the task he assumed can be judged from the fact that his immediate predecessor, Count Bernadotte, United Nations mediator, had been assassinated while engaged in the work of bringing peace to the troubled Holy Land. For Dr. Bunche to accept an assignment of this dangerous character is proof of a heroic soul.

Dr. Bunche was a professor at Howard University prior to being called into Government service. He has been called to one important assignment after another since 1941. He has been the first of his race to occupy many of these Government posts, but he refused an appointment as Assistant Secretary of State, stating that racial segregation in Washington was one of his reasons. In addition to this he said he was more interested in his work as Director of the United Nations Trusteeship Council, which has the responsibility for the administration of Pacific islands taken from the Japanese and League of Nations mandates in Africa.

The life story of Dr. Bunche is most interesting and fascinating. Born in Detroit, he is now 46 years old. His grandmother was born in slavery. He was educated at the University of California, Harvard, Northwestern, the London School of Economics, and Capetown University. He was made a member of Phi Beta Kappa at the University of California, and received a doctor of philosophy degree from Harvard. In recognition of his accomplishments, he was awarded the Spingarn Medal from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The American Association for the United Nations presented Dr. Bunche an award for distinguished service at a dinner attended by 1,000 guests. The National Father's Day Committee named him "Father of the Year," for 1949.

His life is a Horatio Alger story in real life. It should be an inspiration to all. It demonstrates what can be done in America by one who has the will to do. The story of his life and accomplishments will give courage to all who are faced with difficulties. It is hoped that he may continue to add luster to an already great career.

A Bankrupt Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include a letter addressed to members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. It follows:

MUSKEGON, MICH., September 11, 1950.
To Members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs:

I received from the State Department Dean Acheson's address, Crisis in Asia, an examination of United States policy by Acheson, and also the extemporaneous remarks by the same gentleman at the dinner meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, April 22. Being busy, it is only lately I have had an opportunity to look them over. I also listened to Dr. Philip Jessup's speech in Virginia and read The Twilight of Honor, by Fulton Oursler, in June Reader's Digest. All this coupled with the Newsweek report on the disastrous situation in Korea, lead me to an even more convinced conviction that Dean Acheson has fumbled and bumbled disastrously in his dealings with Soviet Russia.

He is so cautious and speaks so constantly of delicate situations and uses so much double talk and is so much in love with his qualifications for the job he holds that his wait-and-see policy has played right into the Russian hands and they dangle him like a puppet at the end of their diplomatic strings. The Russians are great chess players and they certainly can outwit and circumvent Acheson at every turn. We must seem like a bunch of simpletons to them and they have every right to laugh at us for we have suffered a succession of diplomatic defeats ever since the war ended and Russia started out on her conquest of the world, beginning with the veto in the San Francisco UN Charter. We have seen Russia hold the upper hand in practically every session of the UN Assembly, Security Council, and committee meetings, and the other 53 nations have stood helpless under scourges and indictments by Russia that should make a red-blooded nation cringe and lose respect for itself. Mr. Acheson speaks of the duress and suffering of United States diplomats as though it was something noble instead of something a nation should be ashamed of—not able to protect its own citizens or to retaliate. No, soft words and kindness and lofty ideals are supposed to win them over just because he, Mr. Acheson, wishes it so. Contrast all this with the ruthless, dynamic policy that wins for Russia whole continents. How long before the wrath and anger of the American people will be felt at this inept vacillation of our so-called leaders.

If Dean Acheson's ethics and morals are so lofty and high-minded, he would not have placed his traitorous friend Alger Hiss above the security and welfare of the American people who entrenched him in the position he holds because of President Truman and who pay his salary. The coddling of State Department pro-Communist personnel which is still going on today is another point the American people haven't forgotten.

In his Meet the Press broadcast the other night Dean Acheson was shrewd enough to take up most of the time explaining his policy in Europe, leaving his Asiatic policy, so disastrous to this country, for a few words of double talk, in which it could be still seen he thinks Asia should be written off to the Russians. His policy there resulted in the Korean conflict and is a direct result of Dr. Jessup's one-man trip to China to explore events when he had already made up his mind before leaving this country what this policy was to be—appeasement of Russia. Fortunately General MacArthur still has a little influence and he was defeated. Public reaction was so strong they could not brazenly advocate this now but I still have no confidence in our State Department. When once they make a mistake like President Truman and many others, they are not big enough to admit it except under pressure and try in every way to vindicate their mistake like Mr. Truman does with his "red herring" policy and soft treatment of Communists, avowed enemies of our way of life. Personally I think our State Department is infiltrated from the top down with pro-Communists—that is the Russian method of conducting war, not with bullets but by infiltration and the sucking in of dupes and fellow travelers, who in spite of all they see and hear, close their eyes and merrily carry out the Russian pipeline orders. For Dean Acheson to demand perfect democratic countries before we will help them, when China for centuries has been plagued with the "squeeze" business methods, is absurd. Look at our own country—the connection between crooked racketeers and crooked legislators and others. The millennium will come before we are all perfect and our State Department should embrace anyone who will fight communism, for once they get hold no people will get a chance to revolt. We have seen that in the Russian satellite countries. How can they overthrow a police state, when death is the punishment for deviation. Let Mr. Acheson explain that one when he says the people should have a will to overthrow their communistic leaders. And now we are to have again General Marshall and his disastrous policy of denouncing Chiang Kia-chek at the State Department pro-Communists orders. I have a great respect for General Marshall personally but I think he was made a dupe of the pro-Russians in the State Department, and it remains to be seen if he is another of those who feel they will have to vindicate their mistakes in order to retain their own ego of "statesmanship."

With France joining the "me too" parties in recognizing the Chinese Communists in the UN it looks to me as if secretly the State Department has given the green light to this policy which they always believed in, and talk furiously and loudly out of the other side of their mouth in order to stay in power, for they know the American people would not stand for our country's recognition of this Chinese goverment without a proper vote of the people. It seems as if conquest by force and fait accompli are now to be made the standard of justice in the UN and they might just as well paste this over their door. I for one will lose all confidence in the UN if this happens. They are establishing a precedent and no matter what country now takes over, including all of Europe, perhaps they will have this same standard of justice to throw in the US faces and they will have nothing to say in return.

I notice when "Deacon" Acheson speaks before committees and on the radio he makes himself sound so impressive and assured (that's the kind of diplomacy he thinks so important), his talk of delicate situations, total diplomacy watch and wait that worked so disastrously in China, it never occurs to his listeners that all that imposing appearance is a front to hide a fundamental weakness in that he is never able to best the Russians at their diplomatic game of chess.

If unity has to be purchased at the price of coddling and appeasing Russia, I am against unity. As for me I'll never trust Acheson, Jessup, Service, Hiss, at all, and also Owen Lattimore and the whole tribe they have in the State Department because they willingly or unwarily have made themselves dupes and fellow travelers of a nation so steeped in cunning intrigue, and police state methods as to enable them to gain everything with a fifth-column war without firing a shot and with our State Department utterly unwilling and unable to cope with or understand what is being done to our country.

The only way we as citizens can remonstrate and retaliate against such leaders is to write letters such as this (and how many will take the time or trouble to do this?) and the next thing is to pull a straight Republican lever at the elections. I am an independent voter but this I intend to do in spite of the fact that I voted Democratic since Roosevelt. Not that I have too high hopes of the Republican Party with its wishy-washy platforms, but at least it will mean a change and let the present administration know a lot of us are completely dissatisfied and it will knock a little of the cocksureness and "I" business out of our present leaders, who have gotten into the frame of mind they think they can get away with anything. Some day the wrath of the American people will be felt and a lot of heads will fall.

Very truly yours,

JOSEPHINE VANDERBURG.

P. S.—I have been listening for over 3 years to the UN Assembly meetings and Security Council and other sessions, and the above letter doesn't even begin to express the fear, frustration and apprehension at the cowardly appeasements that have led us into this mess. This "do-nothing policy" and the softness of the State Department toward communistic aggression, their failure to take up the complaint of China Nationalists against the real aggressor, just shows the whole sorry picture of cowardice and ineptitude that has made Russia laugh at us and feel she can get away with anything, which is just exactly what she has done. Instead of coming right out openly and accusing Russia straight out with words of conducting clandestine war in every nation of the world, and giving her the punishment that they can so quickly hand out to smaller nations who break the peace, they just sit there and let her go on making propaganda by lies which in the beginning were not even answered. Some day history will assess this cowardly weakness and failure to stand up for justice and freedom as we believe in it, at least the way the American people still believe it. The State Department evidently has a different conception.

National Planning Association Case Study on Marathon Corp.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hands what I firmly believe to be a thrilling document. It is entitled "Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining." It was issued as Case Study No. 8 by the National Planning Association. This 65-page study was prepared as the eighth in a series, attempting to determine why it is that some companies have had such outstanding records of peaceful collective bargaining with unions.

The National Planning Association is a nonprofit, nonpolitical group. It was established in 1934, and since then has been a real constructive beacon, as in this specific case study.

The report was written by Mr. R. W. Fleming, director of the Industrial Relations Center of the University of Wisconsin at Madison, and Prof. Edwin E. Witte, chairman of the department of economics at the same great university. Its focus is the Marathon Corp., the second largest employer in the Wisconsin paper industry—a corporation whose very name has come to symbolize the finest in the American paper industry—a corporation which is distinctively the product of its major architect and industrial genius—a dear friend of mine, Mr. D. C. "Clark" Everest who, until recently, was president of the 40-year-old corporation and is now the distinguished chairman of its board.

PAPER INDUSTRY IS CRUCIAL

The paper industry is a crucial industry in Wisconsin. It employs over 27,000 people and is principally concentrated in the river valleys—the Fox, the Wisconsin, and the Chippewa. The Marathon Paper Corp. has contracts with seven unions and it can rightly be proud of the fact that it has never had a strike or lockout in its history. It has had to resort to conciliation but twice. All of its contracts call for the arbitration of differences over interpretation and meaning, but arbitration has never actually been used.

Quoting from the very first chapter of the book:

Neither the company nor any of the unions has ever resorted to the courts. Governmental administration agencies have been called in only where the law gives the party no choice.

The company has prospered. The unions have grown strong. Sales have soared. Profits have increased. Marathon is one of the wage leaders in Wisconsin industry and competes in a market which is intensively competitive.

We of Wisconsin have always pioneered in industrial and social justice, and I am perfectly delighted that the National Planning Association has honored us with this fine study of a great corporation and indirectly a great man, D. C. Everest, of Rothschild, Wis.

We hope that this study will be an inspiration to other American industries and unions, showing them that management and labor can prosper together, work together as a team, with neither taking advantage of the other, neither sacrificing its rightful position and both serving in the public welfare.

I congratulate the NPA on this fine job as well as its two distinguished authors. I congratulate, moreover, the corporation, its management, and its employees which have been so honored, as well as the communities in which Marathon plants are located.

Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the text of an NPA release which was issued yesterday, Friday, September 22, describing this case study.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL PLANNING ASSOCIATION, WASHINGTON, D. C., A NONPROFIT, NONPOLITICAL ORGANIZATION, ESTABLISHED IN 1934, DEVOTED TO PLANNING BY AMERICANS IN AGRICULTURE, BUSINESS, LABOR, AND THE PROFESSIONS

(Officers: Chairman, H. Chr. Sonne; vice chairmen: M. H. Hedges, Frank Altschul, Clinton S. Golden, Donald P. Murphy, Beardsley Ruml; secretary, H. W. Fraser; treasurer, William L. Batt; chairman, editorial committee, Morris L. Cooke; chairman, finance committee, Thomas Roy Jones; counsel, Charlton Ogburn; director, E. J. Goil.)

The National Planning Association's eighth case study on the Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining issued today adds strong new evidence that constructive and reasonable attitudes of employers and of union representatives toward bargaining are far more important in achieving industrial peace than outside factors such as the size, profitability, or location of the company or the number of unions involved.

The company analyzed in the newest case study is the Marathon Corp., one of Wisconsin's leading companies in the highly competitive paper industry. The company deals with seven unions, composed of all of the company's production and maintenance workers—about 3,000. The bulk of these are members of AFL's twin paper unions, the International Brotherhoods of Paper Makers and Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers. The balance are members of four AFL printing unions and the International Association of Machinists, which is independent.

The NPA Committee on the Causes of Industrial Peace is responsible for the report like others in the projected series of 15 case studies. The committee is under the chairmanship of Clinton S. Golden, adviser on labor policy of the Economic Cooperation Administration, and is composed of 28 business and labor leaders, university professors, and professional consultants. Interviewing of company and union representatives and preparation of the report were the work of R. W. Fleming, director of the industrial relations center of the University of Wisconsin at Madison, and Edwin E. Witte, chairman of the department of economics at the same university.

The authors of the case study conclude that there are twenty factors which have contributed in varying degrees to the remarkable record of industrial peace at Marathon. There seems no question to them, however, that most important are the facts that Marathon's management officials act on the principle that "a company gets just about the kind of labor relations it asks for" and that the unions with which Marathon deals have a record of responsibility and maturity.

In a statement accompanying the author's analysis, the NPA committee stresses the value of this particular study as a companion piece to case studies 1 and 7, which dealt with paper companies on the west coast and in New England. "We have made these three studies in the same industry in order to see how unions which have peaceful relations with one company fared with other companies in different geographical locales and under different bargaining conditions. We wanted, too, to explore the effects that the size of the bargaining unit and the presence of multiunion bargaining had no specific relationships."

The committee notes that important differences exist in the three paper companies. For example, Crown Zellerbach Corp. (case study 1) is the second largest pulp and paper company in the country and it bargains as part of a region-wide employer group on the Pacific coast. Nashua Gummed and Coated Paper Co. in New Hampshire (case study 7) has less than 1,000 employees and it bargains individually with 7 unions. Marathon is between the two, both geographically and in size, and it bargains with 7 unions individually. Nevertheless the authors and committee find significant parallels in the basic causes of industrial peace found in the three paper companies as well as in the other case studies of other companies in other industries.

The Marathon study reaffirms the importance of these factors found in the seven previously studied situations:

1. There is full acceptance by management of the collective-bargaining process and of unionism as an institution.

2. The unions fully accept private ownership and operation of the industry; they recognize that the welfare of their members depends upon the successful operation of the business.

3. The unions are strong, responsible, and democratic.

4. The company stays out of the union's internal affairs; it does not seek to alienate the workers' allegiance to their unions.

5. Mutual trust and confidence exist between the parties. There have been no serious ideological incompatibilities.

6. Neither party to bargaining has adopted a legalistic approach to the solution of problems in the relationship.

7. Negotiations are problem-centered—more time is spent on day-to-day problems than on defining abstract principles.

8. There is widespread union-management consultation and highly developed information sharing.

The 13-year record of Marathon's peaceful relations at four Wisconsin plants and one Michigan plant has been marked by integrity, good faith, and a willingness to bargain on the part of the management and the unions. Both company and union representatives at Marathon credit D. C. Everest—until recently president of the 40-year-old company—as the "principal architect" of the relationship. But all express confidence that his philosophy is "so well soaked in all the way up and down the managerial structure that most of the others share his views." Mr. Everest has vested genuine authority over labor-relations matters in other officers of the company, and for the last 5 years or so few labor-relations problems have had to go to him.

The record shows there has never been a strike or lockout at Marathon. Arbitration has never been resorted to, although contracts call for arbitration of differences over the interpretation and meaning of the contract. Neither the company nor any of the unions has resorted to the courts, and governmental administrative agencies have been called in on labor-relations matters only when the law required it. Conciliation has been resorted to but twice, and on one of these occasions the matter was beyond the control of both the company and the local union.

The committee and the authors show that the company, the union, and the public have gained from this constructive relationship. The company has prospered and steadily expanded. Its sales have increased about five and one-half times; employment has almost quadrupled; and profits—figured on sales or net worth—are satisfactory. The workers have received wages above local levels, comparable to competitive rates within the industry as a whole, but somewhat below metropolitan standards. In addition, fringe benefits account for a sizable amount of the company's wage bill. Employment has been steady and turnover low. Both the company and the unions recognize the peril of losing customers due to work stoppages. There has been no collusion against the consumer through arbitrarily high prices.

Some of the special factors listed by the authors as significant in this case have to do mainly with features of the paper industry or the local environment—others to company or union policies and procedures. Among these factors, explained in detail in the full report, are:

THE INDUSTRY AND THE LOCAL ENVIRONMENT

The paper industry has a better record of industrial peace than industry at large. It has not been greatly affected by fluctuations in the business cycle, so stability of employment has not been a major problem. And Marathon itself has made every effort to stabilize employment by diversifying operations to avoid seasonal ups and downs. Investment per employee in the paper industry is heavy, thereby giving companies an incentive to make the conditions of work attractive to avoid turnover.

The continually expanding employment—as Marathon grew from one plant to a wholly integrated operation from the cutting of pulpwood to the final printing of the package—has done away with questions which might have arisen in connection with technological changes.

In normal times no one paper company in Wisconsin has to set the pace in negotiations with unions. Any one of several, of which Marathon is one, may be asked to do the leading.

The cities where Marathon plants are located are small; the company is an important employer in each, and the largest single employer with the best and most stable working conditions in several. The individual Marathon plants are sufficiently small to permit an intimacy of contact between employers and employees.

Use of the allied printing label, which in turn depends upon the presence of the printing unions, is now important to Marathon in terms of customer demand.

MUTUAL ACCEPTANCE

The company from its inception has operated on the belief that it is sound business tactics to maintain wages and working conditions equal to any in the area.

Unionization was accepted without a battle, leaving no scars or background of bitterness. The company accepts the unions as representatives of its employees, making no effort to distinguish between the employees and the union, nor to drive a wedge between them. The company early established with its employees—and when the unions arrived with them—a reputation for absolute integrity, and a willingness to sit down and talk about any subject. Throughout the relationship, particular stress has been placed by management on periodic communications to employees about company affairs.

The seven unions which have contracts with Marathon all operate within the framework of the traditional American political economy. They have been relatively undisturbed by ideological questions. They have demonstrated their responsibility repeatedly. As a result the company is willing to discuss almost any subject with them whether the contract calls for such discussion or not.

Company-union conferences cover a wide variety of routine matters—a safety program, recreational activities, pensions, etc. For example, invaluable experience in living together was gained by the parties when, in 1937, they worked together on the installation of a job evaluation plan. The fact that this cooperative effort was undertaken at a time when it was unfashionable for companies to work with unions on job evaluation served to develop mutual confidence.

Rival unionism has never been a serious problem, largely because of the nature of the relationship between the company and the incumbent unions.

Since 1937 the company has elevated many members of the union to supervisory positions, with the result that the union point of view is well understood. On the other hand, there are now international representatives of both paper unions who formerly were employed by Marathon.

MANAGEMENT PREROGATIVES AND UNION SECURITY

This has never become a fighting issue at Marathon. Employees have not questioned the company's responsibility to manage the operations, and the company shows no fear that this attitude will change. At the start, the company granted the union shop because it cut down friction among union and nonunion employees. Down through the years the company has never been asked to discharge an employee as the result of the union-shop clause except for failure to pay dues, and few of these cases have actually resulted in dismissal. The unions have never asked for a check-off, preferring that dues be collected in person.

NEGOTIATIONS

Multiple bargaining was established in the west coast paper industry by the time the paper unions had succeeded in organizing several of the Wisconsin companies. Despite this fact, individual bargaining has always been the rule in Wisconsin's paper industry. Management and the unions have, from time to time, considered but decided against multiple bargaining.

Marathon bargains with the paper unions on a system-wide basis, and the sessions are attended by about 70 people. From the company there are usually the vice president in charge of manufacturing, personnel director and his manager of wage and salary administration, all plant managers as well as some of their superintendents, and all plant personnel supervisors; from the unions several international representatives plus local presidents and their bargaining committees. Neither side calls in lawyers or other outside consultants. Both groups come armed with the authority to make a decision. No transcript of the record of sessions is kept but minutes are compiled and distributed to both company and union people. These minutes are invaluable in interpreting the contract, because they both amplify and modify the agreement.

CONTRACT ADMINISTRATION

The manner in which the parties administer the contract is a major reason why there has never been a serious conflict. Both sides show respect for the contract, but at the same time they have sufficient confidence in each other to make changes where daily events seem to make this advisable. Though seniority is a troublesome problem, experience has demonstrated that the company and unions can work out satisfactory solutions. The contract permits unilateral action on the part of the company with respect to discipline and discharge, but in practice the company consults the unions on such cases, a fact which management says does not undermine effective discipline.

The grievance procedure set forth in each Marathon contract follows a common pattern of progression. In practice, most of the grievances that are ever formalized are settled at the plant manager's level. It is company policy for such officials to spend more than the average amount of time on grievances in order to give employees an opportunity to discuss the problem with the boss and to give line officials an opportunity to acquaint employees with collateral problems of management.

PERSONNEL DEPARTMENT

The well-developed personnel department which exists at Marathon today came into being in 1945, but the company has shown a consistent interest in good employee relations. The department is respected up and down the line, and operating officials rely on it heavily for advice. Though the company has purposely built up the prestige and importance of the personnel department, it still expects line executives to participate extensively in labor relations work.

FUTURE SURVIVAL OF THE RELATIONSHIP

The authors warn that "the fact that the past has been rosy offers no complete assurance that the future of Marathon will be as good. Some of the problems of the future may be tougher than anything the parties have had to face in the past. It does not take much effort to conjure up a few of them."

Among those the authors mention are: What will happen if bargaining sessions do not result in wages or fringe benefits during lean years? What will happen if the company stops expanding and technological changes are proposed which will displace workers? What about seniority? Will this fast-growing company successfully organize itself to meet its vastly larger problems? How will future changes in leadership in the company and union affect the relationship? Can the personal contacts of the past be maintained? Will the practice of writing one thing in contracts and then modifying or negating it in the minutes of meetings rise to plague the parties? What will happen if a number of potential points of friction between the incumbent unions should break out?

The authors are not pessimistic about the future outlook of this relationship. "Company and union officials up and down the entire line have worked hard and long to achieve and maintain the record of industrial peace." Both groups seem confident that they can continue to keep the peace.

Chairman Golden announced that future studies in the series will be issued at staggered intervals. Their selection, like those already studied, was made on the basis of the following criteria:

1. Important industries, strategic to the country's over-all economic health.

2. Geographic distribution, so no one section of the United States would be overrepresented.

3. Substantial size, with at least a thousand employees.

4. A competitive situation, where it was impossible to "buy peace at a price."

5. Where peace could not be explained by a personality or unique factor.

6. Where problems represented important industrial relations questions.

7. Finally, the absence of strikes—though "How many strikes?" was as a rule less crucial than "How much and what kind of freedom does the employer enjoy in his relationship with the union? How much mutual confidence have both parties? Have the company, the union, and the general public gained or lost from the relationship?"

Mr. Sabath on Brotherhood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of our colleagues a distinguished article on brotherhood by our senior Member, the Honorable ADOLPH J. SABATH. This latest evidence of devotion to the best ideals of democratic thought will be no surprise to any of us. It is nothing more than a reflection of what Mr. SABATH has stood for in the House for more than four decades. I am proud to commend it to the attention of Americans of every race, color, and creed:

[From the Sentinel, Chicago, Ill., of September 7, 1950]

A CODE FOR TOMORROW—DEAN OF CONGRESS GIVES HIS CREDO—"TEN COMMANDMENTS OF GOOD WILL" OFFERS AMERICANS A REALISTIC PROGRAM FOR UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD

(By Representatitve ADOLPH J. SABATH)

There are various approaches to such a subject as the role of brotherhood in building a better America. A cynic would point to the failures of our past and predict that, short of a miracle, we are doomed to the same dismal record for the future. A sophisticate would scoff at so trite a concept as the idea of brotherhood. I can only approach it with a sense of profound humility. For I seriously believe that the effective force of human brotherhood is one of those fundamental truths which is so important to our way of life that no one has ever been able to express completely the way he feels about it. There is always the temptation to fall into stereotyped phrases when words seem inadequate.

Actually, of course, the kind of brotherhood we can feel—even if we can't describe it—is expressed in action and in attitudes far more effectively than it can be said in words. I shall not try, therefore, to give you a definition of brotherhood. But perhaps we can, together, recognize some of the glaring inadequacies in our present practices. We can try to be sure that we are not concerned with a form of sentimentality, with a cult of intellectual snobbery, or with censoriousness. Instead we can try to free the genuine product from the misconceptions produced by slipshod thinking. We can then set it on an open stage to startle the world into some sort of vigorous action.

PRACTICAL AND DYNAMIC

I am thoroughly convinced, as I am sure you are, that the spirit of brotherhood is something which is at once very dynamic and very practical for the world in which we are living today. A true spirit of brotherhood, if I may paraphrase Chesterton, has not been tried and found wanting. It has, rather, too often been found difficult and not tried.

Clearly, I think, we have not yet fully achieved the kind of brotherhood which will build a better America. There is great need for a realistic attitude toward this fundamental spiritual problem of our age. We cannot in the mid-twentieth century fall back on the easy optimism of the late nineteenth century, or find reassurance by retreating into small groups of like-minded men and women. For all of us, the last vestiges of complacency were shattered by the atomic bomb. Our present challenge is to make sure that complacency is not displaced by more confusion, because confusion breeds fear and fear can produce such a bevy of gods that it is terribly hard to decide which one to follow. There is always the danger that some people will choose to devote themselves exclusively to their nation or race, while others surrender to an economic or social class. Some men may seek solace in a laboratory while others find refuge in demagoguery.

OUR BEST INSTINCTS

But another attitude is possible—an attitude which draws upon our best instincts without discounting our worst. It would recognize that prejudice is real and often deeply entrenched, but that there is something we can do about it. It is the mood of an early circuit rider who took as his text the verse, "They that have turned the world upside down have come hither also." "This text shows three things," he said. "First, the world is upside down. Second, it should be turned right side up. And third, we are the ones to do it."

We can start by building a better America. But to build a better America we must also build a better world, for the good reason that our future depends upon our ability to make the basic spirit of American democracy real to the world, particularly to the strategic areas of Europe. We must neither underestimate what Americans can do to strengthen the faith of western Europe in our political and economic future, nor overlook the fact that some western Europeans have some serious reservations about both our stability and our freedom.

NO LONGER A PROBLEM

Racial and religious discrimination in the United States is no longer a domestic problem. It is, perhaps, the greatest obstacle to European-American understanding which exists and the most powerful weapon in the hands of the opponents of our way of life. We must understand that, in a cold war, every incident of race violence of discrimination is played up in the overseas newspapers or over the radio, with no indication of the progress which has been made in recent years. Indeed, it is very difficult to explain this progress to Europeans without seeming to defend the scandal of racial, religious segregation, and discrimination.

Europeans naturally see the discrepancy between American ideals and American practice in simpler terms than we do. Even so conservative and strongly anti-Communist a paper as Le Monde questions the sincerity of our democratic ideals. Last fall, for example, Pierre Emmanual, a well-known French writer, described in its pages the coming American fascism, by putting together some half truths about our prejudices, the power of American capitalists, and the FBI. Stressing the immaturity of American political traditions, he concluded that fascism is a real possibility in the United States because, "Its traditions are not strong enough to free it from this result."

For the most part, those Europeans who have visited America are wiser and more charitable because they have been impressed by the spirit of our people, by our inexhaustible interest in social experimentation, and by our generosity and friendliness. Through these visits they are beginning to understand that there are many sides to American life which have an important contribution to make to the world. But at the same time they are especially aware of the curious contradictions of our traditional idealism and democratic political system. Syed Adam Edward Hogan-Shaddali, of Malaya, one of 10 students from nations in the Near East, Far East, and southern Asia, commented wonderingly to a reporter, "Discrimination is willfully done here by individuals who have been taught to think and reason, whose intelligence has been developed high enough to know right from wrong and to correct wrong. * * * What good is your fine system of free public education if it has failed in this essential?" We cannot afford to disregard such criticism.

CHALLENGE POINTED UP

I have stressed those aspects of American life which puzzle our friends from across the seas because they point up the challenge in our effort to reduce the source of these tensions. It is not enough to export food and supplies. Our ECA program calls for dollars—but even more important in the long run is confidence. There must be the assurance that we are a Nation whose democracy is healthy, whose fundamental tolerance of differences is great, and whose determination to stand for the principles of freedom and human integrity is more than a disguise for economic and political aspiration. The strength of the United States, as seen from abroad, is both a great and a frightening thing. Sometimes we are told, it seems to be magnanimous and responsible; at other times irresponsible and evil.

The task of building a better America which faces us in 1950 has, perhaps, never before in our history been so directly important to so many people all over the world. In this connection, Rabbi Louis I. Newman has pointed to the importance of realistic positivism. We cannot meet the challenge unless we recognize our weaknesses but neither, he suggests, can we genuinely achieve it if we lose sight of our strength. "There are universal items," says Rabbi Newman, "such as the love of liberty, an appreciation of character and integrity among citizens, and to improve the people's welfare, which, if emphasized, can lead to cooperation with other like-minded peoples. We must underscore the factors that unite rather than divide us."

LESSON UNDERSCORED

Let us, therefore, underscore one of the very special lessons which we have learned in this country—a lesson which seems to me to be of fundamental importance. We have here learned in a unique way the importance of creative minorities. We have come to understand the American way as a system of listening to new ideas, testing them out against old ideas, and balancing the interests of all of us as well as we can with the interests of the few. We are convinced as a Nation that diverse points of view and contrasting backgrounds can produce a dynamic fusion of interest, instead of perpetuating the chaos of ancient animosities. But as we look into our past and then forward into the future, it becomes increasingly clear that we cannot allow ourselves to become overconfident in an easy victory. Neither can we be paralyzed by fear of an unavoidable defeat as we seek to carry forward the development of creative good will at home and abroad.

Because of their special awareness of our peculiar heritage in this vital field of human values, I should like to call to witness three of the outstanding men of our time: one a scientist and administrator, one a statesman, and one an educator.

At the point of his retirement from the Atomic Energy Commission, David E. Lilienthal put his conviction of the power of our highest ideals into magnificent prose. "Our democratic faith is an expression of our sense of what is right and what is wrong, of what is fair and decent and of what is just crude use of arbitrary power," he wrote. "We do have weaknesses, and they must be carefully assessed. * * * Nevertheless, because the burdens of world leadership have been thrust upon us, it is even more necessary that we remember how strong we are, and why. * * * This faith is the chief armament of our democracy. It is the most potent weapon ever devised. Compared with it, the atomic bomb is a firecracker."

Our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, in his April address to the Society of Newspaper Editors named the ideas of freedom and diversity as the two great sources of our security and our well-being. These ideas, he said "have survived and flourished here in the United States because we accept and practice a third idea—and that is tolerance. We say and we believe 'my freedom, my right to be different, depends on yours. I can be free only to the extent that you are free, too.'"

ANTIDOTE TO FEAR

Charles S. Johnson, the president of Fisk University, finds in the mentality and spirit of younger Americans the antidote to fear and the sense of futility which are the enemies of that spirit of brotherhood with which you and I are concerned. "It is a positive and constructive approach to the world, a sense of direction that is realistic and free from the constricting mythologies of the past," he writes. The wide appeal of such a new and creative force is especially exemplified by "the swift contagion of the doctrine of human rights." He sees a growing acceptance of the principle of action in "the sweeping extension of suffrage, the beginning of rebellion of college youth against the snobbishness of fraternities and sororities, the relaxation of racial and religious quota systems in colleges, the growth of organizations for democratic action, and the mounting protests of segregation and discrimination throughout the Nation and, in fact, throughout the world. This is a new front," he concludes, "a new orientation, a new values stress that is different in texture and character from the unhealthy fears that possess the minds of cynics."

As we catch the vision of these great men, who in their lives and careers are representative of the dynamic power of diversity, we can move forward in our own spheres toward that way of life which is an expression of our deepest convictions and our highest ideals. We recognize that our individual lives are shaped and directed by the action of others. A community is made up of men and women who share common values and aspirations. But each of us learns best to recognize the spirit of the true brotherhood in that community by the action that shows it. Man is seldom neutral in the presence of a fellow man. He either approves or disapproves of his style of life, and the effect of that attitude inevitably influences the community. In acting in the spirit of a brother a man learns that he is like other people, that he can rely on them, that they are a part of his community as he is a part of theirs. The power generated from his concept of brotherhood—the power which, according to Mr. Lilienthal, makes the atomic bomb a mere firecracker—develops as much from the small acts of many men as it does from great causes or words of a few great men.

AN UNUSUAL OPPORTUNITY

We have had, in this country, an unusual opportunity to understand the true principles of brotherhood. Our forefathers found a rich and spacious country with room for new ideas. We have drawn on the strength and productivity of our land. We have also drawn on the cultures and convictions of those people from all over the world who have come to America to make it their home. Our Nation was born during a period when the ideas of the rights of men and of tolerance were taking on new meaning, and widening in their scope. The toleration acts in the seventeenth century granted permission only to exist, to a restricted number of religious groups. Then men such as John Milton and Jock Locke began to enlarge this meaning to include everything in political, religious, and artistic life except the "obviously great evils." The principles which inspired the American Revolution, and which guided those great men who founded our form of government, were a further extension of the idea of tolerance. We have not always succeeded in carrying out these principles, but we have never, as a nation, surrendered the right to aspire to them. We are confident that the idea of tolerance—of creative good will—grows slowly, perhaps, but that it increases in circles of ever-increasing diameters.

The late Reverend Peter Marshall, in opening the United States Senate, once said this prayer: "Help us, O Lord, when we want to do the right thing, but know not what it is. But help us most when we know perfectly well what we ought to do and do not want to do it." This is the kind of help which all of us need today. We know that if we fail to translate creative ideas into the reality of everyday life, the result is very likely to be frustration, fear, confusion, and uncertainty. We believe that the individual human spirit is the source of our strength: that the private thinking of each of us helps to determine public attitudes. This is our personal and private challenge. In a public sense we have the opportunity and the responsibility to help place these principles of brotherhood in the fabric of our governmental structure and in the law of our land.

TEN COMMANDMENTS

Dr. Walter W. Van Kirk has set down what he calls the Ten Commandments of Good Will. I should like to include them here:

"1. I will respect all men and women regardless of their race or religion.

"2. I will protect and defend my neighbor and my neighbor's children against the ravages of racial or religious bigotry.

"3. I will exemplify in my own life the spirit of good will and understanding.

"4. I will challenge the philosophy of racial superiority by whomsoever it may be proclaimed, whether they be kings, dictators, or demagogs.

"5. I will not be misled by the propaganda of those who seek to set race against race or nation against nation.

"6. I will refuse to support any organization that has for its purpose the spreading of anti-Semitism, and anti-Catholicism, or anti-Protestantism.

"7. I will establish comradeship with those who seek to exalt the spirit of love and reconciliation throughout the world.

"8. I will attribute to those who differ from me the same degree of sincerity that I claim for myself.

"9. I will uphold the civil rights and religious liberties of all citizens and groups whether I agree with them or not.

"10. I will do more than live and let live—I will live and help live."

These principles must be applied to our actions and our thoughts. We can begin to apply them each morning as we read the paper or listen to the radio. We can continue to use them throughout each day as we express an opinion or cast a vote. They are the key to the enactment of good labor legislation, or sound foreign policy, or wise social security and welfare programs, or a genuine civil rights act.

THE SHOCK FORCES

President Truman has said, "The Protestant church, the Catholic church, and the Jewish synagogue, bound together in the American unity of brotherhood, must provide the shock forces to accomplish a moral and spiritual awakening. No other agency can do it. Unless it is done, we are headed for the disaster we deserve." We know that the true basis of the democratic idea—our real security—does not derive from bullets or atomic bombs. The men of science who understand the secret of the atom have been the first to point out that a dynamic democracy depends upon ideas rather than upon weapons. We recognize that the forces of hatred and destruction seem sometimes to pravail. But we know, too, that it is precisely in times such as these that people find courage and strength out of their very extremity. In this crisis friendship and teamwork among Jews and Christians and all the groups that make up America is essential. We believe in the people—the people of every race, creed, color, class, and kind.

Laying the Foundation for a Stronger America Through Leadership and Racial Team Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THT HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, recently it was my privilege to bring before the House a bill which had for its objective the making possible of funds for the establishment in Diamond, Mo., of a national shrine at the birthplace of the late eminent Negro scientist, George Washington Carver. Four years previous to this, it was also my privilege to assist in the sponsoring of legislation which authorized the coinage of 5,000,000 Booker T. Washington memorial half-dollars to be sold at a premium to aid in the establishment of a memorial at the birthplace of Booker T. Washington—America's greatest Negro leader. I also cooperated in securing a United States post office known as Booker Washington Birthplace, Virginia, which I understand now has been a second class post office for 3 years. Three Nationwide good will building contests have been conducted with a total of more than 7,000,000 pieces of mail passing through the post office, in addition to the regular mail handled.

AMERICA'S LARGEST MINORITY GROUP

The Negro makes up America's largest minority group. He has grown sufficiently large in numbers to make a definite contribution to national welfare or to serve as a menace to national progress—depending upon the opportunities for development or the lack of it whichever is afforded him.

I have been interested in working with the Booker T. Washington Birthplace Memorial idea and the George Washington Carver National Monument Foundation because it is my opinion that through pride of race and efficient service, the Negro can earn for himself a respected place in the economic life of America, at the same time that he contributes his share to national progress. I further believe that as lawmakers and members of a majority group, it is our duty to seriously consider the needs of these 15,000,000 struggling Americans.

SAFE, SANE LEADERSHIP

Properly helped and intelligently led, the Negro is in position to make large contributions to our American way of life. This has been plainly evidenced in the lives of the large number of Negroes who have measured up in a most commendable way to American standards and ideals—particularly in the case of useful and successful lives like those of George Washington Carver and Booker T. Washington. Just what the Negro can accomplish through safe, constructive leadership is being evidenced too in the very worth-while program that is being headed by S. J. Phillips, president of the Booker T. Washington Birthplace Memorial and the George Washington Carver National Monument Foundation. I have cooperated closely with S. J. Phillips and have seen the very telling results of his leadership. Through his efforts and those associated with him, a national program for Negroes in agricultural development, health, trade, and industrial training, and interracial good will is making itself felt over the Nation in general and in the South in particular. Dr. Phillips is well educated, trained, and efficient, an untiring worker, and an ardent apostle of the ideals and teachings of Booker T. Washington—but above all this, he has sufficient courtesy and humility to appeal to men of all races and creeds. He is definitely laying a foundation upon which whites and Negroes can work together for the welfare of the Nation.

EXAMPLES IN PULLING TOGETHER

Through the efforts of S. J. Phillips, the makers of Royal Crown Cola, the Nehi Corp. of Columbus, Ga., has spent a large sum of money to help develop the birthplace of Booker T. Washington, in Franklin County, Va., as an incentive to greater racial pride for the Negro and to help to make possible trade and industrial training to Negroes below high school level. This is an outstanding example of what can be accomplished through understanding and friendship. Because these qualities were injected by S. J. Phillips, this corporation was sold on Booker T. Washington's idea of "helpfulness toward others"—and not only has the Negro benefited materially by this cooperation, but so has the South and the Nation in general.

Hundreds of Negro families in Roanoke and Franklin County in Virginia are being benefited by programs of trade and industrial training which have been set up by Dr. S. J. Phillips, in trade schools established at Roanoke and at Booker Washington Birthplace, Virginia. These schools are efficiently staffed, meet State educational requirements, and are helping to fill what is possibly one of the greatest needs among Negroes today—the need for training adult Negroes of low educational status.

Recently Dr. Phillips has caused to be set into motion in the State of Georgia, a campaign for the establishment of a Negro agricultural service center at Camp John Hope near Fort Valley, Ga.; the object of which is to give help to the thousands of Negro farmers and farm families in the State of Georgia. It is significant to note that the Department of Education of the State of Georgia has set aside a tract of land on which the Agricultural Service Center will be erected and that some of Georgia's most eminent southern leaders are working side by side with Negro leaders of the State and with the Booker T. Washington Birthplace Memorial to initiate the help which this agricultural service center can give to the Negroes of Georgia.

At Diamond, Mo., the birthplace of George Washington Carver, Dr. Phillips is working with the banks of the State and many outstanding Missourians to get under way the program of the George Washington Carver National Monument

Foundation, which has the following objectives:

First. To promote racial understanding and harmony.

Second. To help underprivileged youth through opportunity scholarships.

Third. To establish community service clubs which will work toward the higher development of Negro community life.

Fourth. To aid Negroes in the field of agriculture and rural leadership.

Fifth. To secure funds to financially assist nonprofit educational institutions.

BUILDING AN INVINCIBLE AMERICA

Ours is a land of many races and creeds. We must pull together if we would build an invincible nation. To make a strong team, each man must be in position to do his share of the pulling. The Negro can, in the words of Booker T. Washington, offer 30,000,000 hands in our forward pull—or use the same number of hands to retard our progress—depending upon the opportunities which America gives him for development.

The type of race-building program being carried out by the Booker T. Washington Birthplace Memorial under the guidance of Dr. S. J. Phillips, is an example of the type of program that will help in the building of a stronger America. This is the type of program that definitely deserves the help and cooperation of Americans of all races and creeds. The Negro has made wonderfully rapid strides during the 85 years of his freedom. If he is willing to accept the fundamental teachings of men like Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver, under the type of leadership offered by Dr. S. J. Phillips—his future will be secure.

Anyone interested can receive more detailed information about these projects by writing Dr. S. J. Phillips, president of the Booker T. Washington Birthplace Memorial, Booker Washington Birthplace, Virginia; and Dr. Phillips, as president of the George Washington Carver National Monument Foundation, at Diamond, Mo.

Panama Canal Zone Employees and Income Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the Members of this body a section of the conference report on House bill 8920, under which Federal employees of the Panama Canal Zone will begin to pay Federal income taxes.

For many years, because of the problem of obtaining qualified American citizens to work in the Canal Zone, these these employees have been exempt from payment of such taxes.

Both the House and Senate versions of House bill 8920 were in agreement that these employees should now become liable for the levy on income. This was in accord with the policy approved by both Houses of seeking additional revenue to help liquidate our present extraordinary defense spending and to help curb inflation. However, the bill passed by this body fixed the effective date of the tax upon Canal Zone employees as January 1, 1950, while the Senate-approved version of the measure made the tax effective January 1, 1951.

In conference, the Senate agreed to the House provision on this point, and the United States citizens employed by our Government in this zone will be required not only to pay a tax from which they have been exempt for approximately 28 years, but they will have to pay retroactively for the entire calendar year 1950.

It would be well for the Members of this body to note that the wages and salaries paid the Panama Canal employees have been fixed with the full knowledge that these workers have not been subject to the tax in previous years. In addition, heavy reductions in force have occurred in the Canal Zone recently, which have resulted in many former employees leaving their place of employment and returning to the States.

Our approval of that portion of the conference report on H. R. 8920 establishing the Panama Canal employees' income-tax liability as of January 1, 1950, will result in these workers being subjected retroactively to payment. Since past wages have been disbursed by the affected group during 1950 without knowledge of the impending tax, they will suffer serious financial strain in comparison with their fellow United States citizens in the States.

As a simple matter of justice to all citizens subject to increased tax payments, I would suggest that the newly covered Panama Canal employees have the opportunity of rebudgeting their incomes between October and December 1950 so that they and their families will be able to withstand the additional financial strain caused by effectuating the income tax in January 1951. Otherwise they will not only have to accept the new responsibility in the year to come, but will have to face severe economic hardship in paying the taxes due for the entire calendar 1950.

It seems to me, therefore, that the reasonable approach to the problem of the few employees involved in comparison with our entire tax-paying population is to have them commence paying income taxes with the beginning of the new calendar year 1951.

A Truth Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, nearly 4 years ago I urged and advocated larger appropriations for our Voice of America broadcasts. Unfortunately, at that time, many gentlemen opposed it because in order to be effective these broadcasts had to be done by individuals familiar with the respective foreign languages, many of which represented countries behind the iron curtain. Because of this fact, a great deal of opposition has been raised to the Voice of America concept. Those in charge of these broadcasts and its publicity were severely criticized for employing announcers and assistants who were directly familiar with the conditions that exist in these countries and their languages.

A welcomed change has taken place as manifested in an editorial appearing in the Christian Science Monitor dated September 15, 1950, entitled "A Truth Program." These very gentlemen who opposed the Voice of America broadcasts and its appropriations now feel, as I have always felt, that a great deal of constructive good has been realized as a result therefrom. A larger appropriation for this purpose is justifiable and will be forthcoming. The article aforementioned follows:

A TRUTH PROGRAM

For a long time the American State Department's information program has been symbolized by the Voice of America broadcasts. But the program has more sides to it than radio alone.

Thus it is gratifying that the Senate Appropriations Committee has voted to restore cuts in the fund for this activity. It is to be hoped that the Senate and House of Representatives will follow the committee judgment in raising the amount to the $97,212,000 which the Department requested.

The $77,868,000 which the House earlier approved would have provided for the radio broadcasts but the cuts it made would have restricted severely some other types of useful propaganda work, particularly in motion pictures, libraries, and information centers, and the exchange-of-persons program.

There is great need for use of the printed as well as the spoken word in many of the fringe countries between the western and the Communist worlds. American libraries or information centers can be extremely useful. Books, magazines, and pamphlets, including serious matter in comic-book format, can go where radio receivers, especially short-wave, are rare if not forbidden.

Similarly, educational films can make a lasting impression and a wholesome supplement to American-made commercial entertainment. As for the "exchange of persons," the House objected to bringing 85 Titoist leaders from Yugoslavia to observe American agricultural and industrial methods but this could have very practical results in favor of the United States.

Part of the cost of the broad propaganda effort, it may be noted, will be paid for out of counterpart funds which foreign governments have put up to match Marshall plan aid to their countries. This part of the sum, in fact, amounts to slightly more than the $19,344,000 which would be put back by the Senate committee action.

The broad governmental effort to place America before the world in an accurate light has been characterized as a "great campaign of truth."

To call it a "truth campaign" is more than a matter of convenience for headline writers. It emphasizes the variety of media by which reliable information must be spread. It emphasizes, too, a great responsibility to keep the information materials scrupulously factual—which, in this instance, is to say that they should be more interesting than fiction.

National Labor Relations Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in view of the resignation of Hon. Robert N. Denham as General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board and the politically desperate, as well as emotional, effort of certain Republican Members of Congress to make a political issue over it, it might be well to recall that in the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments made an investigation of Mr. Denham and severely criticized him.

Under consent granted, I include a copy of the drastic report made, signed by 13 Republican members of the committee, among these several leaders of the Republican Party for the Eightieth Congress in the House of Representatives.

The majority report, signed by 13 Republican members is one of the most severe made against any public official.

It will be noted in the findings of a subcommittee and confirmed by a majority of the full committee, the charge was made that Mr. Denham was construing the Taft-Hartley Act contrary to the intent of Congress; also about certain interpretations by the Board or the General Counsel will not be "in keeping with the will or the intent of Congress"; also the direct finding and charge that in an interpretation of the Taft-Hartley Act made by Mr. Denham it "is not warranted either by the previous history of interpretation and administration of the Wagner Act, by the debates on the bill or by the terms of the act itself"; and also "the subcommittee looks upon this proposed interpretation as an attempt, by administrative interpretation, to give the country administrative law in the place and stead of law enacted by the Congress." There is in the report the charge that Mr. Denham was attempting "to override, in effect, repeal—legislative enactment."

These are charges made by a Republican controlled committee about the Honorable Robert N. Denham. We now witness Republican Members of the Congress criticizing President Truman for asking Mr. Denham for his resignation.

In view of this report, President Truman has treated Mr. Denham most considerately.

In any event, this report, signed by 13 prominent Republican Members of the House places the Republicans in a very embarrassing and untenable position in trying to make a political issue out of the matter.

In view of this report, the issue is on the side of the Democratic Party—not the Republican Party.

The report follows:

INVESTIGATION TO ASCERTAIN SCOPE OF INTERPRETATION BY GENERAL COUNSEL OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD OF THE TERM "AFFECTING COMMERCE," AS USED IN THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947

On May 26, 1948, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments had before it for consideration the report of the joint subcommittees of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the House Committee on Education and Labor, investigating the scope of the interpretation by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board of the term "affecting commerce," as used in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947.

The report of the joint subcommittees was unanimous, except that O. C. FISHER, Democrat, of Texas, because of other official duties, was unable to participate in the hearings or the writing of the report.

After full consideration of the report as submitted by the joint subcommittees, upon motion duly made and seconded, the report of said joint subcommittees was approved and adopted as the report of the full Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. The chairman of said committee was directed to transmit a copy to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

In the forenoon of May 6, 1948, complaints were made to the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments of the House of Representatives by Representatives of hotels and taverns, alleging that Mr. Robert N. Denham, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, was about to issue an interpretation of the term "affecting commerce," as it was written in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, hereinafter referred to as the Taft-Hartley Act.

It was alleged that the new interpretation enlarged the meaning of that term as it had been interpreted by the National Labor Relations Board functioning under the so-called Wagner Act and as construed by the Federal courts.

It was contended by the complainants that the new interpretation of the language would bring within the purview of the act and the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board practically every retail establishment and industrial plant, no matter how small or how restricted its operations.

The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments appointed a subcommittee of that committee and, because the House Committee on Education and Labor was the author of the original act, requested the chairman of that committee, the Honorable Fred A. Hartley, Jr., to appoint a subcommittee of that committee to sit with the subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. The Honorable Fred A. Hartley, Jr., graciously complied with that request and appointed RALPH W. GWINN, Republican, of New York; WALTER F. BREHM, Republican, of Ohio, and O. C. FISHER, Democrat, of Texas.

Appearing on the subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments were: CLARE E. HOFFMAN, Republican, of Michigan, chairman; RALPH HARVEY, Republican, of Indiana; and J. FRANK WILSON, Democrat, of Texas.

On the following day hearings were held, and at that time Mr. J. W. Brown, general counsel for the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, appeared as a witness.

Also appearing as witnesses were: Bruce Anderson, representing the American Hotel Association; James W. Foristel, executive director, Select Committee to Conduct a Study and Investigation of the Problems of Small Business, House of Representatives; Kenneth Lane, director, employer-employee relations, American Hotel Association; and M. O. Ryan, Washington representative for the American Hotel Association.

At the afternoon session, Mr. Robert N. Denham, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, appeared and, in answer to questions, outlined the new policy of the Board. He frankly stated that he was about to place a new interpretation upon the term "affecting commerce" which would be a radical departure from the meaning of the term as it had previously been interpreted and administered by the Board under the Wagner Act. He did not deny that the new interpretation was more inclusive than the meaning which had been given the same term by the Supreme Court in cases construing the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Wagner Act.

He expressed the thought that the new and broader construction was necessary in order to effectuate the purposes of the Taft-Hartley Act. He cited, as some of the reasons for that opinion, the fact that the Taft-Hartley Act gave protection to one union against another, to union employees from certain activities by union officers and unions, and to certain employers.

Mr. Denham, queried as to the new interpretation, testified (p. 16 of hearings):

"The present thought of the Board * * * is that it is a rare case in which business does not affect commerce in some degree, and that where commerce is affected, the Board has jurisdiction."

This new interpretation of the term "affecting commerce" (which is the same language used in the Fair Labor Standards Act and in the Wagner Act) will bring within the purview of the Taft-Hartley Act, and under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, not only all those businesses and industries heretofore held to be operating within the meaning of that term, but banks, insurance companies, hotels, restaurants, taverns, many of those operating and occupying office buildings and many other private enterprises which were never heretofore considered to be engaged in interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. Denham contended that his interpretation was mandatory under section 10 (a) of the Taft-Hartley Act (p. 17 of hearings).

That section is as follows:

"The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce. This power shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise: Provided, That the Board is empowered by agreement with any agency of any State or Territory to cede to such agency jurisdiction over any cases in any industry (other than mining, manufacturing, communications, and transportation except where predominantly local in character) even though such cases may involve labor disputes affecting commerce, unless the provision of the State or Territorial statute applicable to the determination of such cases by such agency is inconsistent with the corresponding provision of this act or has received a construction inconsistent therewith."

In response to a question as to the extent of the jurisdiction which he proposed to exercise, Mr. Denham testified (p. 18 of hearings):

"The CHAIRMAN. Am I correct, then, in the assumption that where any material comes in from across a State line and is used by the local industry, under the Taft-Hartley Act you have jurisdiction?

"Mr. DENHAM. I my opinion, yes sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. And if complaint is made you will take it?

"Mr. DENHAM. Oh, yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. You are forced to?

"Mr. DENHAM. Unless it would come within the de minimis doctrine of a few dollars involved, I think we would have no option but to accept it.

* * * * * *

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, there is no business, then, that you would not have jurisdiction over?

"Mr. DENHAM. I can conceive of very few businesses over which there is not at least technical jurisdiction."

Mr. Denham, to give an illustration of the new interpretation, explained that a local laundry, doing but a regular house-to-house business, probably would not fall within the meaning of the new interpretation. He added, however, that if a laundry handled uniforms for General Motors Corp., that laundry handling the uniforms of employees of a corporation which was engaged in interstate commerce would be within the Board's jurisdiction (pp. 19 and 20 of hearings).

Mr. Denham was asked (p. 18 of hearings):

"The CHAIRMAN. Well then, assume, for example, that they did not mine any coal in Indiana, which they do, and there is an industry there which ships in coal, which sells its product wholly within the State, operating on coal which comes in from West Virginia.

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. You would have jurisdiction there and would have to take it?

"Mr. DENHAM. Definitely."

Mr. Denham also called attention to a case where a window cleaner, washing windows in an office building where there were tenants transacting interstate business, had been held to be engaged in an occupation affecting interstate commerce.

Another illustration offered in the hearings covered the case of a small tavern which employed one bartender. In this hypothetical case, the tavern sold only beer and wine. The beer was manufactured locally. But the hops were shipped to the brewery from California to make the beer in another State.

Mr. J. W. Brown, general counsel for the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, referring to a conversation with Mr. Denham which occurred a few days previously, in which the proposed action was discussed, testified (pp. 2 and 3 of hearings):

"Mr. BROWN. Let me give you an example of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are you giving this now as one which he cited?

"Mr. BROWN. Yes; I am giving you an example that we discussed.

"Take the smallest establishment in the field that I am concerned with—the little tavern—where there is a single bartender employed. There is an owner and perhaps one bartender. Suppose it were in a field where they only sell beer and wine. The beer is manufactured locally, but the hops were shipped in from California—or say another State.

"Mr. Denham's view is that he is inclined to feel that since the hops were shipped in, if there were a labor dispute in that particular tavern, the shipment of hops would be obstructed or at least would cease, and there is something affecting commerce.

"The CHAIRMAN. You say 'hops' in this tavern. Does the tavern keeper make the beer?

"Mr. BROWN. No; he purchases the beer, but the ingredients that go into the beer are shipped in interstate commerce to the manufacturer in his own community. Thus, with a definition of that sort, every industry that you can think of affects interstate commerce.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is to say, then, that if a hotel man bought a pie, if the eggs in that pie came from Michigan and the pie was sold down here in Washington, that would be interstate commerce. Is that it?

"Mr. BROWN. That is the general tendency under this term in the present administration of the law.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then, there would be no distinction between interstate and intrastate commerce?

"Mr. BROWN. Exactly what I would say."

The foregoing illustrates the line of reasoning by which the National Labor Relations Board presumes to assert jurisdiction over every tavern, small restaurant, small business in the land.

The statement of the subcommittee members, repeated many times in the hearings, was that, since the language of the jurisdiction section of the Taft-Hartley Act had been taken verbatim from the old Wagner Act, Congress did not intend to enlarge the range of jurisdiction under the new law.

Mr. J. W. Brown testified that the new range of jurisdiction would bring within the authority of the Board at least 400,000 members of his union, the hotel and Restaurant Employees International Union.

All of these workers previously had considered themselves engaged in purely intrastate commerce, and hence not within the jurisdiction of the Board. It was indicated by Mr. Brown that many such rulings on jurisdiction might bring under the Board and subject to the Taft-Hartley Act a new army of several million local workers who are now engaged in what heretofore always has been considered intrastate business.

By such interpretation of the act, every corner grocer and every two-man shop in the country, which received or shipped material which crossed a State line, would find itself within the range of NLRB authority, save where the Board itself elected not to assert jurisdiction under the de minimis rule.

Mr. Brown argued insistently that such application of the act would impose a grievous and unfair burden on the small-business men of the Nation, by reason of the fact that they were not familiar with NLRB law and procedures and would be compelled, therefore, to bear heavy legal expenses to conform to all NLRB rules and orders.

Mr. Brown also contended that the new interpretation, if adopted, would create confusion in labor's ranks and render it more difficult for the unions to operate successfully. He vigorously protested the adoption of the new meaning.

Certainly it was never the intention of Congress to impose such a burden on the small business of the United States.

On the contrary, the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act demonstrates that it was the firm intention of the Congress not to enlarge or expand the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board in this respect.

FINDINGS

Your subcommittee is certain that it was not the intention of Congress to include in the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board every small, local business which drew a small portion of its supplies or merchandise from beyond the borders of a State or Territory.

The members of the subcommittee are of the opinion that any attempt on the part of either the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board or the Board itself to enlarge upon its own jurisdiction by interpretation is not in keeping with the will or the intent of Congress.

The members of the subcommittee are further of the opinion, after due consideration of the testimony, that the term, used in both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, "affecting commerce," is too general and will, in the future, be subject to conflicting interpretations, will lead to confusion, so that many businessmen and labor organizations will be uncertain whether they are or are not under the act.

From an examination of the debates while the Taft-Hartley legislation was being considered by the Congress, and from the prior administrative and judicial decisions, the subcommittee is of the opinion that it was not the intention of the Congress to enlarge or extend the meaning of the term "affecting commerce" so as to bring within the terms of that act, or within the jurisdiction of the Board, or of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, small mercantile or industrial businesses doing a local business. Businesses of that nature had always heretofore, by the old National Labor Relations Board, by the enforcement division of the Department of Labor, and by the courts, been held to be businesses engaged in intrastate, not interstate, commerce; as not engaging in business affecting commerce.

The subcommittee is of the opinion that this new interpretation proposed by the General Counsel of the Board to be placed upon the term "affecting commerce" is not warranted either by the previous history of interpretation and administration of the Wagner Act, by the debates on the bill or by the terms of the act itself; that such interpretation is not necessary to effectuate the purposes of the act.

The subcommittee looks upon this proposed interpretation as an attempt, by administrative interpretation, to give the country administrative law in the place and stead of law enacted by the Congress.

It is the thought of the subcommittee that, as long as we have a Congress charged with legislating for the national welfare, and while the legal presumption, at least, exists that the Congress is competent to legislate, the executive-administrative agencies should not attempt—as it seems apparent this agency proposes to attempt—to override—in effect, repeal—legislative enactments.

We find that the definition of interstate commerce, as now applied in most of our Federal agencies, is one which has been developed largely by administrative and judicial decrees over the last 50 years.

We believe that Congress should itself define and limit the term "interstate commerce" in a way harmonious with the practical needs of business.

Such a definition would at once eliminate large areas of conflict, misunderstanding and uncertainty regarding the application of many Federal statutes, and would facilitate Federal administration in those areas which lie truly within the range of interstate commerce.

It is of the utmost importance to the economic life of the Nation that administrative encroachments upon purely local business operations be halted and restrained. We are unanimous in the opinion that the proposed administrative expansion of NLRB jurisdiction, as indicated by our hearings here, presents a dangerous abuse of administrative discretion. Under the new interpretation, unless restrained by Congress, NLRB would have every busines establishment in the United States within its power. Our national history does not afford a more striking example of bureaucratic aggrandizement.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In order to limit the confusion that will result from this proposed interpretation, we recommend that the House Committee on Education and Labor, which is charged with initiating legislation affecting labor and industry, or the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which is charged with initiating legislation affecting interstate commerce, or any other appropriate committee, redefine the terms "interstate commerce" and "affecting commerce," and, by bill, submit a proposed definition of "interstate commerce" and "affecting commerce" to the Congress.

We further recommend that, until Congress has an opportunity to act, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board and the Board withhold any new interpretation of the term "affecting commerce."

ACCOMPANYING VIEWS OF HON. JOHN W. MCCORMACK

An examination of the evidence, particularly that of R. N. Denham, General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, clearly shows that the purposes and objectives of the Taft-Hartley Act differ in important respects from the Wagner Act, and in a manner, evidenced by this report, that the proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act never contemplated.

A reading of Mr. Denham's testimony clearly supports this statement.

The evidence in the hearing brings out forcibly the vast delegation of power vested in the General Counsel by the Taft-Hartley Act, practically unlimited in his interpretation of the words "affecting commerce." The evidence also portrays the anguish of the proponents of the Taft-Hartley bill in waking up to what they have done.

Mr. Denham's testimony sharply presents the fact that the relationship developed between the Federal Government under the Wagner Act and the several State governments under their labor legislation has been seriously disturbed and in at least the case of one State completely terminated.

As Mr. Denham points out on page 16 of the hearings—

"Under the Wagner Act there was just one class of complainants. These were the labor organizations or individuals who desired to file charges, and there was only one class of respondents, and that was the employer. So all charges were directed to employers, and all unfair labor practices were unfair practices of employers as they were defined in the Wagner Act."

He also said in this connection, on page 17 of the hearings:

"Under the present act, we have several different types of elections that are different from what were provided for in the Wagner Act. We have cases where elections may be inaugurated on petitions filed by the employees themselves. The authority of an employer to petition for an election is very greatly broadened over what it was under the regulations of the old Board. The union-shop election is a brand-new thing we had never heard of before. And, in the field of unfair labor practices, now an employer may file charges of unfair labor practices against labor organizations if certain things are committed. Employees themselves may file charges against either employers or against labor organizations, and, in fact, in some cases one labor organization can file a charge against another.

"So that the complexion of the act is very greatly changed. Under the old act, the Board had a very happy relation with the New York State Labor Relations Board, which operated under a little Wagner Act practically identical with the one that preceded the Taft-Hartley Act here; and there, under that arrangement, the old Wagner Act Board ceded jurisdiction over quite a large number of classes of cases to the State labor relations board, allowed them to proceed, and they would not assert jurisdiction over them."

In relation to hotels, banks, loft buildings, and then a miscellany of small business (p. 17), he testified:

"We not only do have jurisdiction, Mr. HOFFMAN, but I think our assertion of jurisdiction is almost mandatory. I refer to section 10 (a)."

His testimony emphasizes that under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act jurisdiction would have to be taken over practically all activities; that the Taft-Hartley Act is mandatory in this respect.

On page 20, he testified:

"As I have said before, it is very difficult to find any business that does not have some effect on commerce."

In this connection he was referring to the changed conditions produced by the Taft-Hartley Act.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then there is a change in policy in interpreting the law, or in the interpretation of the term 'affecting commerce'; is there not?

"Mr. DENHAM. There is a broadening of the application of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. Which you think is rendered necessary by this act?

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. And because of the provisions which were not contained in the old act?

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir."

Consistently throughout his testimony, Mr. Denham contended and maintained that the application of the term "affecting commerce" under the Taft-Hartley Act is different than it was under the Wagner Act. It is apparent from his testimony that practically the whole economic life of our country in its relationship to business and labor or management and labor, even down to a corner store, comes within the purview of the Taft-Hartley Act and that this is mandatory under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The following testimony of Mr. Denham, appearing on pages 21 and 22 of the hearings, is also significant as to the extent of the coverage of the Taft-Hartley Act, a coverage that Mr. Denham states in his testimony is mandatory and not discretionary by the Taft-Hartley Act, and showing its effects on existing State laws:

"Mr. DENHAM. Section 10 (a) has to do with the ceding of jurisdiction to the agencies of States and Territories that deal with the handling of unfair labor practices, and it permits the ceding of that jurisdiction only where the applicable State law is consistent with our law that we are now administering, and where the application of that law is consistent with the application that we make of it.

"Inherent in that is that we cannot cede jurisdiction either passively or actively so as not to assert jurisdiction when it is claimed, unless those conditions exist.

"The CHAIRMAN. What is this? I do not quite get this. It says: 'Provided, That the Board is empowered by agreement with any agency of any State or Territory to cede to such agency jurisdiction over any cases in any industry,' and it mentions certain exceptions 'even though such cases may involve labor disputes affecting commerce.'

"Mr. DENHAM. Read the next three or four lines of that thing. There you get the bug in it.

"The CHAIRMAN. It says: 'unless the provision of the State or Territorial statute applicable to the determination of such cases by such agency is inconsistent with the corresponding provision of this act or has received a construction inconsistent therewith.'

"That is the whole of 10 (a).

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir. In other words, we may do that when the State law is consistent with this one, and the application of the State law is consistent with the application we make of the Taft-Hartley Act.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, then, for instance, with reference to New York, what you would be doing, then, is to make your Federal practice conform to the State practice.

"Mr. DENHAM. No, sir; we are not ceding anything. That is just the trouble.

"The CHAIRMAN. You are not ceding anything; you are just following the interpretation put on the law by New York.

"Mr. DENHAM. No; the New York State law is the same as the old Wagner Act, and that is thoroughly inconsistent with the present law, so we do not do business with the New York State board any more.

"The CHAIRMAN. You mean the Wagner Act is inconsistent with the present law?

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir.

"The CHAIRMAN. In what particular with reference to affecting commerce?

"Mr. DENHAM. It is not a question of affecting commerce; the substantive provisions of it.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is what I am talking about. The only thing we are interested in here today is the interpretation or application of this affecting commerce.

"Mr. DENHAM. There is no relation between the New York act and this act on that score.

"The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say a while ago that in New York——

"Mr. DENHAM. That was under the old Wagner Act.

"The CHAIRMAN. And under the New York State law?

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir; the Wagner Act and the New York State law were almost identical.

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and in that situation New York handled those cases because they affected commerce, but the Federal agency did not?

"Mr. DENHAM. No; the New York State board just handled them, not because they affected commerce.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, they handled them because they came under the State law.

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes; they brought them under the State law.

"The CHAIRMAN. And the National Labor Relations Board considered that they did not affect interstate commerce.

"Mr. DENHAM. I would not say that. They found it to be easier to let the New York State board handle them and it would effectuate the policies just as well.

"The CHAIRMAN. And now you propose that we handle them under the Federal law?

"Mr. DENHAM. Yes, sir; and under the Allegheny-Ludlum-Bethlehem Steel case we are forced to.

"The CHAIRMAN. My point was, inasmuch as this statute here says: 'unless the provision of the State or Territorial statute applicable to the determination of such cases by such agency'—that is, the State agency—'is inconsistent with the correspondent provision of this act or has received a construction inconsistent therewith.'

"I got the impression that what you were doing now was to make the Federal practice conform to the State practice.

"Mr. DENHAM. Not at all.

"The CHAIRMAN. Well, you get to the same destination.

"Mr. DENHAM. We have made no cessions of jurisdiction to any of the State agencies.

"The CHAIRMAN. I understand that, but you are not following, in your interpretation or proposed interpretation, the same thought or idea that ran through the New York board?

"Mr. DENHAM. I do not think so. I do not know what thought it was that ran through the New York board.

"The CHAIRMAN. They had jurisdiction over these businesses.

"Mr. DENHAM. They were within the State.

"The CHAIRMAN. Within the State.

"Mr. DENHAM. Absent the Federal jurisdiction, they would have jurisdiction over them.

"The CHAIRMAN. And now you take jurisdiction over those same industries?

"Mr. DENHAM. We had jurisdiction, but we simply did not assert it.

"The CHAIRMAN. I see; all right.

"Mr. DENHAM. It was more convenient to let them do it."

The hearings are interesting in that they clearly show that the proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act were not aware of the extent it went in its application as distinguished from the Wagner Act. The hearings are also further evidence of the hasty consideration of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

If the findings of the two subcommittees are correct that the action taken by the National Labor Relations Board, or by Mr. Denham, its General Counsel, in certain cases is contrary to the intent of the Congress, such findings are clear evidence that the proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act are disturbed with and fearful of their own creation.

In connection with these findings, and his evidence that the provisions of section 10 (a) are mandatory, the following testimony of Mr. Denham, on page 27, is significant:

"My job is to take the law as it is written and apply it as I understand it to be."

There is no question but what his position as stated above is a correct one. He considers it his duty, mandatory under the Taft-Hartley Act, to take steps that the two subcommittees criticize, and inferentially, at least, condemn him for taking. It is plainly apparent from the hearings that proponents of the Taft-Hartley Act did not realize what a creature they had brought into legal being.

The hearings bring out in a prominent and convincing manner the mistake that was made in the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

While I make no objection to the two recommendations made by the subcommittees, I think it only fair to the National Labor Relations Board, and to its General Counsel, to observe that if it construes section 10 (a) of the Taft-Hartley Act to be mandatory, as testified to by Mr. Denham, compliance with the second recommendation might place the Board and the General Counsel in an embarrassing position. Compliance with this recommendation might be construed as submitting to legislative dictation, or amounting to executive abdication, or something of that nature, even if the suspension of Mr. Denham's interpretation is only temporary.

So far as the first recommendation is concerned, if carried out properly, some good may result if the Taft-Hartley Act is improved upon. However, if any bill is considered in and reported out of committee, it should be watched and followed closely, because it could easily be used in amending the Taft-Hartley Act to make it more repressive against labor.

JOHN W. MCCORMACK.

A Report on the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SIDNEY R. YATES

OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Mr. Trygve Lie, Secretary-General of the United Nations, at a meeting in Chicago sponsored by the United Nations Association of Chicago in association with the American-Scandinavian Foundation, the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, the Chicago Council of Foreign Relations, the Chicago Junior Association of Commerce and Industry, and the Library of International Relations, Friday, September 8, 1950:

A REPORT ON THE UNITED NATIONS

Governor Stevenson and distinguished guests, I am glad to be able to revisit the Middle West and this great city under such distinguished and friendly auspices.

I met your Governor before I was introduced to his native State of Illinois. That was almost 5 years ago in London when he was a member of the United States delegation to the First Assembly of the United Nations and I was Foreign Minister of Norway and chief of the Norwegian delegation.

It was Adlai Stevenson and his chief, the late Edward R. Stettinius, who asked me to accept nomination as Secretary-General of the United Nations. I am afraid Governor Stevenson, in his desire to lure me from a post in which I was quite happy and from the home I loved, painted the job of Secretary-General in somewhat more cheerful and peaceful colors than events have justified. But I do not blame him for that. He and I both knew very well that the work of peacebuilding was going to be hard and discouraging, although we did not expect it to be quite as difficult as it has proved to be.

In spite of everything that has gone wrong with the world since 1945 I am grateful to him for his part in putting me on the spot—even though it is right on the front line of the battle for peace where everybody, from Pravda in Moscow to the Tribune in Chicago, can take plenty of shots at me.

Governor Stevenson, as a United Nations delegate, also helped to bring the United Nations permanent headquarters to the United States.

Some of my European colleagues wanted the headquarters in Europe, but I agreed with Governor Stevenson. This was because I thought it was essential that the extremely important role of the United States in the struggle for world peace be recognized both by the people of the United States and by the peoples of other countries.

As a United Nations delegate your governor exemplified the progressive, enlightened and democratic statesmanship that the world needs from America. He was respected and beloved by his colleagues and he has maintained his place in our hearts undiminished in the 2 years since the voters of Illinois took him away from us.

Other distinguished citizens of Illinois have joined in recognizing the special responsibilities and opportunities of the United States in the struggle for peace. I know quite well that many here tonight have been pioneers in that respect.

The United Nations Association of Chicago and organizations associated with it as sponsors for this meeting here tonight, have been leaders in awakening the people of this area to the terrible dangers of a third world war for every individual and every family in the world, no matter where they live, and to the opportunities that exist for preventing such a disaster. They deserve the gratitude of their fellow citizens.

As a Norwegian I can understand and sympathize with the desire to stay out of the mess that is at the bottom of what has been called isolationism in the United States. Norway is a small country and we had that same desire to avoid the consequences of power politics and to stay out of what we used to call other people's wars. Because of this, my country followed its policy of neutrality in the First World War and attempted to follow it in the Second World War.

The lesson that war anywhere in the world is a threat to peace everywhere in the world is not an easy one to learn. We in Norway were given a lesson in April 1940, when the Nazis invaded our country without warning. You in the United States were given a lesson when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor without warning.

It is not surprising that the lesson is hard to learn. Science has reduced distances much too drastically and rapidly for society to keep pace. Measured in terms of the time it takes to get there, Chicago is closer to my own city of Oslo today than it was to Springfield—the capital of your own State—little more than 100 years ago.

We have reduced distances in terms of time so drastically that the whole world has been shrunk in a century to the size of the State of Illinois. At the same time we have just as drastically increased our power to destroy the lives and property of our fellow men. This means that Oslo, Norway, and Chicago, U. S. A., and every other major city in the world will be within range of battle in any great war from now on, and all the people in these cities would also be in danger of total destruction, by atom bombs or worse, in such a war.

In these circumstances it is quite clear that the nations of the world must learn to live peacefully with each other and without war if they are to survive. It is equally clear that they are poorly prepared to do so. They have been used to fighting wars and to living comfortably far apart from each other for thousands of years. Now modern science has suddenly confronted them with the necessity for abolishing war and for living closely together before they have learned how to get on together. If the world is no bigger now than Illinois was a hundred years ago, then the 59 member countries of the United Nations may be thought of as like 59 counties in this State—but each county with its own language, customs, religion, and form of government instead of all alike. That is our dilemma.

I put the matter in this way because I want all who are listening to me tonight to understand, in terms of their own lives and their own experience, first, why it is necessary for the United Nations to succeed; and second, why this is so immensely difficult. In the third place, I want to consider with you what the peoples and their governments might be able to do to reduce the chances of failure and increase the chances of success.

The conflict in Korea has confronted the world with its most serious crisis since 1945. Only 5 years after the end of the last war and the establishment of the United Nations, the prospect of preventing a third world war has been placed in the gravest danger. At the same time the crisis has placed before the members of the United Nations the necessity of making a great new effort for world peace.

Let us recall for a moment that the establishment of the United Nations did not, of itself, guarantee peace. The United Nations was created in order to achieve peace by promoting the peaceful settlement of disputes whenever possible; by taking enforcement action to prevent or suppress a breach of the peace whenever necessary; and, by helping the nations to work together to reduce poverty, hunger, and misery in the world, to raise the standards of living and to widen the opportunities for individual advancement and social progress in all parts of the world.

Up to last June 25, when the North Koreans launched their attack, the United Nations had made a good beginning in the work of promoting peaceful settlements of disputes between nations. Together with the specialized agencies, the United Nations had also made a promising start in its economic and social work and in its work for dependent peoples. This was in spite of the fact that from the very first the United Nations was faced with a steadily worsening conflict of power and ideology between the western nations on the one hand and the Soviet Union and its allies on the other hand.

It is not surprising that in these circumstances the United Nations has had failures. What is surprising is that the United Nations has been able to do so much constructive work. Even during the past year, when the cold war reached its greatest intensity, good work has been accomplished. In my annual report to the members on the work of the Organization this summer, I was able to point out 14 major actions of the United Nations during the past 12 months—aside from the action in Korea—which have been or can be of constructive benefit to the world. These include such matters as:

The decision of the General Assembly in favor of the independence of Libya within 2 years. The independence of the Republic of Indonesia after a 3-year effort in which the United Nations played a major role. The renewed effort of the Security Council to settle the dispute over Kashmir between India and Pakistan. The successful maintenance of the armistice regimes between Israel and her neighbors. The part played by the United Nations in the progressive pacification of the northern borders of Greece. The launching of the United Nations' expanded program of technical assistance for economic development. The establishment of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East.

Against these and many other accomplishments of the United Nations must be balanced the major failure so far—the failure to establish the system of collective security envisaged by the United Nations Charter. The main components of this system were to be: First, United Nations armed forces which would be at the disposal of the Security Council at all times for the suppression of breaches of the peace; second, a system of international control for atomic energy and the elimination from national armaments of atomic bombs and all other weapons of mass destruction; and, in the third place, the regulation and reduction of all other armaments with the goal of universal disarmament.

Because of the world tension virtually no progress was made toward agreement on any of these elements of a United Nations collective security system during the past 3 years.

Thus it was in a world without a collective security system that the fighting in Korea began.

This was not the first armed conflict that had occurred since the United Nations was established. There had been fighting in Palestine between Israel and the Arab countries, in Indonesia between the Dutch and the Indonesians, and in Kashmir between the Pakistani and the Indians.

In all these cases the United Nations intervened and by peaceful methods of persuasion was able to stop the fighting and to promote peaceful settlement of the disputes.

In the other two areas of most widespread armed conflict since 1945, the civil wars in China and French Indochina, the United Nations has not stepped in.

The case of Korea differs from the other cases of armed conflict in several ways. In the first place, it is more directly involved in the Great Power conflict over the peace settlements of the last war. The thirty-eighth parallel exists as a boundary line between North and South Korea only because Soviet forces were responsible for taking the surrender of Japanese troops in Korea north of that line and the United States forces south of the line. The military occupation that followed was supposed to bring unification of Korea but did not because the two Great Powers could not agree. A 5-year trusteeship prior to independence had, in fact, been agreed upon in principle but was never carried out.

Then, in 1947, the United States asked the United Nations to take over. The history of United Nations action in Korea is the second reason why Korea differs from the other cases of armed conflict that have confronted the United Nations. For 2½ years the United Nations tried to bring about the peaceful unification of Korea under a government freely chosen by all the people of Korea. It failed because the North Koreans refused to negotiate, refused to permit the United Nations Commission even to cross the thirty-eighth parallel and refused to accept the recommendations adopted by overwhelming votes in the United Nations General Assembly. So the United Nations and its Commission went ahead as best they could in the circumstances. Elections were held in South Korea. The Government of the Republic of Korea was established there and recognized by the General Assembly as the only lawful government in Korea.

Now the North Koreans had the legal right—whatever one may think of the wisdom and morality of their position—to refuse to accept the recommendations of the General Assembly. But they had no right—legal, moral, or otherwise—to attempt to overthrow by armed force the majority decisions of the United Nations. Nor did they have the right to attempt to impose their government by force upon all Korea, whether they liked the government in South Korea or not.

The North Korean attack upon South Korea was the most direct challenge to the peaceful aims and purposes of the United Nations. The power of the attack showed how long and carefully prepared it was. The attack came in such overwhelming strength that it almost succeeded in winning the whole country by force of arms within a matter of days.

It would have been disastrous for the United Nations and for the cause of world peace if an act of armed aggression had succeeded in these circumstances. It did not succeed because of the immediate action of the Security Council and the equally prompt intervention of armed forces of the United States, later backed by other members of the United Nations.

The world owes a great debt to the President and people of the United States for the courageous decisions they made between June 25 and June 27 and for the leadership they were able to give in the United Nations as a result of those decisions. The debt has continued to mount up in the weeks that followed—a debt to the American soldiers and sailors and airmen who, by force of circumstances, have had to do most of the fighting so far in Korea. They are fighting for the United Nations under the United Nations flag and their United Nations Commander, General Douglas MacArthur. Their bravery and sacrifice in the face of great odds have saved the day and may at last begin to turn the tide of battle.

From the beginning the United States forces have been joined by units of the armed forces of several other members of the United Nations. Now additional units are joining in the battle or are being recruited for service in Korea. On the basis of the offers already made, it is safe to predict that between 30,000 and 50,000 fighting men will be contributed to the United Nations armed forces for service in Korea by other members of the United Nations.

Thus, for the first time in the history of the world, the enforcement of peace has been undertaken by a world organization. This has happened in spite of the Great Power deadlock that prevented the creation of the United Nations armed forces contemplated in the Charter. It has happened in response to a recommendation of the Security Council, rather than a command. Even if the Security Council had been blocked by use of the veto, the General Assembly, where there is no veto, could have made the same recommendation, and the whole United Nations action in Korea could have followed exactly as it has, in fact, occurred.

The potential significance of this United Nations action in Korea, if it succeeds, for future collective security from aggression is tremendous. Canada, which is one of the countries raising a force for action in Korea, has already proclaimed its intention of continuing this force as a permanent United Nations force in the Canadian army, ready to answer future calls, should they come, for enforcement action by the United Nations. I believe other countries may come to similar decisions.

Of one thing we can be quite sure. The precedent of Korea will not be forgotten. The world will find it more difficult than ever before, if not impossible, to permit any future cases of armed aggression to pass unchallenged. Enforcement action to restore peace should now become a matter of course.

There are many reasons—both immediate and long-range—why the United Nations action must be brought to a successful conclusion in Korea. This requires first of all increased military aid by the other members of the United Nations. It also requires enlightened political planning and action by all the members of the United Nations.

It will not be enough to win from the North Koreans obedience to the Security Council's cease-fire order of June 25 and their withdrawal to the 38th parallel. The aim of the United Nations is and must be a united and independent Korea in which all the people of Korea are able freely to elect a government of their own choosing. To accomplish this may take a long time and will certainly require, among other things, an effective United Nations program of relief and reconstruction. Korea will be a devastated land after the fighting is ended. It will need time and help in order to recover. It must have that time and help from the United Nations.

A permanent solution in Korea will require more than the freely given consent of the Korean people. Remember that Korea is a peninsula about the size of Florida extending into the sea from Chinese Manchuria and the Soviet Union. It will be necessary for Korea to have good and peaceful relations with China and the Soviet Union, as well as with Japan and the rest of the powers of the Pacific area.

How can this be brought about?

Thus we are brought once more face to face with the question of what to do about the bitter conflict between the western world and the Soviet Union and its allies.

I continue to believe that universal peace requires a universal organization in which nations with all kinds of governments and social systems participate. Within this universal framework there is room for regional groupings and alliances. These may, and often do, serve a very useful purpose. But they are not a substitute for the United Nations and they cannot be. Anything less than a universal organization merely brings the world back to the old system of alliances and counteralliances that has always led to war in the past. It does not matter whether the competing groups are in the form of federal unions or regional organizations. The effect is the same as if they were alliances.

We must remember the fact that the Soviet Union, Communist China and their allies have about one-third of the world's population. What is called the Western World also has about one-third. The newly rising countries of Asia and Africa, who do not desire to belong to either camp, compose the other third. In such a world it would be the height of wishful thinking to suppose that either side could impose its will upon the others by force without precipitating a third world war that would be destructive of civilization as we know it.

What, then, is the answer?

I see none expect to make the United Nations work more effectively in the cause of peace as a world organization with all parties represented in it.

We have first to demonstrate beyond any doubt that armed aggression does not pay. This we have set out to do in Korea. We must carry that task through to its conclusion with unflinching purpose and all the resources that the member governments can supply. It will not be easy, but it can and will be done.

We have next to find a permanently peaceful solution for the future of Korea. That may take a great deal of time and patient effort. A permanently peaceful solution for Korea is not likely in the present state of critical tension between East and West. But it can be achieved as part of a general settlement between East and West on many issues.

This brings me to my third point, a new effort to negotiate between East and West in the United Nations.

Many people in this audience tonight will recall that I made a trip this spring to the four Great Power capitals—Washington, London, Paris, and Moscow. I carried with me a memorandum of 10 points for consideration in developing a Twenty-Year Program To Win Peace through the United Nations. I discussed this memorandum with the heads of governments and foreign ministers of the four countries in a preliminary way. I was exploring, and I neither asked for, nor received, commitments from anyone. Then I sent the proposals to all the 59 member governments and I have put them on the agenda of the coming session of the United Nations General Assembly, which opens in New York on September 19.

This memorandum is what people who are in government service call a "working paper." Fundamentally it is an appeal to the member governments to give the United Nations approach to peace a higher priority in their foreign policies—to make a new effort to use all the resources of the United Nations as the really primary means of achieving peace. Until the Korean crisis came along no government really gave the United Nations the top priority. One glance at the budget of any member government will make that apparent.

Now there are some signs of a new attitude and a new awakening to the meaning of the United Nations.

When the United Nations has won its enforcement action in Korea—as we must—I want to see a new and great effort to start the wheels of negotiation turning again between east and west in the United Nations.

The first of the 10 points I proposed before the Korean crisis was that we start a series of special meetings of the Security Council, as the Charter provides, with foreign ministers or heads of state in attendance. I believe it is necessary to bring the policy-making officials of the governments together in periodic meetings of this kind. We should not expect dramatic results from such meetings. But if they were properly conducted, with private, informal sessions the rule, I believe they might in time lead to constructive results. Certainly I do not see how we can make and progress at all toward a peaceful settlement of the conflicts that divide the world unless the two sides can be brought around the conference table in genuine and honest negotiation.

During my term as Secretary-General I have sought consistently to bring the two sides together. Now it is getting very late indeed. But it is never too late to negotiate in order to prevent a third world war. I do not believe it is too late today.

This is no time for despair.

This, above all, is the time to work and fight for a United Nations peace—a peace based squarely on the principles of the Charter, a peace of genuine collective security dedicated to the advancement of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all peoples.

If the peoples and their governments will support the United Nations—in Korea and throughout the world—with the same all-out spirit they gave to winning the last war, the world may still win such a peace, and win it for a long time to come.

The American Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL R. KING
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial appearing in the September issue of the publication entitled "Made in America Monthly":

We most certainly cannot speak for every American, but editorially speaking for ourselves, we are becoming increasingly tired of hearing the dire predictions and pessimistic opinions continually rampant to the effect that the United States Government, political and economic system, labor-management relationships, the average citizen, etc., etc., is "going to the dogs."

Foremost in every mind with the advent of Labor Day, is the subject of labor—unionized or not. Loud have been the voices in the past that labor unions as a whole in the United States are ripe subjects for communism—that strikes are Communist-inspired. But let us sanely consider that subject. True, there always seems to be a strike in one industry or another and these are a source of annoyance to many. The question of whether or not these unions are justified in striking, or whether management is at fault, we will not attempt to answer here. But, unquestionably and rightly in this country labor has the right to strike, just as management has the right to stop production if they so desire. Also quite true is the fact that there have been one or two isolated cases of a communistic labor leader, but when considered as a group the latter percentage is so small as to be negligible. When taken as a whole, labor has proven its worth in our country by the irrefutable evidence of the huge volume of production which no other nation in the world can match.

Management, on the other hand, has always been the target of such accusations as profit-making, ruining the country by thinking of their capital first and the well-being of the Nation last—the "big business" bugaboo, in short. With it all, however, industry has continually come to the Nation's rescue when needed in time of emergency. American industry pays its labor the highest wages in the world, and is without a doubt the instigator of our living standards, which also are the highest in the world. Industry, too, is responsible for the fact that the United States ranks high among the wealthiest nations of the world.

With the coming elections in November, undoubtedly as has happened during every election in our history, politicians will shout to the rooftops that the Nation will be ruined if their opponents are elected. Democrats will warn that this terrible thing will happen to the county, if the Republicans are elected. Likewise the Republicans will predict that such-and-such dire happenings will occur, if the Democrats are put in office. Our history has shown that the Nation goes on, regardless of political winnings. Undoubtedly we have made mistakes in the past, and will likewise err again in the future, but with it all we have survived our mistakes without noticeable damage.

And what of the average American citizen? He has been called selfish, lackadaisical in matters of national interest, profiteering, hoarder, Communist, Fascist, Socialist, isolationist, and many other comparable terms. Still, he is always on hand when the need arises, whether it be to work 24 hours a day if necessary or to fight and give his life for his country. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating."

We do not intend to sound like "Pollyanna," nor do we recommend just riding along with the tide and let it take us where it will. It is absolutely essential to at all times be watchful to preserve and safeguard our Nation as the democracy it is. Democracy enables us to criticize and promulgate just such dire philosophy and warning as we have mentioned herein. This is one of the advantages we have in our country, and its merit lies in the fact that we are always kept aware of the dangers laying in wait for the unwary or unthinking. But let us never lose sight of the obvious—that this Nation of ours, the United States of America, is a very good place in which to live and one of which each American can be proud. We have done a darned good job in this country in the past; and all criticism to the contrary, we will do just as good a job in the future, whatever the job to come may be.

Essentials for the Improvement of the Administration of Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Harold J. Gallagher, president of the American Bar Association, before the dinner of the section of judicial administration of the American Bar Association at Washington, D. C., September 19, 1950:

ESSENTIALS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

The words, "The true administration of justice is the strongest pillar of good government," are carved large in stone on the facade of the New York County Supreme Court Building in the city of New York. No one doubts their truth. Man has sought for justice since the beginning of time. Webster has said that justice is the greatest interest of man on earth. Too frequently in history and over long periods it has been denied by tyrannical rules. In a totalitarian state it is unknown. In a free government it is a basic freedom.

We recognize that only divine justice can be administered with perfection; but representatives of a democratic government, judges and lawyers alike, must always earnestly strive to show forth perfection as far as it is humanly possible in the administration of justice by mortal man.

Such an administration of justice in human affairs cannot be fairly administered without honest, impartial, and competent judges. That is the first and foremost requisite in the true administration of justice. A just judge is a good judge. He need not be the most brilliant, learned, or profound student of the law; if he is reasonably intelligent and possessed of good, common sense; if he is patient, industrious, and imbued with a passion for administering justice to rich or poor alike, according to law; if he is not improperly influenced in his judicial action by popular clamor or by any biased personal, political, social, or economic views of his own, he is worthy of his high office.

There can be reposed in any man no greater measure of honor and trust than the duty and power to pass judgment upon his fellow men and to determine their rights and obligations. The most sacred and valued rights of man depend upon the judge for their protection and enforcement. Man's rights to life, liberty, property, and pursuit of happiness, as guaranteed by the Constitution, have no reality other than that which is accorded them by the judges who give actual expression to those rights.

This great power for good or for evil in the daily lives of every human being in the land, which rests in the judges of our courts, imposes a solemn obligation on the appointing powers or the electorate, as the case may be, to see to it that the men who are most worthy are selected. This obligation is axiomatic, at least among lawyers, and needs only be stated to insure the lawyer's acceptance of it. If all people really understood how important a good and just judge might sometimes happen to be in their own lives, and that all men are not equally competent and worthy to be good judges, they would, I am sure, demand that only the most able and worthy men be chosen for the bench.

It is necessary for the preservation of our liberties that public confidence in the judiciary and in the judicial process shall never be impaired. No system of free government can long endure without public confidence. The esteem of the public can be retained only so long as the judges meet the rigorous requirements of their sacred trust, and thereby earn and retain the respect and the faith that goes with a proper discharge of their judicial function.

In view of the great importance of right standards in the selection of judges, the lawyers, and the various bar associations, including the American Bar Association, have a duty to promote and, as far as possible, insure such a selection of judges that the interests of the people will be safeguarded. Because of this responsibility, I speak on this subject this evening in behalf of the organized bar.

The American Bar Association last met in Washington in 1932. During the intervening 17 years, approximately 75 percent of all of the judges now sitting in the Federal courts have been appointed. They have been appointed under the administration of two Presidents and a single political party, and all but a comparatively few, 8 out of nearly 200, I believe, have been appointed from a single party.

During the last 17 years, there have been too many occasions when judges have been selected because infinitely more weight was attached to the political desirability of appointing them than to anything else. It is wrong to appoint men to the bench purely because they have rendered political service to the party in power. If such men are entitled to some reward, let them be rewarded in some other way. Political leaders should not be consulted or have anything to do with the selection of judges. When I speak of political leaders, of course I do not mean the Members of the Senate who have a solemn obligation in the matter imposed on them by the Constitution.

No one party, Republican or Democratic, should predominate so overwhelmingly in the Federal courts of the land as is the case at the present time. We need at all times a nonpartisan or a bipartisan judiciary. Judges are members of a separate, equal, and coordinate branch of the Government. They must never be looked upon as subordinate either to the executive or the legislative departments. There was a long period in our history when the Supreme Court of the United States was almost in political balance and it was a period of its greatest prestige. It may well be, and I do not doubt, that judges appointed from a single party can rise entirely above party affiliations in their judgment on the issues of a particular case. But a high predominance of members of a single party as judges of our courts unmistakably lessen public confidence in the nonpartisan character of the judiciary and is, I believe, detrimental to the best interests of the courts and of the country.

The policy of restricting Federal appointments to the membership of the party in power is contrary to our best precedents and marks a reversion to a spoils-system policy from which lawyers have sought escape through the course of many years. The bar acclaimed the wisdom of President Taft, when as a matter of uniform practice he made appointments to the Federal bench without regard for party affiliations. Where the complexion of the membership of the judiciary is so predominantly of one party, a very large segment of the population is apt to ascribe political motives to decisions. And even though there is no basis to justify such a conclusion, it is a natural enough layman's conclusion which is detrimental to the maintenance of public confidence in the courts.

In the handling of international affairs it has been decided that politics must stop at the Nation's boundary, and that a nonpartisan or bipartisan foreign policy is necessary to the country's welfare. That the judges of all courts should be chosen on a nonpartisan basis and solely on merit is equally essential to the country's welfare. No finer statement of the fundamentals involved in this issue can be given than that recently made in the Senate of the United States by Senator GILLETTE, of Iowa, in opposing a nomination of a man to the Federal District Court for the Southern District of Iowa. He said: "Mr. President, when the founding fathers wrote into the Constitution of the United States their concepts of a Government composed of coordinating and cooperating powers, they had in mind the surpassing importance of the judiciary, and of the judicial branch of the Government, and it was their desire to keep it as far removed as possible from the vicissitudes, contentions, hostilities, and prejudices of party politics. The language of the Constitution, as every Senator knows, is that the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint the members of the Federal judiciary. In the instant case, Mr. President, believing as I do that this was a wise provision, and that so far as they could do it, the framers of the Constitution had tried to isolate members of the Federal judiciary from the influences that might be brought to bear on their decisions of the utmost moment to the lives, the welfare, and the destinies of the people, I for one have been insistent, so far as in my poor power lay, to see that members of the judiciary were of the highest caliber that it was possible to secure, to see that partisan consideration should be eliminated, so far as could be done; to eliminate to the nth degree manipulation, partisan horse trading, and factors of that type that might jeopardize the high quality and standard and dignity of the judiciary."

This power to confirm appointments places a heavy responsibility upon the Senate of the United States. It is to be hoped that in the public interest, both the President of the United States when he makes appointments and the Senate when it gives its advice and consent, will cooperate to correct the exceedingly high political unbalance that presently exists, and that due weight will be given to the fine standards stated by Senator GILLETTE.

The criticism is not alone however that the vast majority of our Federal judges are members of the party in power. An additional criticism, that can properly be leveled at certain of the appointments that have been made, is that the best available person has not been selected. It is true that many excellent appointments have been made. But my thesis is that they should all be excellent. There isn't a circuit in this country that does not abound with men of both parties whom the bar would instantly recognize as outstanding material for the bench.

To appoint a truly good man to the bench is a notable act, and so we say give us distinguished men for judges. Let them be men of high character and of devotion to their country. Let them be men learned in the law. Let them be men who have had experience in courtrooms and above all, let them have that fine sense of integrity, honor, and courtesy that makes a courtroom a temple of dignity as well as a temple of justice. Let the recommendations made by the bar of men worthy to fill these most distinguished positions be given the respect and weight they deserve. No one can better appraise the qualification of a candidate for judicial office than his brother lawyers. The bar, in turn, pledges itself to submit for approval only men of the highest caliber, competence, and character.

The American Bar Association has long advocated a plan for the selection and tenure of judges for States having elective judiciaries. As stated by its special committee of that name in its report for the current year, the plan proposes, as a substitute for direct election of judges, (1) that judicial vacancies be filled by appointments by the Executive from a list named by a nonpolitical nominating committee; (2) that at the expiration of the judicial term of office, the electorate vote, with no opposing candidate, as to whether the appointee shall be retained in office; and (3) that if the appointee be rejected by the electorate, the vacancy be filled by appointment in the same manner as the original appointment. Advocacy of this plan grows among the lawyers and laymen as they learn more of its advantages. The special committee urges that each State bar association appoint a committee to consider and report on the applicability to that State of this plan, or possible variations thereof. Influential laymen should be called in to aid in creating a favorable public opinion for the adoption of the plan in those States where the State bar association thinks it applicable. This work is educational in character and favorable results are necessarily slow in coming. But much progress is nevertheless being made—and the good work that is being done should be encouraged and assisted in every practicable way.

Judges of both Federal and State courts are entitled to receive adequate compensation. Due to inflation, the compensation paid to judges in most places is far from sufficient to permit persons with large family obligations to accept judicial office. The judges on the Federal court fortunately have a satisfactory retirement pension system; but much remains to be done in many of the States to provide proper and adequate retirement allowances for judges either on reaching 70 years of age or earlier if disabled after a specified period on the bench. For both Federal judges and State court judges, provision should be made for appropriate allowances to the widows of deceased judges, along the lines of H. R. 7593, which was endorsed and approved by the house of delegates of the American Bar Association last February.

Another requisite for the true administration of justice is the prompt and expeditious dispatch of the business of the courts. Justice delayed is often justice denied. The importance to the individual litigant of a prompt decision is well illustrated by a story of an experience of a one-time Prime Minister of Algeria whose name was Khereddine. He was passing on horseback through the city of Tunis when an Arab rushed to him, stopped the horse and clamored for justice. Amused, the Minister listened and said, "Thy case is a well-known one, I have studied it throughly and since thou wantest it to be decided at once, I decide, as in duty bound, against thee." Kneeling, the man kissed the hand of Khereddine. "Thou hast misunderstood me," said the Minister, "I have pronounced against thee." "I have understood thee very well," said the man, "but I am full of gratitude; now it is finished."

We hear constantly of the dissatisfaction of businessmen with the slow, expensive and cumbersome procedures in our courts. So common has been this attitude among laymen that many prefer to sacrifice their rights rather than to enter into litigation; and many prefer to settle their disputes by reference to boards of arbitration, not always made up of lawyers.

That these conditions do prevail is evident to anyone who will face the facts. No one recognizes better than the members of this section that something must be done to improve the administration of justice.

The section of judicial administration has long recognized what needs to be done and has valiantly striven for many years to do something about it. Progress is being made, but far too slowly, in effecting improvements through acceptance in the various States of minimum standards of judicial administration. These standards were adopted by this association in 1938 upon the recommendation of distinguished committees under the chairmanship of Chief Judge John J. Parker. Your own section, in recently publishing a handbook on judicial administration to assist in this work, has made a very valuable contribution, and you are to be complimented on its very able presentation of the problems. Chief Justice Vanderbilt, of New Jersey, a former president of this association, has recently edited a notable book entitled, "Minimum Standards of Judicial Administration," which should have a profound influence in bringing about these essential reforms.

The law continues to be one of the great professions. Its primary function is in the orderly resolving of conflicts. Social order is impossible without the intelligent and honorable discharge of that function. This function expresses itself in leadership. If need be, we must lead unpopular causes which are not subscribed to by many of our fellow men. We dare not hesitate to fight ill-founded or unreasonable demands, and we cannot stand back when the call comes to serve human needs. Without the work of judges and their advisers, the lawyers, the American concepts of liberty would not be what they are today, and for the future above the whir and din of our engrossing life, we may be depended upon to hold fast to the highest aspirations of our calling.

One of the major efforts of this section of judicial administration has been to drive home to the members of the judiciary the fact that their responsibility for the administration of justice is not confined to the courtroom itself.

In our present crisis the greatest contribution that members of the judiciary can make to the preservation of human freedom under law and to assure the perpetuation of the American system of justice is to simplify and to modernize and to render effective the judicial process from the highest court in each jurisdiction down to the local police courts. No one can perform this urgent task as well as the judiciary. It must be undertaken by the judiciary in each State where needed without delay, with a seriousness of purpose, a vital consciousness of the objective sought to be achieved, and a fixed determination to allow nothing to interfere with the prompt accomplishment of this work. It is hoped that inertia and indifference will not be permitted. This is something the members of the judiciary owe to the country, to themselves as judges and to the profession. If in any State the judiciary cannot unaided do the job, they owe a duty to their country, to themselves, and to their profession to call in the aid of lawyers and of competent laymen who will be glad to help if they will but give them directions. The history of judicial reform in England and in the United States affords many examples of what laymen can do if given competent professional leadership in reforming, modernizing and simplifying an antiquated court system.

There is no time to lose—our institutions are under attack. Let us then, judges and lawyers alike, respond to this call of duty, that justice and freedom under law shall be preserved undiminished for ourselves and our posterity.

Fairness for Red Channels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I am including a prefatory statement which appears in the book, Red Channels, together with excerpts from a recent issue of Counterattack—Facts To Combat Communism, which publication prepared and issued Red Channels.

In recent weeks, Red Channels has been vilified as an instrument of thought control, and its publishers have been accused of seeking to establish their own dictatorship over the entertainment industry in the United States.

It was understandable that the book should provoke bitter attacks from Communist Party organs and leftist newspapers generally. It is difficult to comprehend, however, the joinder in this hue and cry on the part of conservative newspapers. Clearly, the content and purpose of Red Channels has been misrepresented grossly, and it seems only fair that the record be set in order.

Red Channels is a small book containing an alphabetical listing of persons active in radio and television. Under each individual's name appear the names of various organizations in the Communist Party line group with which that person has been associated, according to public records. Much of the information contained in the book is to be found in the files of the Committee on Un-American Activities of this House.

No individual is called a Communist in this book. The record is offered for evaluation by the general public. The basis for each association attributed to an individual is given.

This preface appears in Red Channels:

The information set forth in the following report is taken from records available to the public. The purpose of this compilation is threefold. One, to show how the Communists have been able to carry out their plan of infiltration of the radio and television industry. Two, to indicate the extent to which many prominent actors and artists have been inveigled to lend their names, according to these public records, to organizations espousing Communist causes. This, regardless of whether they actually believe in, sympathize with, or even recognize the cause advanced. Three, to discourage actors and artists from naively lending their names to Communist organizations or causes in the future.

Despite this reasonable, temperate statement, Red Channels has been called a "blacklist" and an effort by its publishers to "police the air waves."

For the information of the House, and in the interest of fair play, I offer the following excerpts from a statement by Ted C. Kirkpatrick, managing editor of Counterattack:

Ted Kirkpatrick has never made a statement, or hinted, that he intended to police the air waves. He has never said, or implied, that anyone mentioned in Red Channels must come to him for clearance or to be absolved, or that he will prescribe what they must do to clear their names. * * *

It is Counterattack's policy that no individual should have the right to "absolve" or convict anyone, in or out of radio, of pro-Communist leanings. Kirkpatrick has helped set this policy and has followed it as long as Counterattack has been in existence.

When all the facts are brought out—as they should be—the public will decide such issues. No one else is qualified to do so.

Counterattack is fighting communism. Its policy is to help and induce individuals involved in the conspiracy to break with it.

If any non-Communist, named in Red Channels or not, who has innocently or otherwise aided the Communist cause, wants help in setting the record straight, Counterattack will gladly aid that person in every way possible.

This has been done in the past. It has been Counterattack's policy for over 3 years. More than one former party member has come to Counterattack for help and has received assistance in getting straightened out, securing a job, etc.

Others, in different circumstances, have received help in clarifying their stand in the public eye. * * *

Red Channels is not Counterattack's record. The people named in the report made this record themselves. For years many of them reaped the benefit of their affiliation with the Communist-front groups listed in Red Channels. Their names were ballyhooed by the Communists in pseudo-liberal circles (and a wide range of other groups in which the Communists had power and influence) in all parts of United States. Even their non- and anti-Communist following was increased by Communist propaganda.

But now that their past actions are catching up with them, they want to dodge responsibility.

While many of them knowingly advanced the Communist conspiracy by the aid they gave Communist fronts, their own economic fortunes were helped. They gladly accepted this part of the bargain. Now that times have changed, they refuse to accept the unfavorable effects of the things they have done.

In the name of liberalism, the objection has been made that in publishing Red Channels, Counterattack has failed to label or classify the people listed in the report. How was the public to know just where each individual named in the report stood?

Could anything be more illiberal than the suggestion that Counterattack should, even if it had personally interviewed everyone mentioned in the report (which it made no attempt to do), pin a tag on them?

In any survey of the extent of Communist influence in any field, the facts uncovered vary greatly. In every phase of American life, the extent to which the CP has succeeded in swaying individuals ranges from the secret CP member who, on orders of the party, may belong to one or two or dozens of fronts, to the naive innocent who has just joined only one front in a lifetime and that through purely altruistic motives.

Between these two extremes, there are all shades of innocents, not-so-innocents, fellow travelers, and party-liners.

No one, not even the FBI, has enough information to pass judgment on the exact status of all the individuals in such groups. For any individual or group to attempt to so judge would be a gross perversion of their right of free speech.

Red Channels was not published to classify anyone. It is as its subtitle indicates, a report of Communist influence in radio and TV * * *.

Counterattack was established a little over 3 years ago to publish current facts exposing Communist activity in the United States and to name those persons who were involved in this activity.

The three officers of American Business Consultants, Inc., publishers of Counterattack, are ex-FBI agents. All had good FBI records. All, in the course of their FBI careers, were engaged in investigating Communist activity and espionage.

Quite some time after resigning from the FBI, they started publishing Counterattack primarily because they were convinced that the American public was not getting all the facts it should have on Communist activity.

The United States press, with few exceptions, was not giving, and is not yet giving, its readers all the information about communism it could give if a real effort were made to do so. * * *

Counterattack has evidence that for years, loyal, anti-Communist Americans have been blacklisted in radio and TV industry. It has brought this fact to the attention of the public and its subscribers in Red Channels and, at other times in the past, in the pages of its weekly newsletter.

For some strange reason, the press which became so irate about the falsely reported blacklist of anyone mentioned in Red Channels, has not expressed a word of resentment about this blacklist of loyal Americans. In all the hullabaloo about Red Channels they have failed to mention it.

The American Federation of Radio Artists (AFRA), at its annual convention in Chicago last month, took official cognizance of this evil. The members of this union, the working artists in the radio and TV industry, know that it exists, resent it and want to correct it.

They passed a resolution ordering the executive boards of their local bodies to investigate the matter and work out plans to combat it.

This blacklist is un-American, undemocratic, and a menace to the integrity of the most powerful propaganda media in the Nation and all those associated with it.

It is revolting that such a condition should exist in America when freedom in every part of the world is threatened by the ruthless conspiratorial forces of communism.

Why doesn't the United States press initiate a campaign to destroy this, the real blacklist?

Mr. Speaker, with reference to Mr. Kirkpatrick's mention of a blacklisting operation, I quote from testimony of Director John Edgar Hoover of the Federal Bureau of Investigation before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, February 7, 1950:

Communists, masters of pressure tactics, are always on the alert to chastise those who oppose them. One front group boasts of having thousands of monitors in every section of the country, who will take up a letter-writing campaign against any commentator who disagrees with what they advocate.

Such an organization, Mr. Speaker, goes by the clean-sounding name, Voice of Freedom. This group, which includes in its leadership persons with extensive records of association with Communist-inspired meetings, rallies, and front organizations, exhorts its monitors to use pressure on broadcasters in ousting anti-Communist commentators and performers.

"They fear you in Radio City" Voice of Freedom declares to its adherents.

It sent repeated alerts to these monitors in regard to the legislation which culminated in the Internal Security Act of 1950, recently enacted by the Congress. It termed this measure, designed to strengthen us against subversion, a vicious bill.

In one directive, it urged:

Monitors in Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and Washington, D. C., get in touch with your local National Lawyers Guild chapter immediately.

The purpose was to organize opposition to the legislation.

The Members of the House will recall the recent documented report of its Committee on Un-American Activities, establishing beyond refutation that the National Lawyers Guild serves as the legal bulwark of the Communist Party in the United States.

Is it not appropriate to inquire: "Why has the non-Communist press, which has excoriated and misrepresented the efforts of Mr. Kirkpatrick and his associates, ignored the blacklisting and pressuring of the Voice of Freedom, one of the radio heroes of which has been a commentator sponsored by the Communist-dominated United Electrical Workers?"

Questions Vitally Affecting Our National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest blessings that fate has bestowed upon our country in recent years was the discovery of two sources of raw material in South America, bauxite from which our aluminum is made and high-grade iron ore from which our steel is produced. The latter will replenish our diminishing supply of high-grade iron ore in the Mesabi Range and enable our factories to continue the production of steel and iron during the critical years ahead.

We are manufacturing four times as much aluminum now as we were in 1939, and are bringing most of the bauxite from which that aluminum is made from South America; and our supply of high-grade iron ore in the Mesabi Range is rapidly diminishing. But fortunately an unlimited supply of that material has been found in Venezuela, as will appear from an article in the October issue of the Reader's Digest which I shall insert as a part of these remarks.

These two developments render it imperative that we appropriate sufficient funds to speed up the construction of the Tennessee-Tombigbee Inland Waterway, which will provide a slack-water route for the transportation of these materials to Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Alcoa, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, and all other points on the Ohio, the Tennessee, the upper Mississippi, the Illinois, the Missouri, and the Great Lakes where they are needed for the production of steel, iron, and aluminum that are absolutely necessary for our national defense, as well as for our civilian use.

It will also reduce the water distance between the Gulf at Mobile and our atomic bomb plant at Oak Ridge by 800 miles, cut the cost of transportation between those points to the irreducible minimum, and at the same time save the swift current of the Mississippi for downstream traffic.

Under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I am inserting an article on the discovery of the large iron ore deposit in Venezuela which, as I said, appeared in the October issue of the Reader's Digest, and which reads as follows:

DISCOVERED JUST IN TIME—MORE IRON ORE WHEN WE NEED IT MOST

Conspicuously alone on the savanna—the flat grassy plain which sweeps across eastern Venezuela—stands a great jungle-covered mountain, 11 miles long and 2,100 feet high. For years no one suspected it was anything but useless rock. But prospectors who detoured around it on their way to the diamond and gold fields 100 miles to the south were bypassing riches far surpassing anything they could hope to find farther on. For the mountain, Cerro Bolivar—until recently called La Parida—contains at least 500,000,000 tons of almost pure iron ore, probably the greatest deposit ever discovered.

The riches locked in Cerro Bolivar were brought to light by a geological survey party sent out by the United States Steel Corp. after a search that lasted 2 years. Centuries-old Ciudad Bolivar, 60 miles away, is now buzzing with talk of the iron boom to come. For to get the ore from Cerro Bolivar to United States blast furnaces United States Steel must invest one hundred to two hundred million dollars in the area of which Ciudad Bolivar is the hub.

The discovery comes in the nick of time. The high-grade iron ore of Minnesota's Mesabi Range, which has been supplying about 60 percent of United States requirements, is running low. Taconite—low-grade ore containing 25 to 35 percent iron—is plentiful, but it must be blasted out, then processed to remove waste materials. This low-grade ore requires huge investment and makes high steel prices inevitable, affecting the cost of everything from carpet tacks to automobiles.

In 1945 big John Munson, United States Steel's vice president in charge of raw materials, went to the company's president, Benjamin Fairless: "If we pour hundreds of millions of dollars into a taconite program," said Munson, "and then some competitor discovers a cheap new source of high-grade ore, we'll be in a bad spot. I'd like to make one last check of all possible foreign ore deposits."

So when the war ended United States Steel searchers and mining engineers went out—to Sweden, Labrador, Mexico, Honduras, Guatemala, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Brazil, Liberia, Venezuela.

The presence of iron ore in Venezuela had been known for centuries, but little systematic exploration had been done. What formations were known were close to the Atlantic, in a range of low, jungle-covered mountains along the south bank of the Orinoco. In this dense area Bethlehem Steel was already preparing to mine a 60,000,000-ton deposit of extremely high-grade ore.

To direct its Venezuelan ore hunt United States Steel called in Mack Lake, a veteran mining engineer. Lake assembled a crew of engineers, geologists, and prospectors who knew the jungle country. Together with native brush cutters they began hacking trails thorugh growth so tangled and heavy that progress in most places was step by step.

It was a country of alligators, jaguars, boa constrictors, and anacondas as well as poisonous snakes—the dreaded bushmaster, fer-de-lance, coral snake, and rattler—and millions of ticks and flies. The hunt proceeded methodically and unsensationally. The parties found some ore, but it was not of high enough grade to excite them. Meanwhile Dr. Cayford Burrell, chief geologist, growing disgusted with prospecting in brush so thick that it was impossible to get any idea of the terrain except that immediately underfoot, discovered that the United States Army had photographed the area during the war. He got a set of the pictures from the Venezuelan Government and retired to Ciudad Bolivar headquarters to study them. Gradually, checking air photos against information brought back by exploration parties, Burrell and Folke Kihlstedt, chief engineer of the party, traced the iron-ore-bearing rock structures south from the Orinoco into the back country.

By this time United States Steel's exploration parties had been tramping the jungle for more than a year. Prospects seemed about exhausted. In mid 1946 it was decided that, unless there were more promising developments, Venezuelan exploration would be stopped at the end of the year.

Then Cay Burrell, still piecing together old Army photos, made a stirring discovery. He was convinced that the iron-bearing rocks, after doubling back and forth southward, suddenly swept westward in a great bow extending across the Caroni River (which flows into the Orinoco from the south) and out into the savanna. Army photos showed that the savanna was broken by several spectacular mountains. To Burrell and Kihlstedt this indicated exciting possibilities. But the Army photos of this area had been taken from an angle and were hard to read. Burrell ordered a new aerial survey.

While waiting for the pictures, Kihlstedt sent a party to investigate a small hill in the region. A local ranch owner noticed their interest, filed a claim for the mineral rights to the hill, then proceeded to ask a large sum for his holdings. The company refused to buy—but the experience was an eye opener.

East of the Caroni River—in the recognized ore zone—all mineral rights were reserved to the Government. It would negotiate a concession only with people capable of developing the deposits. But west of the Caroni anyone could claim mineral rights to land merely by filing a denouncement, or claim, good for 50 years and renewable for 50 more. In this area, local businessmen and farmers, watching every move, might easily beat United States Steel to the claim office.

Kihlstedt, an ingenious Swede, discovered that with the help of a stereoscope he not only could identify iron-ore formations on aerial photos but could virtually put his finger on high-grade deposits. Most of them were covered by copei, a small, tangled jungle tree with light foliage and dogwood-like flowers. On aerial pictures the light-colored copei stood out.

When the new aerial survey was finished, Kihlstedt went to work with his stereoscope. Several mountains west of the Caroni and 50 to 60 miles back from the Orinoco showed signs of huge ore deposits. One in particular, a long rugged mountain sitting alone on the savanna, had rock slides and vegetation indicating an ore body miles in length.

It was then late March 1947. Kihlstedt bided his time until Easter week, when there are big local celebrations. At 4:30 a. m. on Good Friday morning the engineer and three helpers slipped out of town in a jeep. That night they slept at the base of La Parida. The next morning the little party began working up the mountain. Suddenly they came to a 30-foot cliff. It was solid iron ore. "From then on all day," says Kihlstedt, "we walked on high-grade iron ore."

Kihlstedt hopped a plane for Caracas. After almost a week with a Venezuelan lawyer, preparing documents which defined boundaries and listed the legal owners of the land on which United States Steel wanted to claim mineral rights, he walked into the government claim office in Ciudad Bolivar and made his denouncement. He was late. A group of three local businessmen had filed 11 claims in the same area the day before.

Kihlstedt was crushed. But detailed study developed the fact that their claims overlapped his by only a hundred yards and that the rival interests had not claimed La Parida.

How much ore was there in La Parida? It looked big, but in other areas iron formations had often proved to be only a few feet deep. Magnetometers flown over the mountain recorded the largest response for any ore body in the world. The figures were sent to be checked by an outstanding authority in the United States. He replied that the calculations appeared to be correct, but that the decimal point must be in the wrong place.

By the end of 1947 test drilling had confirmed the discoverers' highest hopes. Continued drilling in 1948 and 1949 showed that the ore body runs 4 miles along the crest of the mountain and hundreds of feet in depth. Cerro Bolivar contains more ore than the great Hull-Rust-Mahoning mine in Minnesota, hitherto the world's greatest open-pit mine. Furthermore, in its natural state the ore averages 59 percent iron content compared with 51 percent for present Mesabi shipments.

United States Steel staked two other claims to round out its holdings for a major, long-range development program. Now the Venezuelan Government has closed the area to further denouncements, making it a reserve zone. Anxious to develop its resources, the government welcomes the foreign investment. How much ore United States Steel now owns in Venezuela, not even the corporation knows. Of its new claims it has drilled only Cerro Bolivar. The company talks in terms of 500,000,000 tons proved and another billion tons probable. Some experts believe the total holding will prove greater than the 2½ billion tons taken out of the Mesabi since its discovery in the 1890's.

In the offices of the Orinoco Mining Co., a new United States Steel subsidiary formed to develop the property, engineers are working out the thousands of details necessary to deliver Cerro Bolivar ore to United States blast furnaces. There are two ways in which the ore could be brought out. One is to build a railroad running 274 miles due north to a deep-water port at Barcelona; the other and possibly the cheaper method is a 93-mile railroad running to the junction of the Caroni and the Orinoco. In the latter case the Orinoco would have to be dredged so that huge ore boats could come 170 miles up the river. Meanwhile, other divisions of United States Steel are rushing plans for a new steel mill which will soon rise from the flat New Jersey farmland along the Delaware River. By the time it is in operation, in 1955, Venezuelan ore is expected to be flowing in ample tonnage to supply it—at a rate of at least 10,000,000 tons a year. The company hopes to mine in Venezuela cheaply enough to compete with other ore as far west as Pittsburgh and Youngstown, perhaps even to the shores of the Great Lakes.

American steel companies will continue to develop their taconite programs, will continue to study the possibility of developing promising ore deposits in Labrador. In the meantime, however, every ton of Venezuelan ore used means 1 more ton of high-grade Mesabi ore saved for war or other emergency.

Fire Insurance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Protests Article on Insurance," written by Harry Perlet and published in the June 1950 issue of the American Bar Association Journal. Mr. Perlet's article is in reply to an article on the same subject written by W. Jefferson Davis, and published in the April 1950 issue of the American Bar Association Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROTESTS ARTICLE ON INSURANCE

This letter is written to protest the printing of an article on the value of a fire insurance policy by W. Jefferson Davis appearing in 36 A.B.A.J. 275. To anyone who is in a position to know the actual facts, the article is so obviously biased and based upon such a complete lack of knowledge, or at best a misunderstanding, of the operations of the fire insurance business that it must be challenged. While I am not in favor of any type of censorship, and I believe that nothing clears the air like a good argument, nevertheless I do not believe that it is in the best interests of the American Bar Association to print articles of this type vilifying a great American industry without at least a check on the facts.

For the record, I would like to submit the following in answer to the indictment made by Mr. Davis and to correct, if possible, the many false impressions which, undoubtedly, he has created.

In the first place, it is apparent that either Mr. Davis or a client had a fire loss and they were not satisfied with the adjustment. In view of the thousands of claim settlements made each year, each involving the determination of such an uncertain thing as the actual cash value of property at time of loss, it would indeed be strange if there were not an occasional dissatisfaction, but contrary to Mr. Davis, dissatisfaction is the rare exception rather than the rule. This will be borne out by the complaint department of any State insurance department and by the fact that in the past 5 years out of all fire insurance claim settlements, and the number is stupendous, less than one-half of 1 percent has become the subject of litigation.

The article is replete with broad, unsupported statements bordering upon viciousness and having no foundation either in law or in fact. Examples of these are "the shock that the average burned-out policyholder experiences," the company offer, as is the custom, is negligible and "customary latitude of overinsurance" to mention but a few. In addition, he makes some wildly extravagant statements, such as, that in event of total loss the usual practice is to offer 10 percent. That is not usual practice and even in those cases where the company might refuse to pay the face amount of the policy because of a lower cash value at time of loss, it is reasonable to assume that the offer would be in the neighborhood of 80 percent to 90 percent unless the owner has deluded himself into believing that his $10,000 home is worth $20,000, or unless there are indications of fraud. These irresponsible generalities could be easily refuted if the time and space were available but in the interest of brevity I will confine my answer to the three principal allegations contained in the article.

1. PROBLEM OF ACTUAL CASH VALUE

It apparently is Mr. Davis' contention that if a person carries $20,000 insurance on a building he should recover $20,000 in case of total loss, regardless of the actual value of the building at the time of loss. He quotes the section of the policy regarding "all loss or damage by fire" but neglects to continue on to the provision "to the extent of the actual cash value." It is a well-known fact among laymen, lawyers, and insurance men that "actual cash value" does not mean the same as the original cost of the building or even its present replacement cost. It means the actual value at time of loss which generally is the replacement cost less depreciation. If a $20,000 building has depreciated $5,000 by the time of loss it would certainly be unconscionable to require payment of $20,000 as the owner would then stand to make a $5,000 profit.

Insurance is supposed to restore a person to the condition which he was in immediately prior to the loss but if he gets the value of a new building he would be in a better position. I don't believe that any policyholder could honestly expect to receive the price of a new house for an old one which burned. The amount stated in the policy is a maximum limit only and is not intended as an agreement that at any particular time the building is worth so much.

Mr. Davis deprecates the existence of the so-called moral hazard in insurance, probably through ignorance of what that term encompasses. Moral hazard does not merely include those cases where a person deliberately starts a fire but extends to the mental attitude of the insured who gets forgetful and doesn't keep the place as clean as he used to do or doesn't maintain it as well and all the other little things which can be of great help to start a fire, although not directly responsible for the fire.

That the condition is very real can be illustrated by the following: Let us assume we have a building worth $20,000 in 1947 at the top of the real-estate market. It is not unreasonable to assume that this same place in 1950 is worth only $15,000 in many areas. We must also consider at this point the fact that a great majority of fire policies are written for a term of 3 to 5 years. We then have the situation of a person paying out a mortgage on a piece of property which cost him $20,000 originally but which now is worth only $15,000. It must be admitted that under the circumstances if he can be sure that he will collect $20,000 he will tend to become a little careless. In other words, even though the property was worth $20,000 when the policy was written and is now worth only $15,000, it is Mr. Davis' contention that the insured should get the full $20,000. To state the proposition is to show its absurdity.

The only argument which he advances to support the proposition is that the insured has paid premiums on these values and should recover. This no more follows than would the argument that in case of a partial loss he should collect the face of the policy. He is purchasing indemnity and the face amount of the policy is merely the limit on the amount of the indemnity and not necessarily the amount which the company will pay. It agrees to pay for actual loss sustained and that is the basis of premium computation. In addition, when we consider that the premium probably runs from $2.50 to $5 per thousand per year, it would indeed be a foolish man who would not intentionally overinsure if he knows that he will collect the face of the policy under any conditions. It should be pointed out that if values drop the insured can always cancel off any amount he desires to bring the amount of insurance in line with the actual value and this is rightly his responsibility and not that of the insurance company.

2. VALUED POLICY LAWS

Part of Mr. Davis' difficulty with this whole matter is his lack of knowledge of insurance law and his unfortunate assumption that the laws of other States follow the laws of California, whereas, in fact, California is unique in many respects from all other States in the country. Thus, he speaks about "valued policy" laws having in mind sections 2052 to 2054 of the California Code. This is not a "valued policy" law but at best might be termed an "agreed amount" law. I shall discuss this presently but first we must consider the actual "valued policy" laws.

The modern standard fire policy has always agreed to insure only to the extent of the actual cash value of the property. However, in some States back about 1890 it seems that a few policyholders, either through their own negligence or greed or through the negligence or greed of the company or agent, were overinsured and upon having a loss did not recover the face amount of the policy. These people promptly took their troubles to their legislatures as we are all too prone to do even today in the belief that there ought to be a law. The so-called valued-policy law started with the Wisconsin law of 1895 and in the next 5 to 10 years other States passed such laws until at one time there were approximately 20 States with these laws. It is interesting to note that no new laws of this type have been passed in the past 20 to 30 years and of the three latest insurance codes in the country, each of which contained this provision originally, it was reenacted in only one.

These statutes, in effect, provide that in case of total loss the face amount of the policy is prima facie the amount due and payable under the policy. The statutes were designed to force the insurer to inspect and place a fair value on the property and charge premiums on that amount. Such statutes were poorly conceived and did not take into consideration the fluctuating value of real property as well as the increased cost to the insurance companies if appraisals were actually made. The net effect has been that the companies do not make appraisals of the usual dwellings because the total premiums only run $20 to $30 per year. As a result they rely upon the inherent honesty of most insureds to set a fair value. Because of the fact that probably about one fire in 100 is a total loss the companies, rather than increase rates for all policyholders, take the calculated risk of not appraising dwellings in those States. It is reasonable to assume that such statutes have caused losses to increase to some extent and that in turn increases rates.

Mr. Davis appears to believe that companies voluntarily offer a choice of what might be termed "actual cash value" and "agreed amount or valued" policies. This false impression is created by the beforementioned sections of the California Code which do contain provisions whereby the insured can get an appraisal (by paying for it himself) and then enter into what can be termed an "agreed amount" contract with the company. However, this peculiar California law bears no relation to the true valued policy law.

Contrary to his statement that in many if not all States, provision is made for issuance of the valued policy, comparatively few, if any, are written, the only State in which the kind of "valued policy" which he has in mind is available in California. In the 18 States having the true valued-policy law there is no choice on the part of either the insured or the insurer as to whether a valued policy will or will not be written. The law merely provides, in effect, that in the event of total loss the face amount of the policy will be paid. There is no question of writing one type or the other because the provision is contained in the statutes as a law governing adjustment of losses. It is not even incorporated into the policy as distinguished from the "agreed amount" provision of the California law.

The new legislation in California which Mr. Davis refers to as being watched with interest is really the true valued-policy law which, as we have seen, is at least 55 years old and has been so soundly discredited that it has not been inserted in any code in recent years. The move in California to enact this unfair legislation is not a typical move, contrary to his statement, but just another recurrence of an old problem.

3. UNCONDITIONAL AND SOLE OWNERSHIP

If Mr. Davis had taken the time to ascertain the facts he would have found out that the so-called "1943 New York Policy" is now used in the District of Columbia and all States, except California, Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Texas. It is not used in these latter States because their legislatures have chosen to enact mandatory forms which, in many cases, are not as favorable as the 1943 policy. Contrary to his statements, in every case where the insurance business had the option it introduced the new form.

Further, if Mr. Davis had read the "1943 New York Policy" he would have found that the subject upon which he spent over a page, namely, "unconditional and sole" ownership is now moot. That provision is no longer contained in the "1943 New York" form which, as stated above, is in general use in 44 States and the District and has been since about 1945. As to what his own legislature may choose to do, that is their business, but certainly he should not place the blame on the insurance companies. In addition, it might be added that even when the provision was contained in the policy it was used only for protection of the company and the companies waived its application unless there was some indication of fraud.

For the record, I would also like to correct a few more of the many false impressions which he has created. He speaks of the "fabulously fattened coffers" of the insurance business, implying that the business has made an unconscionable profit over the past few years. I assume that he is referring specifically to the fire business. For the record, it should be set forth that for the 25 years ending 1947 the companies comprising the National Board of Fire Underwriters had an underwriting profit of 1.7 percent. For a business that is continually exposed to conflagration and catastrophe hazards it is submitted that this is a very low profit margin.

He also refers to the $30,000,000,000 of assets of the insurance companies. He does not state the date of his figures, but for the record, as of December 31, 1948, all fire-insurance companies had aggregate assets of $5,600,000,000, all casualty companies had aggregate assets of $4,950,000,000, and all life companies about $56,000,000,000, making a total of $66,250,000,000.

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate my opinion that an article of this type which is so plainly the product of a person whose feelings and pride have been hurt by what he believes to be an unfair loss adjustment should not have been printed in the Journal, especially in view of the obvious misstatements which it contains. Certainly sufficient material of a constructive nature is available for publication without devoting space to articles of this type.

United States Chamber of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

It Took a Bridge of Ships To Defeat the Enemies of Democracy in World War II—But the Bridge Has Fallen Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the Industrial Union of Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of Local No. 1, of Camden, N. J., affiliated with International Botherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders and Helpers of America, Lodge 801, A. F. of L., have adopted a novel, but, what I believe is an effectual means of bringing home to the American people the need of maintaining our shipbuilding industry in an active and prosperous condition. The method they adopted consisted of a newspaper advertisement in the Courier-Post, Camden, N. J., issue of Monday, September 18, 1950. The advertisement carried a large picture of a long line of workers. Over the picture were the words in very large bold type, "No ships are built this way." Under the picture were the words, "Last of the 1000 shipyard workers who were laid off last week at the New York shipyard, lined up for their final pay." The advertisement was headed in large bold type with the following words: "If you believe in America and American principles read this and act now." In the body of the advertisement the following was stated:

IT TOOK A BRIDGE OF SHIPS TO DEFEAT THE ENEMIES OF DEMOCRACY IN WORLD WAR II—BUT THE BRIDGE HAS FALLEN DOWN

The price of maintaining our Nation in peace and prosperity is preparedness.

Twice in recent history, the ability of friendly nations to stem the tide of aggression in Europe has given us the time we need to prepare our machinery of war for final victory. Are we sure that we will have sufficient time in the event of any future emergency?

The world looks to America for the tools to build a lasting peace. The products of American industry must be shipped to the four corners of the globe * * * we should send those products in American ships. Our merchant fleet is not large enough to do that job—and it is woefully inadequate to transport the men and weapons of war if our country is ever attacked by an aggressor.

The amphibious landings in Korea have again proven the value of a strong Navy America must maintain her power on the sea to safeguard our shores from foreign attack.

PREPAREDNESS PAYS OFF

When a fire breaks out and threatens our homes it's too late to organize a fire department.

All of the vessels now under construction in the United States will be completed by June of 1951. Shipways will be empty, shipyard employment at a standstill, and the shipyards idle—and the skilled workmen who are needed to build ships will be scattered in other industries. Experience has proven that once these skilled workmen leave their shipbuilding trades they cannot be replaced.

WE NEED SHIPS—AND WE NEED SHIPBUILDERS

There's only one way to meet those needs—our Government must undertake a program of shipbuilding adequate to meet our needs for security and prosperity, and it must insure that our ability to produce sea power for a national emergency is kept intact in the same manner as our Army, Navy, and Air Force.

Let our Government know that we are vitally concerned about the state of our merchant marine and our Navy, and urge our officials in Washington to take immediate steps before it is too late.

The advertisement concluded with a request to clip out and send to the President a letter, giving the name and address of the sender, and reading as follows:

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Our shipyards are part of our machinery for national defense. Our future safety requires that we be ready and alert to meet any danger.

I urge you to insist upon the immediate construction of an adequate American merchant marine in order to help defend our country in the event of a national emergency and in order to insure domestic prosperity.

Funds To Enforce Our Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, from time to time when I have had occasion to request the Federal Trade Commission to enforce the laws within its jurisdiction and to urge the prosecution of law violators, I have been informed that it is impossible because of reduced appropriations. I am told that the funds are insufficient to enable them to employ the necessary investigators and staff to carry out their statutory responsibilities. Their recent recommendations for additional appropriations have been turned down.

Certainly the Federal Trade Commission is deserving of and should receive much larger appropriations in order to carry out their statutory duties and enforce the laws now on the statute books.

Mr. Speaker, this same reasoning applies to our Department of Justice. They too are unable to investigate and enforce the laws on the statute books, to a large extent, because of the lack of funds. I hope that these departments or law enforcing arms of our Government will be treated with greater consideration than has been accorded them in the past.

I realize that we are criticized and urged to constantly reduce our expenditures. However, these demands to reduce expenditures invariably come into issue whenever our law-enforcing agencies and departments request funds to carry on. Certainly, I have been and am now an advocate of economy in government, but not at the expense of enforcing the laws presently in force and on the statute books. Our laws should and must be properly and adequately enforced, and this requires sufficient appropriations. I trust that due consideration will be given to these agencies for it is our responsibility. Let us put teeth into our extant laws!

The American Legion, Department of Tennessee, Urges Expansion of TVA Power Capacity in the Interest of National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOE L. EVINS
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I desire to include a copy of a resolution adopted by the American Legion, Department of Tennessee, at its recent annual convention held at Knoxville, Tenn., concerning the expansion of the power capacity of the TVA and inclusion of the Cumberland River in the TVA development.

The resolution is as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas numerous posts of the American Legion Department of Tennessee have already strongly endorsed the proposal for congressional action annexing the Cumberland Valley to TVA; and

Whereas at the time this action was taken the prospects of a power shortage that could severely cripple the national-defense effort was much less than it is today and it grows more acute every day; and

Whereas it is clear now that in addition to the full power resources of the Cumberland River, TVA also needs authorization for rushing construction on power generating units on the Tennessee River, its steam plants, and at least two additional steam plants; and

Whereas the alternative to this is a power-rationing program on all civilian consumers in the valley by late 1951 that will mean each citizen will have to cut his power use in the home or on the farm by as much as 50 percent; and

Whereas the war in Korea has thrown a demand upon all of our vast defense production establishments in Tennessee, new burdens that require huge additional blocks of electric power; and

Whereas the way to meet this need in time and to reduce the necessity for civilian power rationing is to get every possible bit of power capacity into production as quickly as possible: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Tennessee Department of the American Legion at its regular State convention on August 27–28–29 at Knoxville, Tenn., strongly endorse the appropriation of additional funds by Congress for a speed-up program on all of TVA's present power generating construction program; that it urge the need for at least two new major steam plants; that it endorse strongly the inclusion of the Cumberland River in TCA, and that it instruct its adjutant to forward copies of this resolution to all Tennessee Members of Congress, the State departments of the American Legion for Alabama, Kentucky, and Mississippi, President Truman, and the Governor of Tennessee.

The above resolution unanimously adopted by the American Legion Department of Tennessee in annual convention at Knoxville, Tenn., on August 29, 1950.

H. I. CARRELL,
Department Adjutant.

Marcus Daly—A Great Mining Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, nowhere in the West is the romance of mining better exemplified than the history of the great copper mines of Butte, Mont.; and the man that took over and brought the copper properties into production by opening the copper-bearing veins in the richest hill on earth.

For the information of my colleagues there is inserted herewith a short biography of the late Marcus Daly—the Irish emigrant boy that left a lasting impression on the State of Montana and the Nation's copper-mining industry:

RECORD OF A PIONEER MINING MAN OF MONTANA—MARCUS DALY

The memory of Marcus Daly on each succeeding anniversary bestirs his friends and brings back recollections of the man and his ways and the power and influence wielded by this captain of industry from the time of his arrival in Montana until the day of his death.

Marcus Daly was born in the year 1841 in County Cavan, Ireland. When a mere lad he came to the United States and, after a brief sojourn in New York, reached California over the route traveled by the early Argonauts, took up mining as an occupation, and followed that pursuit until he died, at first working as an ordinary miner and later as superintendent and director of mining operations. He left the Comstock where he had been employed in the heyday of Virginia City, went to eastern Nevada and was there engaged in the capacity of mining expert; thence to Utah in which territory he was placed in charge of important mining development work by the Haggin-Hearst syndicate: R. C. Chambers; the Walker brothers, of Salt Lake City; and others. Subsequently in 1876 he arrived in Montana, his destination being Walkerville, where at the behest of the Walkers he took charge of and operated the Alice silver mine, and, by reason of the ability he had shown as a miner in Utah, obtained an interest in the property. Selling his interest later on for something like a hundred thousand dollars, Mr. Daly contemplated investing a part of his fortune in property at Grass Valley, Calif., but fortunately changed his plans upon his attention being called to the Anaconda, then but a prospect, with a shaft but 60 feet in depth.

The Anaconda mine was bought by Mr. Daly in 1881 for $30,000, and soon after its purchase he succeeded in enlisting capital for its development, within a comparatively short time making the property a wonderful producer; and when its mineral wealth, together with that of other mines later acquired, was established, laid out the town of Anaconda, built smelters and subsequently a railway to transport the ores from mine to smelter. All this accomplished by his energy and pluck, for had he become discouraged at the outset as others before him, Butte might yet be in its infancy.

When the outlook was the blackest and this far-seeing indomitable captain of men had practically exhausted his resources, it is said a fortunate circumstance placed in his hands a sufficient sum of money to transform otherwise inevitable defeat into certain victory. J. B. Haggin, with Senator George R. Hearst and Lloyd Tevis, of San Francisco, who had been visiting their Homestake properties in South Dakota, stopped at Butte on their way back to California to take a look at the new camp. Marcus Daly knew them well, having formerly been in their employ. He was up against it financially and appealed to them for aid, saying that in his judgment an additional 100 feet or so in depth would demonstrate the Anaconda to be a mine and not a prospect. In the Nevada country, where Mr. Haggin and his mining partners had operated extensively, the ledges had petered out at depth and there was no telling whether a similar situation did not exist in the Butte district. However, having confidence in his judgment, they advanced Mr. Daly the necessary funds with which to continue operations and secured an equal interest in the property, each becoming a one-fourth owner; and for years, until the Anaconda and other mines owned by the four men were acquired by the Amalgamated Copper Co., the Anaconda Mining Co. was what is generally known as a close corporation. But, up to the date of his death, Lloyd Tevis always declared that, though he had confidence in Marcus Daly's judgment, he thought he was chasing a chimera; that the theory upon the elaboration of which Mr. Daly had spent many sleepless nights and all his substance was fallacious, and that no abiding silver-copper deposits would ever be found in the Butte hill. Mr. Tevis and his partners never dreamed that the Anaconda would prove a more veritable bonanza than the Comstock lode. As for Mr. Daly, he never doubted that he would be ultimately successful, and when a few months after the visit of Mr. Haggin and his associates, the shaft of the Anaconda penetrated, as he had always believed it would, the richest and most extensive silver-copper deposit in the known world, Mr. Daly conveyed the news to his California partners in a brief telegram.

Until he came to Butte, Marcus Daly had been given little chance to manifest his genius, but when afforded opportunity he quickly showed himself a master mind, and all who came in contact with the man bowed to his superiority. Marcus Daly was the giant of the Rockies. On every subject connected with his labors he had his own point of view, and what he willed was done, his wish the law, and those with whom he came in contact vied with each other in endeavoring to learn his pleasure. I do not know that any man ever comprehended him, or was capable of fully understanding Mr. Daly, for one of his distinctive characteristics was trusting the very few; yet had he done otherwise, I doubt whether Butte would now be on the map. It may be that at first he did not realize what was under the surface of the ground, but when the fact of the mineral wealth underlying became apparent, Marcus Daly did not hesitate, and forthwith proceeded to pioneer the way and lay the foundation for not only the greatest mining town but, as well, its neighbor, Anaconda, the smelter city supreme.

Three Forks and the Big Hole River near Divide were also considered suitable locations for the reduction works, but the choice eventually fell upon the tract of land on a portion of which the city of Anaconda was afterward laid out, this on account of the short distance from the mines in Butte and the plentiful supply of water furnished by Warm Springs Creek, a spur of the Montana Union Railway being constructed from Stuart to the site of the town and smelters. Anaconda grew apace and the notable and impressive Montana Hotel, when finished, was the apple of his eye. It is said that as originally planned the structure was to have been three stories high. Before its completion, however, Senator Hearst visited the city, and, looking at the building in its unfinished state, said: "Better give it another story. It looks squatty." And that was done, with the result that the edifice when completed was a harmonious whole.

There was but one man Mr. Daly ever appeared in awe of, and that was J. B. Haggin, and why I could never quite make out, although we know that he was the one who made the clock work, and that had it not been for Mr. Haggin and his financial resources the foundation of the present gigantic Anaconda Copper Mining Co. might not have been laid, and the Butte Hill, notwithstanding the marvelous perception of Marcus Daly, still peacefully aslumber; by reason of his extraordinary foresight and faith, Mr. Daly brought it to life, and by his indomitable energy and ability brought forth its hidden treasures and thereby contributed to the wealth and happiness of mankind.

My Record in the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, it is a mandate from the Bible to "render an account of thy stewardship." Throughout my public life, over a period of 18 years in municipal and Federal Government, I have respected and complied with that mandate. I have made it a rule to submit, at the end of each term of office, a summary report of my activities to the people I represent. I regard such action as a moral obligation upon me, as well as a duty owed to the voters of my area who have repeatedly honored me with elective positions of high trust.

Although this Eighty-first Congress is not yet concluded, and I will vote against it concluding, while we are engaged in the conduct of a war, this recital is necessary, now, so that an account of my stewardship will be available for the consideration of my people, as a basis for their voting judgment, next November 7, in the Fourth Massachusetts Congressional District, where I am a candidate for reelection.

It is, of course, manifestly impossible to report my every word and action, in detail, in the brief period allowed. I am prevented from full comment on each and every one of the more than 700 varied pieces of legislation which have, so far, come before this Congress. However, I wish to make clear my personal stand upon some major issues, not perhaps so much in any order of importance, but because they achieved a certain public prominence, in these 2 years of 1949 and 1950.

I returned here in January of 1949, to begin my second term as Congressman, with a few prominent convictions uppermost in my mind, all of great importance. The need to promote efficiency and economy in Government departments; the need to achieve strategic and tactical coordination in our Armed Forces, to meet the ever-increasing threat of communistic aggression which was on the horizon; the need to maintain, in accordance with what the American people could reasonably afford, the operation of the Marshall plan abroad, for the purpose of halting the atheistic, communistic forces in their announced intention to devour the other democratic, liberty-loving nations of the world, and thus endanger American national safety.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION FOR ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

For many years it was my considered judgment the vast, complicated and unwieldy structure of the Federal Government was in vital need of thorough overhauling. It was, therefore, a pleasant duty for me, as a Member of the Eightieth Congress, in 1947, to support and vote for the measure which became Public Law 162, of the Eightieth Congress. It provided for a Committee on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, which became known as the Hoover Commission.

When I was reelected and came back to the Eigthy-first Congress, I was honored, along with being retained as a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, through additional appointment to the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Department. To this committee the great majority of the of the Hoover Commission economy recommendations were referred. After consideration and hearings of the committee, on the Hoover Commission Reports, it was the duty of the committee to advise the Congress on the different plans, submitted by the President, to place the objectives of the Hoover recommendations into effect. As a member of the Expenditures Committee, I actively supported and encouraged the enactment into law of every reasonable plan submitted to the Congress to carry out the Hoover Report. I am proud to say that, so far, during this Eighty-first Congress, 26 of the 35 plans, embodying in whole or in part the recommendations of the Hoover Commission for improvements in Government organization and procedure, are this day approved and in operation; one further plan was fulfilled by separate legislative enactment. Another measure of signal importance drafted by our committee is the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950. This is now on the books as Public Law 784. It is one of the most constructive laws which the Eigthy-first Congress passed. Public Law 784 reorganizes the budgeting and bookkeeping of the Federal Government so that the budget, accounting, and auditing systems of our governmental departments are brought into line and up to date with modern, sound, commercial practices. I have long fought for and favored this accomplishment. I should like two emphasize, in passing, that this act repealed, in whole or in part, 106 provisions of existing law which were outmoded and obsolete. I think it fair to say it is a special tribute to the House Committee on Expenditures to record that competent nonpartisan observers of the current reorganization program—e. g., Dr. Robert L. Johnson, president of Temple University, and chairman of the Citizens' Committee for the Hoover Report—have stated that this is the best reorganization record of any Congress in history.

ARMED SERVICES STRATEGIC AND TACTICAL COORDINATION

Realizing the necessity, because of uncertain world conditions, as well as economy, of encouraging efficiency and integrity in the armed services, it was my pleasure, as a Member of the Eightieth Congress, to vote in favor of the National Security Act in 1947. However, it became apparent, in the ensuing year, the full intent of the Congress had not been completely fulfilled through this measure. I was, therefore, very glad to support and take part in the adoption, in this Congress, of the National Security Act amendments of 1949, now Public Law 216. Among other things, this act provides that the Military Department shall be under the direction of the Secretary of Defense; that fiscal management in the National Military Establishment is to be reorganized to promote economy and efficiency through the setting up of uniform budgetary and fiscal procedures; it includes authority for the organization of inventories of the military departments into stock funds, for the operation of activities in a manner similar to commercial business enterprises. Fiscal authorities and military strategists have noted publicly that this act is one of the outstanding forward military steps in our history.

The unification of the Armed Forces is, in my opinion, of primary importance for the conduct of modern warfare. It was and is my belief that any nation of wealth and resources invites predatory attack by being weak in defense. It has been my continuing policy, as a Member of Congress, to constantly favor sound proposals to keep this Nation reasonably strong. In this connection, I favored an enlarged Air Force to provide for an instantaneous air resistance to any sudden attack from without.

I also supported the adoption of Public Law 110 to define the powers of the Central Intelligence Agency and improve its operation; Public Law 581, which modernizes the internal organization of the Army; Public Law 506, which establishes a Uniform Code of Military Justice for all branches of the armed services and the Coast Guard; as well as many others too numerous to mention now.

FORESTALLING COMMUNISM

Mr. Speaker, we all know that the adoption, in 1948, of the so-called Marshall plan to assist in European recovery was one of the most important decisions ever made by a United States Congress. I felt it my duty to speak in support of this measure and I should like to quote from the speech I made on the floor of the House on March 31, 1948; quote:

The economic illness of Europe, and the prolonged inability of the peoples of Europe to see clearly in the future a time when economic health and hope will be restored, have served to intensify a political struggle between those who wish to remain freemen living under the rule of law and those who presume that tolerable living conditions can only be regained by ruthless subjection of the individual to the Communist power.

The next few years can determine whether the countries of Europe will, in fact, be able to hold to their heritage. Economic collapse, spreading through Europe, may persuade the peoples of these countries to accept the counsel of despair that their basic wants of food and work can be met only by the subjection of their rights under law to Communist control.

The stake of the American people in the success of the European recovery program is great. While the risks are real, they must be faced with courage and boldness. Without an essential margin of American assistance, western Europe cannot be expected to achieve economic and social recovery, the foundation for the maintenance of the institutions of freemen. The rise of totalitarianism would not be stemmed; it would be fostered by economic want and desperation. If totalitarianism were to sweep Europe, its repercussions throughout the world would operate slowly but inexorably to compel adoption by the United States, in its own defense, of measures inconsistent with American traditions and the opposite of American hopes. With the persistent slow progress of freemen thus brought to a pause, there could in the future be little justice, no stability, hazardous and transient peace, and the ultimate degradation of the subordination of men to a Communist state.

When the subject of authorization for continuance of the Marshall plan was brought up in the House, during April of last year, my sentiments were of the same nature as expressed above and I favored it. So long as the friendly nations, whom we are assisting, demonstrate a sincere desire to help themselves, and not waste the American taxpayers' generous contribution, I deeply feel it is in accord with practical wisdom and security for our own country, that we maintain this program to a reasonable degree.

If the ruthless communistic power, now stalking through the world, with aggressive purpose, decides to force America in this all-out combat, it would certainly be most foolish of us to discourage the ability of friendly nations to help us defeat the aggressor. For that primary reason, I have supported and encouraged the adoption of the various measures designed to give strength to the smaller oppressed powers in the world whom we have good cause to believe will stand by our side in an emergency hour.

Among the measures approved in this Eighty-first Congress, embodying the above purpose, were Public Law 327, extending aid to Greece and Turkey; Public Law 447, authorizing economic aid to South Korea and Chinese Nationalists; Public Law 535, authorizing economic aid to the European Marshall-plan countries and others; and Public Law 621, authorizing military aid for the North Atlantic Pact nations. I also voted for the omnibus antisubversion act, to require the registration of Communists and otherwise curb their opportunities for sabotaging our war efforts.

Mr. Speaker, there were, of course, many other outstanding and far-reaching problems dealt with in this Congress.

There is no better way to concisely and factually present the truth of my actions and judgments on these issues than including, from the RECORD, actual quotations taken from my speeches and remarks. This I shall proceed to do:

[Excerpts from speech in the House, May 10, 1950]

DOMESTIC ECONOMY—THE OMNIBUS APPROPRIATION BILL

I deeply feel the American people are entitled to a practical demonstration of economy-mindedness in this body, and I fully believe the over-all objective of the reduction which will result from the Taber-Thomas amendments should be accepted. I want to show our own people, our own citizens, by definite gesture, that we know the great personal sacrifices they are shouldering and that we want to ease their load as much as we can. The reduction proposed seems sensible to me; it will be an honest step toward trying to balance the budget. It may well be accomplished by careful administration and provide a morale lift to the taxpayers, which is why I favor it.

As the result of the combined efforts of myself and many other Members of the House, following debate on the above measure, the President was instructed, by law, to reduce through Executive administration the over-all Government appropriation expenditures by $550,000,000, without impairing the national security. I also worked for and supported the creation of the so-called congressional watchdog committees to carefully scrutinize military expenditures to eliminate waste, duplication, and extravagance.

SOCIAL SECURITY COMBATS COMMUNISM

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak in favor of expanding and liberalizing the provisions and benefits of our present social-security law, because I have steadily fought for this objective since becoming a Member of Congress.

I support this bill in substance because I am among those who earnestly feel it is a responsibility of the Government to aid the men and women who have spent a lifetime in the development of this great Nation.

In my firm judgment, adequate social-security legislation is a sound barrier against the advancing scourge of communistic propaganda and philosophy which is challenging us this very hour and is forcing us to fight for our very survival. How much stronger, how much more resistant to Communist intrigue and entreatment our Nation will be when its citizens are assured that our great business system and our Government, working harmoniously together, have established a dignified, humane way to make them eligible for that which every loyal citizen of this great democracy is entitled to receive, namely, security in time of adversity and need. Because this measure is founded upon humane, progressive principles calculated to strengthen our democratic free-enterprise system, I am supporting it.

Mr. Speaker, the above-discussed measure—the Social Security Act amendments of 1950—is now Public Law 734, of the Eighty-first Congress.

[Excerpts from speech in the House on September 1, 1950]

DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

I know the valiant soldiers in Korea, many of whom have already given their lives, and the people whom we individually represent, are turning their eyes toward us for leadership in this crisis. We must not fail them. We have already discussed this problem fully. I earnestly feel there is need of expediency in our action. It is my conviction that, on the whole, the committee bill and conference report is an adequate and sufficient measure for the conditions currently existing. Of course, if current conditions change, then we can wisely move in accordance. In that respect, I will vote for Congress to remain in session to deal promptly with any sudden emergency which may unexpectedly arise.

[Excerpts from speech in the House on September 1, 1950]

EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES AND CONGRESSIONAL ADJOURNMENT

I most earnestly urge that this Congress be kept in session without adjournment until this emergency is over.

Right now, I wish to state my belief that an effective excess-profits tax should be imposed as soon as possible as the cornerstone of a tax program which will as nearly as practicable, place us on a pay-as-you-go basis. When we speak of a new system of taxes on our individual citizens to help pay for our war program we should also reimpose a substantial excess-profits tax which, in my conviction, should be based on current earnings. Today, and as long as this emergency period continues, we must persistently strive for as nearly a balanced budget as we can get. In my opinion there should be no objection to a true excess-profits tax, because war is not, never has been, and never should be a game of profit for anyone, and I think I am expressing the feeling of every fighting military man when I make that statement.

[Excerpts from speech in the House on July 19, 1950]

MILITARY DEFENSE ASSISTANCE ACT EXTENSION

Mr. Chairman, the bill we are discussing this afternoon merely proposes a continuation and extension of the Military Defense Assistance Act as approved in 1949.

No one would be foolish enough to say the adoption of this program is a guaranty that communistic aggression will stop.

Obviously there are calculated risks in this venture. Cooperation with the free is costly, risky, and often exasperating. Fighting alone, by ourselves, is costlier still. We can carry our part of the burden of mutual defense assistance. We may not be able, alone, to successfully carry the whole burden of defending the free world.

This bill is a realistic step forward in the determined struggle of this country to obtain peace, security, and freedom for ourselves and the world.

[Excerpts from speech in the House, August 11, 1949]

MINIMUM WAGE RAISE

Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising at this moment is to appeal to my colleagues to concentrate their attention on what is now the outstanding feature of his legislation. An amendment has been included to raise the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour. Mainly because of that fact, it is my intention to support this measure.

The figure of 40 cents an hour, presently existing, was determined in 1938. Even then the Congress recognized that the statutory minimum wage of 40 cents an hour did not give a wage sufficient to maintain what we would like to regard as the minimum American standard of living. Let us accept and adopt the vitally necessary, long-awaited improvement of the basic establishment of a 75 cents per hour minimum wage for our American workers and then direct our further efforts to equitable adoption of the exemption discriminations at the earliest possible moment.

HOUSING BILL OF 1949

Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to speak in favor of and urge immediate enactment of this housing bill.

Since becoming a Member of Congress, I have constantly advocated congressional recognition of a relief for the housing shortage admittedly existing in this country. I have personally introduced several bills, one of which was bottled up in the Rules Committee of the Eightieth Congress, that I sincerely felt would materially contribute toward correction of the deplorable housing situation. I am, therefore, very happy to, at long last, have the opportunity of voting in favor of this measure as a constructive step toward providing decent housing for the American people.

We have been genuinely concerned with the difficulties of peoples all over the world, and have appropriated billions of dollars to help them rehabilitate themselves, but we have done little or nothing to demonstrate our concern for our transcendent domestic problems. I submit that the time has come to prove to our own citizens that this is a legislative body primarily existing for the benefit and welfare of the American people.

Just about a year ago, when we were discussing this same subject, I expressed the earnest hope that the early days of the Eighty-first Congress would see proper action taken to encourage the production of homes and rental units for the people of the United States, at prices they can afford.

May I repeat, I am very glad the hour has finally come for me to cast my vote in favor of initiating a program to provide decent housing for the American people who need it most, and I urge you, my colleagues, to adopt this measure without further delay.

[Excerpts from speech in the House, May 3, 1949]

LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. Chairman, as I see it, the fundamental principle involved in this discussion of labor-management legislation is whether or not labor should be treated as a commodity, to be purchased in the competitive market, at a price to be determined solely by the law of supply and demand.

Two years ago, we were asked to believe that the way to American security and abundance, to peace and progress, was along the path of reaction in punitive moves directed against all forms of labor security.

Up until 2 years ago, the consistent policy of this Government has been based upon the promotion and encouragement of free collective bargaining. Where there are admitted and demonstrated weaknesses, we must remedy and strengthen them. At the same time, we must beware of the creation of voluminous and complicated rules which can only result in transferring the conduct of industrial relations, from the parties vitally concerned, to a specially trained group of legal experts, which I submit would be a most disastrous development.

At a time when this Nation and the world is entering a fateful hour of history, let us act without passion and emotion; let us judiciously avoid any threat to our national economy and security by excitement toward industrial strife. Let us reestablish the faith and confidence of both management and labor, in our Government, by inspiring them to reach a commonly advantageous understanding through the peaceful processes of industry-wide collective bargaining.

The task of the Congress is to place the relationship between management and labor upon a sound and workable foundation.

[Excerpts from speech in the House June 2, 1949]

DISPLACED PERSONS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion here affords us the opportunity to rightfully liberalize provisions for displaced persons admission and correct the inequities in the existing Amergency Displaced Persons Act.

When this subject was being debated here a year ago, I expressed, at that time, the earnest plea and hope for the adoption of a measure providing a wider acceptance of our responsibilities than was evidenced in the proposal then presented. I am pleased to observe that H. R. 4567, while not perfect, is a real attempt to extend a fuller measure of just treatment to those suffering thousands of displaced freedom seekers who are yearning for a new life in a new world. We all know in our hearts that their terrible predicament surrounds them through no personal fault of their own.

In advancing our position of world leadership, in these hesitating days, we can speak more convincingly for freedom everywhere when we have done our utmost to give real freedom to those now faced with Communist extinction. Let us implement our European recovery program with this further demonstration of willingness to assume a just obligation toward these persecuted refugees. They are the kind of people in whose behalf the original American tradition of asylum was established and whose immigration to these shores has enriched our country from its earliest days right up to this hour.

I heartfully urge you, my colleagues, to enact this bill into law without further delay.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

It has been my privilege to serve on the House Veterans Affairs Committee in both the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses. My activities on behalf of our veterans, their families and dependents, are well known and have been publicly recognized. I have been accorded personal commendations by the Disabled American Veterans, the Order of the Purple Heart, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the American Legion, as well as several other veterans organizations.

The Eighty-first Congress, as of September 1, 1950, devoted a considerable percentage of its time on deliberation effecting veterans. The record indicates that nearly 20 percent of the approximate 700 laws passed by Congress, related to veterans and their dependents. Among the more prominent actions in this regard are the following: Legislation permitting payment to veterans of retroactive benefits during hospitalization; legislation extending the time for filing in certain cases for benefits and compensation; legislation increasing from 75 to 100 percent the rates of payment for presumed service-connected disabilities and providing liberalization of certain other benefits; legislation granting additional allowances for veterans who have been paralyzed from service-connected brain injuries; legislation defining authority of Veterans' Administration in carrying out veterans' education program under GI bill of rights. Assistance to veterans was rendered in many regards in certain provisions of housing legislation enacted by the Congress.

Right now, the committee is preparing to hold hearings, when the Congress returns in November, on the bill, H. R. 9437, which will provide automatic insurance protection for all those entering any branch of the Armed Forces during an emergency.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS—PROTECTING OUR DOMESTIC EMPLOYMENT AND INDUSTRIES

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I would like to include an excerpt from the statement I made before the Committee for Reciprocity Information, in Washington, on June 14, 1950. The excerpt follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am not personally opposed to the cooperative economic theory at the basis of our trade agreements program. However, it has been my understanding, which I am sure is shared by every other member of this Congress, and the President himself, that the fulfillment of such a program was not intended to eliminate domestic employment or promote the disintegration of our own domestic industries.

It appears to me to be quite contradictory to overextend ourselves in helping foreign countries, through too favorable trade concessions, when such concessions may well result in the dissipation of our own domestic industries and disappearance of employment opportunities throughout many large home areas. I very deeply feel the American taxpayer has been making and is making all the generous sacrifices that can reasonably be asked for the rehabilitation of certain doubtful foreign allies. Any further impositions, by unreasonable tariff reductions, may inflict a dangerous blow to American morale, which must be kept at an increasingly high level during these threatening times.

[Excerpts from speech in the House on August 14, 1950]

POSTAL CURTAILMENT ORDER

Mr. Speaker, I personally introduced a bill, H. R. 8505, similar to the one which we will consider tomorrow, to rescind the Postmaster General's order to curtail residential mail delivery service, because of my intense conviction this order was an unjust imposition upon the average taxpayer and would not result in an improvement of postal efficiency.

Without question, one of the most essential of all Government services, to the ordinary citizen, as well as the business firms, is the Post Office Department. In my opinion, the average person and family in this country has just as much right to expect and receive prompt delivery of personal mail as any department store, industrial plant, bank, or business.

I should like to remind you that, with the Korean War and the expanding military mobilization, prompt and efficient residential mail delivery service is vitally necessary for the maintenance of a high morale in the people of this country and is in the best interests of our national welfare.

I earnestly hope this House will act promptly tomorrow to rescind the postal delivery curtailment order and give back to our citizens the full service to which they are rightfully entitled.

Mr. Speaker, limitations of space and time prevent me from dwelling on multitudinous other bills we discussed here, but I will report on them, at length and in detail, during the course of the coming congressional campaign.

However, this necessarily brief summary would be highly inadequate if I did not list, in part, some of the bills I introduced in the Eighty-first Congress. They follow:

BILLS INTRODUCED IN EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

H. R. 3182. A bill to provide an equitable rate of compensation for specific service-incurred disabilities.

H. R. 5428. A bill to create, and assign duties to, the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for the Marine Corps, and to fix the personnel strength of the United States Marine Corps in relation to that of the other Armed Forces.

H. R. 5957. A bill to raise the minimum wage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

H. R. 7723. A bill to increase permanently the amount of Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States.

H. R. 8391. A bill to amend Veterans Regulations for 5 years psychoses presumption.

H. R. 8703. A bill to allow to corporations an exemption of $25,000 for income tax purposes, and to provide that the combined normal tax and surtax of 38 percent shall be applicable to corporations having taxable incomes of less than $50,000.

H. R. 8704. A bill to encourage expansion of business by allowing a deduction for income tax purposes of certain capital expenditures.

H. R. 8714. A bill to provide for the establishment of a commission to investigate and make recommendations with respect to the distribution of governmental functions and sources of revenue within the framework of our Federal, State, and local systems of government.

H. Con. Res. 215. A concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should rescind foreign-trade agreements with Communist-controlled countries.

H. R. 9741. A bill to authorize the naturalization of parents of veterans without regard to certain requirements of the naturalization laws.

H. R. 9742. A bill to establish a Federal Commission for the physically handicapped, to define its duties, and for other purposes.

H. R. 9743. A bill to provide for the payment of retroactive death pension to widows and children of veterans after 7 years' continued and unexplained absence.

H. R. 9744. A bill to permit holders of bonds issued under the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946 to assign such bonds for the purposes of making payment on certain loans guaranteed under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944.

H. Res. 865. Resolution calling upon Congress to take effective action against the spread of inflation and the high cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, 4 years ago, following my release from active military service, I presented my qualifications to the voters of the Fourth Congressional District, in Massachusetts, for the honor and privilege of representing them in the United States Congress. They accepted me in November of 1946 and reelected me in 1948.

No man could help but be deeply inspired and gratified by the confidence the people of my district demonstrated in electing me as their national representative in the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses.

Since the day of assuming the responsibilities of Congressman, I have conscientiously worked to justify that confidence and trust. The full facilities of my office have been energetically and courteously extended, at all time, for personal service to my constituents. I have cooperated, on every occasion, with the community agencies, social, fraternal, and racial organizations of my district in the promotion of their various objectives.

The expressed wishes of the majority of the people I represent, and a thorough study of the issues involved, have been the foundation for my judgment and action on legislation to advance the best interests of my district and the Nation.

I am happy to present this summary of my voting record on domestic and foreign legislative measures to my people, as the basis for my respectful request for reelection as United States Representative to the Eighty-second Congress, from the Fourth Congressional District of Massachusetts.

H. R. 9313

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, early this afternoon when the legislative situation seemed likely to improve in the other body, I sent a telegram to the President in the hope that he would act vigorously and promptly to insure passage of H. R. 9313 before adjournment. This is the bill which passed the House unanimously on August 22 and provides additional authority for disposing of surplus foods before they spoil.

The telegram was as follows:

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.:

As you know H. R. 9313 was on September 15 placed on the Senate schedule of business to be definitely completed before any recess. With the situation existing at this moment in the Senate it is not clear that any definite action will be taken. In the light of the accumulated losses for unnecessary storage and the probability that at least $3,840,000 would be the amount of the continued waste between now and November 27 and with the threat of extensive spoilage, I do urge you to make every possible effort to see that this bill is passed so that you may sign it and so that these wholesome food commodities can be shipped promptly to people who could and would eat them but cannot afford to buy them.

JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress.

I have computed the amount of money paid for storage on 16 food commodities between February 2, when I filed H. R. 7137 which would have accomplished the same purposes as H. R. 9313, to June 30. It amounts to the staggering sum of $21,088,580.40, which is a completely unnecessary and indefensible waste of the taxpayers' money. Taking that as the average continuing cost, and it certainly is no less because of the sharply increased holdings reported up to September 11, this waste now amounts to $26,188,580.40. If the recess occurs without final legislative action, there will be 64 days between tonight and Monday noon, November 27. The additional loss in that period will not be less than $3,840,000. Of course it cannot be recaptured, but it is tragic to think that it will have been spent so uselessly when we have passed a bill sharply increasing the taxes of everybody. It is even more shocking to contemplate that when we think of how much vitally needed war equipment could have been purchased with such a sum.

Of course, it is equally clear that with each day lost, the probability of spoilage greatly increases. That probability can become a reality. If it occurs, the American people will be greatly shocked and properly wrathful.

Now that the other body had adjourned without taking action on this bill, it seems to me that the only constructive action any of us can take is to urge the President to instruct Secretary Brannan to take immediate action to dispose of so much of these commodities as are threatened with spoilage. He came before the House Committee on Agriculture to urge favorable action on H. R. 9313 because of the probability of substantial spoilage. He admitted in examination that he had the power and responsibility of preventing loss by spoilage under another provision of existing law. If there has been any spoilage the responsibility is clear.

Consequently, I have sent the President another telegram this evening, reading as follows:

SEPTEMBER 23, 1950.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:

I am deeply disappointed as I know millions of Americans belonging to the American Council of Voluntary Services will be to learn that the Senate has adjourned without taking any action on H. R. 9313, the bill to provide for disposal of surplus foods. As I telegraphed you early this afternoon the probability is that at least $3,840,000 will be the amount of wasted taxpayers' funds between now and November 27 to continue this unnecessary storage. In the light of Secretary Brannan's testimony as to threat of spoilage and because of his admission that under other existing law he would have the power to dispose of any commodities threatened with spoilage I strongly urge that you order this action to be taken at once. It seems clear to me that the Secretary must recognize this mandate of Congress in the legislation you approved. Any failure by him to invoke this law and prevent spoilage will be shocking to the American people.

JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress.

I have made repeated efforts to get the facts as to the extent of spoilage or destruction in the past. I have been unsuccessful. Although I shall continue my efforts to secure the facts, to which the American people and the Congress are clearly entitled, I hope the House Committee on Agriculture will schedule hearings immediately upon the return to Congress to bring out the full facts. If there has been no spoilage or destruction, that should be made known. If there has been spoilage or destruction, the extent of it and all facts surrounding it, should be made known. With that in mind, I have written to Chairman COOLEY, requesting that action. My letter follows:

SEPTEMBER 23, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR HAROLD: I know you will be as disappointed as I am that the Senate took no action before adjournment on H. R. 9313, which your committee recommended and which you supported so vigorously on the floor of the House.

You will have in mind Secretary Brannan's testimony before your committee as to the probability of spoilage of food if this bill did not become law. You will also recall that other existing law was called to his attention with reference to his power to prevent spoilage.

You will find at page A6633 in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the letter from the President to Senator THOMAS, dated September 14, urging action on this bill, "in order to forestall spoilage and waste."

I have tried to obtain the facts as to any past spoilage without success. I shall continue my efforts because I know that the American people and the Congress are entitled to the full facts. I am confident that you and the members of your committee agree with me. Since there is the probability of extensive spoilage in the days ahead, unless vigorous action is taken by the Secretary to prevent that, under existing law, I urge that you schedule hearings immediately upon the return to Congress to bring out the truth. If there has been no spoilage, that fact will be welcome news. If there has been spoilage by November 27, the full extent of it should be reported to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN.

For the benefit of all my colleagues, I now want to make available two letters I have received recently as to the locations of the stored milk, cheese, butter, and eggs, with a tabulation, and as to the estimated quantities of these and other commodities as of September 11.

They follow:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., September 11, 1950.

Hon. JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HESELTON: This refers to your letter of August 24, 1950 in which you request the storage locations of certain inventories of the Commodity Credit Corporation which were estimated to be available as of August 18, 1950.

The inventory estimates which were quoted by the Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY on August 22, 1950, represent operating data on availability of commodities and not those which were already in storage. These estimates included the commodities which were already on hand together with any contracts to purchase additional commodities which had not yet been delivered to the Corporation, reduced by commodities committed for sale or otherwise obligated as of August 18, 1950. The summary data from which such estimates are prepared are not compiled in a manner to disclose location of the inventories.

However, location inventories are developed as of the end of each month. Enclosed is a tabulation which provides, for those commodities in your request, the quantities in storage in each State as of July 31, 1950. These quantities do not include commodities purchased and en route to storage nor commodities sold and en route to claimant.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

On September 12 I wired Assistant Secretary Hutchinson as follows:

SEPTEMBER 12, 1950.

Mr. KNOX T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary of Agriculture,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.:

Re my letter August 24 to Secretary Brannan and second paragraph your letter September 11; please advise latest inventory estimates milk, cheese, butter, eggs, beans, peas, rice, Mexican meat, soybeans, grain sorghum.

JOHN W. HESELTON,
Member of Congress.

The reply to this wire follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., September 15, 1950.

Hon. JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HESELTON: This refers to your telegram of September 12, 1950, in which you request our most recent estimates of quantities of certain commodities held by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

The following are the estimated quantities on such commodities as of September 11, 1950:

Milk, pounds	320, 700, 000
Cheese, pounds	106, 100, 000
Butter, pounds	191, 800, 000
Eggs, pounds	110, 595, 296
Beans, dry edible, hundredweight	9, 427, 000
Peas, dry edible, hundredweight	766, 000
Rice, rough, hundredweight	75, 000
Mexican meat, pounds	52, 623, 504
Soybeans
Grain sorghum, hundredweight	30, 525, 000

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

I also, on September 12, wrote two letters to Mr. Hutchinson, asking for information on the amount of spoilage or destruction of certain commodities, and requesting the exact location of the inventories of milk, cheese, butter, and eggs in certain States. Those letters follow:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1950.

Mr. KNOX T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HUTCHINSON: I enclose a confirmation of a day letter I have sent to you.

I would also like to have your current advice as to the amount of spoilage or destruction of any of these commodities and of Irish potatoes, prunes, raisins, turkeys, peanuts, and sweetpotatoes.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 12, 1950.

Mr. KNOX T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary,
Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HUTCHINSON: Referring to your letter of September 11 with the attached data as to the location of inventories, may I request that I receive the monthly reports when they are available. If the report for August is now ready, I would appreciate having that.

I would also appreciate having the exact locations of milk, cheese, butter, and eggs in the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. HESELTON.

Eleven days have passed without a reply but I hope it will be sent to me so that I may advise my colleagues before the final RECORD is printed. I have in mind that we in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania would like to make individual inspections of these storages in our districts. And I hope that my colleagues in West Virginia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Ohio, Alabama, Kentucky, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, Oklahoma, Texas, California, Minnesota, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington will wish to make requests for similar information and to make like inspections. In any event, I do promise to make a report in the final RECORD either with the information if furnished or with a statement that the Department of Agriculture has failed to furnish it.

Why I Am Proud To Be a Mississippian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an article written by Mr. Louis Cashman, a distinguished Mississippi newsman. It follows:

WHY I AM PROUD TO BE A MISSISSIPPIAN

(By Louis Cashman)

Proud to be a Mississippian? Our answer is very emphatically in the affirmative. And we welcome each opportunity to extol the virtues of our native State and to tell its story wherever we go.

We love Mississippi. Here we were born. Here our father founded one of Mississippi's great daily newspapers. Here, in Mississippi, we found our beloved helpmate and raised our family. Here we took over the reins of the newspaper when our father passed to his reward. Here we have reached a measure of success in a great Mississippi community. Mississippi has, indeed, been good to us.

We are not blind to the deficiencies of our native State. We know that in the parade of States, our economic level is still low. We are fully aware that, measured by some standards, we cannot match some other States, particularly in the field of education and industrial development. But we also know we are making enormous strides along these lines and no State can match Mississippi in the rapidity of the progressive march.

DEEP SOUTH CULTURE

The great State of Mississippi has always had the charm of the deep South. The people of Mississippi have heart and courage, and the gentle art of living is practiced with dignity and with zest by our people.

Beset by the terrible scourge of the War Between the States, and the subsequent exploitation during reconstruction days, Mississippi gave to the world a great object lesson in courage. Its people, with heroic hearts, set about to rebuild from the ruins. The courage of Mississippians, displayed under conditions unbelievable to people from other parts of the country, has been, down through the years, one of the great traits of our people. And we are still battling against odds.

We have viewed with immense pride the transformation of Mississippi's economy. The second largest cotton-raising State has learned the hard way to diversity and to get away from the one-crop system. Mississippi's farm population, and we are a rural State, which at the turn of the century devoted its entire time to cotton, now proudly harvest great crops of hay and corn and beans and potatoes. We have, in our State, one of the finest truck-farm belts in the country and the production of beef cattle and hogs is a major item of farm income. Our farming methods have undergone a complete change, and Mississippi has been aided by some of the finest agricultural experimental stations in the United States.

INDUSTRY ON THE MARCH

Through the efforts of public-spirited Mississippians industry has been attracted to our State. Careful planning, wise and well-planned presentations of our advantages and our resources, has resulted in strong appeal to industry, which is on the move, and Mississippi's case is daily being convincingly told. Industrial expansion in Mississippi has been exceptional and is a source of great pride to us.

Our natural resources, the things we have in abundance, are a source of envy to other States. We have climate, we have great soil fertility, we have unexplored mineral resources, and we have already become one of the leading oil-producing States.

We have touched on a few of the reasons that make us proud of our Mississippi. Our greatest asset is our people, a people who are warm and sincere in their friendship—a people whose ideals of honor and loyalty are pure—a people of courage, of vision, and of devotion to Mississippi and her progress.

GROWING ALL THE TIME

Mississippi has made many mistakes in the past and there will be others. But they are not mistakes of the heart. For Mississippi has been blessed with leadership of the type that is devoted to the public good. Her history is replete with stout-hearted, courageous leaders who have guided Mississippi through the wilderness. We are now far out into the open land and the horizon brings promise of more greatness in the years to come. The family income in Mississippi is growing each year and the wealth of Mississippi is increasing. There is faith in Mississippi, by Mississippians, and that feeling is now being shared by others not of our State, because Mississippians are proudly telling her story.

We have been proud to live our life, thus far, in Mississippi. And our eyes are turned to the future, for, as sure as night follows day, Mississippi will go forward and will take her place as one of the great States of the Union. To that end, we will bend every influence and exert every effort. This pledge we renew with every fiber in our being.

We are happy to hold membership in the Helping Build Mississippi Club, because we are proud of our Mississippi.

Address by Hon. J. Howard McGrath, Attorney General of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to bring to the attention of my colleagues the ensuing excerpt from a speech delivered by the Honorable J. Howard McGrath, before the American and Canadian Bar Associations in Washington on September 20. It will interest everyone who is searching for the preservation of American freedoms. The above-mentioned excerpt follows:

One of the vexing problems of our time, to which all three branches of the Government have given their attention, is what might be labeled the domestic containment of communism. To understand the policies adopted so far, and to gage what should be done in the immediate future, regarding domestic communism, there should be clarity of understanding as to what the problem is and what the dangers are which require the application of criminal laws.

In my view, the problem is one of guarding our internal security, and the principal dangers requiring sanctions are espionage, sabotage, and subversion. If that can be made clear, much misty, obscure thinking can be dispelled. Communism as a political doctrine has never had success with, or appeal to, the overwhelming majority of the American people. As a political party, the Communists have captured only a minute portion of the total vote and have won virtually no office of national importance. In the American marketplace of competitive ideas, freely exchanged, present-day communism is bankrupt. The "dictatorship of the proletariat" looks no different, and offers no more, than the dictatorships of the Fascists and the Nazis.

Is it, then, to suppress the expression of bankrupt ideas that we must enact criminal laws, tread upon the constitutional guaranties of free speech, and in general conduct ourselves with complete lack of confidence in our institutions? Obviously, such a course would amount to nothing less than pinning the wings of martyred angels upon the devil's advocates.

But when, to serve the ends of a foreign power and to destroy or weaken our Government, Communists, or any others engage in espionage or sabotage or other unlawful acts of subversion, then we are confronted with a clear and present danger warranting the taking of swift penal and remedial action. Our national security statutes and administrative security programs cover these activities. The statutes and programs deal with treason, seditious conspiracy, advocating the overthrow of the Government by force or violence, sabotage, espionage, registration of foreign agents, perjury and the making of false statements, exclusion and deportation of subversive aliens, exclusion or removal of disloyal persons from Government employment, denial or cancellation of passports, and denial of income tax exemptions to subversive organizations or of tax deductions for contributions made to them. Under the criminal statutes, to name but a few of the cases, there were convicted of treason Chandler, Best, Gillars (Axis Sally), Toguri (Tokyo Rose), Monti, Burgman, and Kawakita. Dennis and 10 other leaders of the Communist Party of the United States were convicted of conspiracy to advocate and teach the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence, and to organize the Communist Party of the United States to so teach and advocate. Viereck was convicted of violating the Foreign Agents Registration Act. Coplon and Gubitchev were convicted of espionage, and Gold and others are currently being prosecuted for espionage. Hiss and Bridges were convicted of perjury, and Marzani of false statements to his superiors in Government service. In the case of aliens advocating or teaching overthrow of the Government by force and violence, in the period 1947–50, approximately 200 Communists were excluded from entry into the United States at the borders and ports of entry, and deportation cases are now in process against over 200 Communists on similar charges. As I stated earlier, the Government employee loyalty program required a check by the FBI of about 2,500,000 employees. Full field investigations were made in about 12,000 cases, resulting in dismissal of 128 Government employees and exclusion from employment of 102 applicants and conditional employees.

In some few particulars, the basic statutes I have mentioned need improvement. The President so urged in his recent message to Congress on August 8, 1950, and there are a number of pending bills which contain provisions to accomplish this. For example, certain language of the espionage laws should be clarified, the statute of limitations for peacetime espionage should be lengthened, the coverage of the Foreign Agents Registration Act should be expanded, and stricter supervision should be provided in the case of aliens against whom there are orders for deportation but who cannot be deported because no country will accept them. Most important, the President should be authorized, in time of war or national emergency, to extend antisabotage regulations for protecting military installations and facilities to include other property and places as he shall designate in the interest of the national security, in order that there may be excluded from industries and facilities relating to the national security persons suspected of a purpose to engage in sabotage or espionage. If we are able to exclude potential saboteurs from defense plants, and keep the individual troublemakers out of vital places, as was done during World War II, we can afford to ignore the soap-box oratory. Proposed registration of Communist Party and front organization memberships, and labeling of their printed political publications, count for little in fighting wily persons trained in and bent upon intrigue and deception.

We appear to be going through a period of public hysteria, in which many varieties of self-appointed policemen, and alleged guardians of Americanism, would have us fight subversion by prescribing an orthodoxy of opinion, and stigmatizing as disloyal all who disagree or oppose them. This hysteria appears in vigilante groups who decree and execute beatings of purported Communist sympathizers; or, who, in more polite circles, intimidate radio advertisers into silencing performers whom they say have Communist leanings. Another manifestation is the recent proposal to investigate the fitness of the Federal judiciary because of displeasure with a decision directing the release on bail of Harry Bridges pending his appeal of a conviction for perjury.

Some proposals for legislation contain the same shrill overtones of hysteria. One proposal to alter our naturalization and nationality laws (H. J. Res. 238), which the President vetoed on September 9, was drafted so broadly as to permit depriving naturalized citizens of their citizenship if they were affiliated with organizations which advocate changes in our form of government even by constitutional means. Not very long ago Mr. Justice Jackson stated for the Supreme Court in the famous flag salute case (Board of Education v. Barnette (319 U. S. 624)), the resounding answer to proposals that would coerce uniformity of sentiment and opinion, when he said:

"If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein."

Techniques of suppression and compelling adherence to the party line are the very mark of communism itself in lands where it holds sway. We cannot afford to be misled into believing that we will be providing machinery to combat espionage and sabotage by adopting such techniques.

If, in truth, our object is to counteract at home, as well as abroad, Communist ideology and propaganda, we have at hand much more powerful and enduring weapons and defenses than repression. It is well recognized that communism has been most successful in taking over in places where human misery has prevailed, where economic security and recognition of human rights were nonexistent for the great majority of the people. To the downtrodden, communism has offered the lure of security and freedom, though always postponing the realization. It has been shrewd enough to aline its propaganda with the just as well as the unjust complaints, and has not hesitated to invent a few of its own. It has played for all their worth alleged differences and inequalities of class, of race, and of religion.

We are not unaware of the imperfections of our society, and, aided with the handglass of our own self-appraisal, we have set out to correct our shortcomings and eliminate inequalities. In the fields of employment, housing, education, and social security, large-scale programs have been put into effect, and have made tremendous inroads upon the poverty, ignorance, and suffering from disease and old age which existed even in this land of plenty. We have not stopped. The programs in this direction have been renewed and expanded to enable Americans to realize a higher standard of living and a greater measure of economic security than ever before. Certainly this is assured, if peace in the world can be maintained.

In addition, we have instituted, and are realizing, more slowly perhaps, programs to eliminate inequalities in opportunities and in the enjoyment of civil rights.

The most heartening progress has been made in the field of education, where slowly but surely the paralyzing grip of segregation is being loosened. The recent decisions of the Supreme Court, in the field of higher education (Sweatt v. Painter (339 U. S. 629); McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents (339 U. S. 637)), are landmarks in this field. There is a spreading feeling of the people expressed in local determinations, many of them voluntary, to eliminate grade school and other forms of segregation. I need not go into the details of the programs, as yet unrealized; or the progress in such matters as the elimination of segregation in interstate transportation, the striking down of racially restrictive covenants in the sale and use of land, and the protection of racial minorities against discrimination in collective bargaining arrangements. The point is that, in total, these programs represent a goal, the gradual attainment of which is being worked for by all thinking Americans, and which is now in sight. As accomplishments are achieved in reaching the goal, they will eradicate division and class consciousness, they will unify us in meeting hostile threats from abroad, they will solidify our international relationships with the many nationalities and races of the world.

If Communist propaganda is a threat, our best answer is this kind of actual demonstration that democracy works, that democracy provides for its people security, equality, and freedom.

The American Bar Association has not been unmindful of the special significance and importance of safeguarding civil liberties. In 1938, upon recommendation of one of the great presidents of the association, the late Frank J. Hogan, there was created a special committee on the Bill of Rights, which is now a standing committee, charged with the duty of investigating substantial violations, actual or threatened, of the Bill of Rights, and of taking such steps as it may deem proper in defense of such rights in instances which might otherwise go undefended.

This was and is a large order. But such is the need. It requires constant attention, and vigilance, and the willingness to risk discomfort when controversy arises. The burden cannot be met by Government alone. This the association has recognized. It has recognized that the defense of civil liberties is the task of lawyers everywhere, with special responsibilities in the organized bar.

May I therefore importune this great association, adding the new note of urgency created by America's position in the international community, to renew the vigorous spirit that gave impetus to establishing a Bill of Rights committee, and to provide the forward-looking leadership which will maintain the unity of our people in the difficult days ahead. Teamwork built this country. The voluntary teamwork of a sturdy citizenry, nurtured by equality of opportunity and rights, will make it even greater.

History of Optimist International and the Optimist Creed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following brief history of Optimist International and the Optimist Creed.

If we could live by the principles taught by this worthy club, we would live in a world of justice and peace. The aforementioned follows:

HISTORY

The first known Optimist Club was formed through the initiative of E. L. Monser, a young insurance man and a newcomer in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1911. Records now in the hands of the present president of the Buffalo club show that the Optimist Club of Buffalo was formally organized on April 1, 1911.

The Optimist Club of Washington, D. C., seems to have been the next to be formed. Its organization was entirely separate from and without knowledge of the Buffalo club; the exact date of organization is not known, but the late past secretary, G. E. S. Williams, claimed at the time of his death in 1927 to have been a member of the club for 15 years.

It rained in Indianapolis on April 15, 1916. Several businessmen stood grazing out of the window into the dripping, sloppy, murky street. One of those present exclaimed: "There is just one more organization needed for businessmen, and that is an Optimist Club." Agreed," chorused the others, and the idea at once became a reality. Three weeks later, 15 businessmen met for luncheon at the Claypool Hotel and formed the Optimist Club of Indianapolis.

Businessmen of Louisville, Ky., caught the spirit and the Optimist Club of Louisville was formed. As Optimist ideals became known, other cities organized clubs.

In March 1919, at Indianapolis there was a meeting of representatives of the Optimist Clubs then formed in the United States and the first convention planned to be held in Louisville the following 19th and 20th of June.

At Louisville 11 clubs finding that each had previously adopted bylaws so similar in ideals of service, banded together and formed headquarters for the purpose of developing and spreading this gospel of optimism. These clubs were Indianapolis, Louisville, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Denver, Chicago, Kansas City, Mo., St. Joseph, Kansas City, Kans., Buffalo, Syracuse.

It is a remarkable coincidence that these clubs, knowing little or nothing about each other, adopted constitutions and pledged themselves to big objectives so similar that later, when they came together, were one in purpose and high enthusiasm. One can ask no further proof of the fundamental need for and spontaneous acceptance of the principles and practical program of optimism.

The 11 clubs assembled proceeded to complete the international association. Constitution and bylaws were adopted and headquarters was located at Indianapolis, with William H. Harrison, of Louisville, Ky., as first president.

Optimist International is the present name of this international organization of Optimist Clubs in the United States and Canada. Its purpose is to foster Optimist ideals of loyalty, patriotism, goodfellowship, better business, help for the underprivileged boys and personal development; to build and charter Optimist Clubs, and to direct, supervise, and inspire their functioning and activities; and to manage the business and funds of the international association. The present slogan is "Friend of the boy," which suggests the personal idealist leadership to every member for which the organization stands.

Optimism has a creed which is beyond comparison. The 10 tenets of the Optimist Creed are a guide in the practice and belief of every Optimist.

Optimism has in its constitution objects which are matchless:

To internationally develop optimism, as a philosophy of life.

To promote an active interest in good government and civic affairs; to inspire respect for law; to promote patriotism and work for international accord and friendship among all people.

To aid and encourage the development of youth throughout the world.

Both the creed and objects are applicable in the life of every right-thinking man, and when sincerely followed, their influence and inspiration are dynamic.

Optimist is a service organization with ideals for the highest achievements. It challenges the best that is in men of high caliber, and through the activities of its constituent clubs, realization of its worthy objects is brought about in the clubs' respective communities.

THE OPTIMIST CREED

Promise yourself—

To be so strong that nothing can disturb your peace of mind.

To talk health, happiness, and prosperity to every person you meet.

To make all your friends feel that there is something in them.

To look at the sunny side of everything and make your optimism come true.

To think only of the best, to work only for the best, and to expect only the best.

To be just as enthusiastic about the success of others as you are about your own.

To forget the mistakes of the past and press on to the greater achievements of the future.

To wear a cheerful countenance at all times and give every living creature you meet a smile.

To give so much time to the improvement of yourself that you have no time to criticize others.

To be too large for worry, too noble for anger, too strong for fear, and too happy to permit the presence of trouble.

Tribute to Hon. Chan Gurney, of South Dakota, by Hon. Milton R. Young, of North Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON R. YOUNG

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I regret that I was absent from the floor of the Senate earlier this week at a time when many fine and well-deserved tributes were paid to my good friend, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY].

I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared regarding the Senator from South Dakota be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, I regret there are many outstanding Members of the Senate who have served for years in this great legislative body, who will not return this next year. There is one in particular that I would like at this time to pay my respects to while there is still an opportunity.

There are few, if any, Members of the Senate who enjoy greater respect and admiration from all their colleagues than does Senator CHAN GURNEY, of South Dakota. He has earned the esteem and respect of his colleagues by the high type of service he has rendered to his State and Nation. He has approached every problem from a statesmanlike viewpoint, regardless of what might have been the politically expedient thing to do.

Coming from the sister State of North Dakota, and having worked very closely with CHAN, I will probably feel his loss more keenly than any other Member. On many, many occasions CHAN has gone out of his way to give consideration and assistance to problems concerning North Dakota. North Dakota has much to thank CHAN GURNEY for—particularly with respect to the help and cooperation he has given our water projects and Bureau of Reclamation transmission line projects.

CHAN has rendered his Nation great service in the manner in which he has handled the affairs of the Armed Services Committee during the period in which he was chairman in the Eightieth Congress, and all the years of his service on that very important committee.

He has been one of the most diligent and hard-working members of the Appropriations Committee. Few, if any Members have kept themselves better informed on the vast scope of Federal appropriations than has he. While rendering this great service to the Nation, CHAN never at any time slighted the interest of his State.

Probably the finest proof of his attitude and devotion to the interest of his State was the effort he put forth, following his defeat in the primary election, on behalf of the water projects of his State and particularly his securing of the sizable appropriations to build the badly needed Bureau of Reclamation transmission line for REA cooperatives in South Dakota, both east and west of the Missouri River.

CHAN GURNEY and the people of South Dakota may well be proud of the fine record he has achieved in the Senate of the United States. I am very fortunate to have been associated with one who has rendered such marked service to his State and Nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement made by my colleague the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON].

There being no objection, the statement and correspondence were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM BENTON OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. President, I have received the attached letter from the three Connecticut directors of the National Association of Manufacturers. I am well acquainted with Mr. A. V. Bodine, president of the Bodine Corp., a most remarkable independent business manufacturing machine tools in my neighboring city of Bridgeport. I am sure that these three men are representative of the great traditions of American industry, as represented by the board of the NAM. It happens, however, that I disagree with some sections of this letter, and I have hoped that I could meet with these three directors in my State, to discuss my views on the issues covered by this letter with them, prior to the adjournment of Congress. It has been in this hope that I have postponed inserting their letter in the RECORD. Now that Congress is about to adjourn, and my meeting has been unhappily delayed, I ask permission to insert the letter but with the suggestion to the Congress, and also to the board and the membership of the NAM, that the Congress read the testimony, and my speeches on the floor before reaching any conclusion on the issues. To tell the truth, I am doubtful that Mr. Bodine and his two associates can have studied the testimony and speeches. I do not criticize them for this because I know the dependence of busy executives on their trade association staffs. I deny categorically certain sections of this letter, and I further deny certain implications in it.

THE BODINE CORP.,
Bridgeport, Conn., July 27, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM BENTON,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BENTON: Our attention has been called to statements made by you on the floor of the Senate which we think gave an unfair and inaccurate picture of the operations of the National Association of Manufacturers.

As directors of the National Association of Manufacturers and also residents of Connecticut, we feel that it is our duty to bring the facts to your attention.

In your Senate speech on May 11, 1950, you questioned the right of George E. Folk, adviser to the patents and research committee of the National Association of Manufacturers, to testify for the association before a Senate committee in opposition to the President's Reorganization Plan No. 5.

Mr. Folk contended that this plan would abolish the independence of the Patent Office and place it under the control of the Secretary of Commerce.

Your complaint seems to us to narrow down to this:

1. That Mr. Folk had no right to testify for the association until each of the more than 15,000 members of the association had read and specifically approved his statement.

2. That each of the more than 15,000 members of the association, before passing on the merits of Mr. Folk's statement, should also have been familiarized with the arguments of opposition witnesses before the committee—some of whom appeared the same day that Mr. Folk testified.

Now, Senator, you must know that such a procedure not only would be impossible, but also would be fraught with grave danger.

It would mean that organizations of more than a very few members would be prevented from ever presenting their views on current legislation to congressional committees and Members of Congress.

They would have no opportunity to point out the benefits of certain legislative proposals or the perils of others. They would have to accept whatever legislation Congress decreed—and Congress would have to act without the benefit of advice and information from those most affected. Surely you will agree that this would be an intolerable situation from the standpoint of the national welfare.

Your proposal also would result in a serious abridgment of the right of petition and the exercise of the right of freedom of speech.

It is not necessary to point out to you that congressional hearings, even on legislation of highest importance, are called with only a few days' notice.

For example, the Senate Finance Committee met on a Monday and announced that hearings on the tax bill would start the following Wednesday—and the hearings probably would have started a day earlier had Tuesday not been July 4.

How then, would it be possible on such short notice for the National Association of Manufacturers, or any other organization of more than a few members, to prepare testimony and have it considered by every member before its presentation?

And how would it be possible for each member of the Association, before considering the proposed testimony, to become familiar with the arguments of opposition witnesses when those witnesses had not yet appeared before the congressional committee?

Your Senate speech indicates that you felt aggrieved because the more than 15,000 members of the National Association of Manufacturers, before passing on Mr. Folk's statement (assuming that this could have been done), had not been acquainted with the arguments presented to the committee by Secretary Sawyer, Mr. Flemming, and Mr. Lawton.

But you yourself said that these three men testified on the morning of the day that Mr. Folk appeared. It would be interesting to know how our more than 15,000 members could have been acquainted with this testimony before they considered Mr. Folk's testimony presented on the same day.

There is another obstacle to your proposal. Suppose an association witness is testifying before a Senate committee and you ask him a question. According to your contention, before he could answer he would have to poll all of the more than 15,000 members of the association for their viewpoint.

This would be required for each question you and other committee members asked. If this procedure were followed a committee would never complete its work.

Now, having demonstrated the impossibility of your proposals, we wish to make clear that Mr. Folk had every right to appear as a witness for the association.

The position taken by Mr. Folk, that the Patent Office should be an independent bureau, was evolved in years of consideration by the NAM patents and research committee and by the NAM board of directors.

The National Association of Manufacturers formulates its policy positions through various committees and the board of directors.

Each committee, such as the one on patents and research, is composed of members selected primarily on the basis of their expression of interest in a given subject, the geographical distribution, and the size of the businesses represented. We are enclosing a list of the members of the patents and research committee. You will notice that there are 125 members on this committee and that many small companies are represented. Each member has one vote, regardless of the size of his business.

These members are experts in this particular field and constitute a cross section of NAM membership. They consider what NAM's position should be in regard to various proposals affecting patents and research. After the committee's position is adopted it is presented to the board of directors.

The board is composed of 157 members from 42 States. The members come from all branches of industry, from large, small, and medium-size companies. Each director has one vote, regardless of the size of his company.

The board passes finally on recommendations by the various committees. A committee proposal can be approved, rejected, modified, or held in abeyance.

You will recognize that this method of procedure is similar to that followed by Congress. Congressional committees act first on legislative proposals, followed by action by the Senate and the House. In the NAM the various committees act first, followed by action by the board of directors. Congress represents the people; the NAM board of directors represents the NAM membership.

Needless to add, whenever an association witness appears before a congressional committee, he presents a viewpoint approved by the board of directors as the representative of NAM members.

This does not mean that every word of his testimony has to be specifically approved by the board or the membership. But the viewpoint he presents must have been approved.

Mr. Folk's testimony conformed with previous board action. The actual text could not have been submitted to every member of the association, because, as you will recall, the hearings of Reorganization Plan No. 5 were called suddenly. To have followed your proposal would have denied the association the opportunity of presenting its view.

The hearings would have been completed long before the association could have heard from its more than 15,000 members.

Actually, the testimony was submitted to as many committee members as was possible within the time limitation. In addition, many letters protesting the reorganization plan were received from NAM members.

After Mr. Folk's testimony, the substance of his statement appeared in the NAM News, which is distributed to every member of NAM. If he had not presented the NAM viewpoint there would have been protests. Not one has been received.

You also made the point in your speech that the association should approve the Hoover Government reorganization proposals in order to obtain economy in Government operations. We assure you that we are heartily in accord with the principles of the Hoover Commission proposals and are on record to that effect. We also have been, and still are, one of the leading advocates of Government economy.

But what we opposed was that portion of Reorganization Plan No. 5 which transferred the Patent Office to the Secretary of Commerce and abolished its independence. Three things should be borne in mind:

1. The Hoover Commission made no specific recommendation for revision of the Patent Office setup. Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce for many years and was intimately acquainted with the operations of the Patent Office.

2. Secretary of Commerce Sawyer promptly redelegated his new authority over the Patent Office back to the Commissioner of Patents. This is one of the strongest arguments against the proposal, because the Secretary of Commerce himself acknowledged by this action that the reorganization plan was undesirable.

What will happen, though, if in the future a Secretary of Commerce is appointed who seeks to destroy the patent system which has contributed so much to the Nation's greatness? Under the reorganization plan he can seize the power to control the Patent Office which Secretary Sawyer has relinquished.

3. There was no showing whatsoever that any economy would result from the transfer. Secretary Sawyer by implication acknowledged this when he redelegated his authority.

We regret that this letter is of such length but we wanted to give you a clear picture of NAM operations so that there will be no further misunderstanding.

Since your original remarks were published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, we request that you place this letter also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the readers of that publication will have access to the facts.

Sincerely yours,

A. V. BODINE,
President, The Bodine Corp., Bridgeport, Conn.

Statement by William M. Boyle, Jr., Chairman, Democratic National Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be placed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement issued by Mr. William M. Boyle, Jr., chairman, Democratic National Committee, dated September 12, 1950. I overlooked placing it in the RECORD sometime ago.

I will say to the distinguished minority leader that it mentions the recent elections in the State of Maine.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator. The way Maine goes, so goes the Nation.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will take a look at the statement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Democratic candidates cut deeply into normal Republican majorities in every one of the three congressional districts and in the governorship race in yesterday's election in Maine. If the Democratic gains in Maine reflect the attitude of the voters in the other States, we will make gains all over the country in November. The total vote cast in the Maine election was higher than that in 1948, a presidential year, and was the highest for a nonpresidential year since the record set in 1938.

In the election of a governor the Democratic vote was up from 76,544 2 years ago to 93,000 this year, while the Republican vote fell off slightly.

Democratic gains in the three congressional district contests were even more impressive.

In the First District Mrs. Lucia M. Cormier, the Democratic candidate, received over 41,000 votes compared to a Democratic vote of 31,528 in this district 2 years ago. The Republican margin was cut to 7,000, compared to 22,000 in 1948; 12,600 in 1946; and 20,000 in 1944. The Democratic percentage of the total vote in this district increased from 37.5 percent in 1948 to over 46 percent this year.

In the Second District John J. Maloney, Democrat, polled in excess of 36,000 votes, where the Democratic candidate in 1948 received 24,098. The Republicans carried this district by 26,000 in 1948 and 44,000 in 1944, and by only 13,000 votes this year.

In the Third District the Democratic vote for John Keenan was over 22,000 votes, an increase of 6,000 from 1948, which cut the Republican majority to about 15,000. This district went Republican by 23,000 2 years ago, by 20,000 in 1946, and by 25,500 in 1944.

The vote in the Democratic city of Lewiston was particularly gratifying. Mr. Maloney received 10,758 votes, with the count still incomplete. This was the largest vote ever cast for any candidate for Congress of either party in the city of Lewiston.

These are impressive Democratic gains in a traditionally Republican State. They reflect what I have said all along is an overwhelming popular support for President Truman and for the policies that are being followed by this administration. I believe the defection of many Republican voters also indicates disapproval of the attempts that were made by Republican candidates in Maine to make political capital out of the situation in Korea. The record off-year vote in Maine indicates that the people are alert to the vital importance of this year's congressional elections. As Democrats, we confidently hope for a record vote throughout the country in November.

The Battle Between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "Reserve-Treasury Fight Shifts to Bank Meeting in New York," written by J. A. Livingston and published in the Washington Post of September 23, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVE-TREASURY FIGHT SHIFTS TO BANK MEETING IN NEW YORK

(By J. A. Livingston)

NEW YORK, September 19.—The American Bankers Association convention, scheduled for the Waldorf-Astoria here next week, couldn't have been better timed. Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder is to be an honored guest and receive a testimonial. A. L. M. Wiggins, former Under Secretary of the Treasury, president of the Bank of Hartsville, Hartsville, S. C., and chairman of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, is to be the first speaker on the formal convention program Tuesday, September 26.

Will Wiggins take sides in the present battle between the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury? Wiggins, as a banker and a businessman, carries great weight among his own kind—bankers and businessmen. Were he to open up, he might cause a surprise. Most bankers are partial to the idea of higher interest rates on short-term Treasury obligations. If the interest rate goes up, as the Reserve Board argues it should, then bankers will make more money on their large holdings of Government securities.

Wiggins is still an active functionary of the Treasury. Even now, as a special assistant without compensation, he is helping Snyder work out a tax program for next year. Therefore, Wiggins may disassociate himself from the conventional banking point of view. He might even let loose a blast at the Federal Reserve Board. For the Treasury still is unreconciled to the Reserve argument that an increase in short-term money rates will help to control inflation by deterring borrowing. As a matter of fact, since the Reserve announced a rise in its rediscount rate from 1½ percent to 1¾ percent, bank loans have increased at an accelerating rate.

The Treasury's case against the Reserve Board runs like this: The Reserve Board seems willing to accept the idea of a 2½ percent interest rate on long-term Government bonds. Yet it wants the short-term rate to rise. Already it has raised 13-month rates from about 1.25 percent to 1.35 percent. But it's doubtful if such tiny increases can have any effect on either businessmen or banks. Businessmen won't shy away from borrowing just because of an extra one-half of 1 percent or even 1 percent. And banks will find the higher rates which they'll be able to charge on commercial loans even more attractive than they are now.

What's more, the Treasury argument continues, the long-term Government bond rate of 2½ percent sets a limit on how effective the Reserve Board's policy can be. The Reserve Board isn't really operating in a free money market. It can't raise the rediscount rate to 7 percent as it did in 1920 or to 6 percent as in 1929. Whenever banks need money they can simply sell their 2½ percent United States bonds and the Federal Reserve would have to buy those bonds. Thus the rediscount rate, to all intents and purposes, is ineffective.

The argument goes on: The Reserve is merely raising the cost of carrying the $257,000,000,000 Government debt, and the cost already amounts to over $5,000,000,000 a year. Each half percent rise in the interest adds more than $1,250,000,000 a year in carrying charges. Hence, the Reserve is operating with the obsolete tools of 1920 and 1929, not the tools of 1950 when the United States debt comprises more than half the total of all debt in the country.

The Federal Reserve, of course, has a ready reply. Only about $55,000,000,000 of the United States debt outstanding is in short-term paper—bills, certificates, or notes. Hence a rise in the short-term rate of one-half percent would add only $275,000,000, in interest charge. And, if the short-term rate went up, there would be less inducement for the Treasury to refund maturing obligations with short-term paper. The saving would not be so great as it is now. In addition, the Government's financial position would be a lot stronger if a larger proportion of the debt were held by long-term private investors instead of by the banks and, hence, constantly turning over in the market.

Conceivably, Wiggins might decide not to wash dirty linen in public. But the subject will haunt the smoke-filled rooms and cocktail bars wherever bankers foregather. For it's the hottest financial issue of the day. The difference of opinion affects not only the cost of money but how credit will be restricted. The Treasury would resort, where possible, to direct controls and maintain easy money. But the Reserve is more inclined to try the classical route, via higher interest charges. And so you have it: A perfect issue for a bankers' convention.

Award of Nobel Peace Prize to Dr. Ralph J. Bunche

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, it is most gratifying to note that the coveted Nobel peace prize has been awarded to the grandson of an American Negro slave. The recipient is Dr. Ralph Bunche, who has made such a lasting contribution to friendly international relationships as a representative of the United States Government.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an article appearing in the Baltimore Sun of today, September 23, giving an interesting account of the details of this award, which is so richly deserved.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE GOES TO DR. RALPH BUNCHE—AWARD ANNOUNCED TO AMERICAN NEGRO WHO ACTED AS UN MEDIATOR IN PALESTINE DISPUTE

OSLO, September 2.—Dr. Ralph Bunche, grandson of an American Negro slave and United Nations mediator who brought an end to conflict in the Holy Land, has been awarded the Nobel peace prize for 1950.

As far as is known here, Dr. Bunche is the first Negro ever to be awarded a Nobel prize in any field. Certainly he is the first of his race to receive the peace prize. It will be presented to him December 10.

Announcement of the award was made tonight by the Norwegian Nobel Committee, which never gives the reason for its choice. The prize this year amounts to 164,303 kroner (about $23,000).

NOW WITH UN UNIT

At Lake Success, N. Y., Dr. Bunche said he had received the news "with deep humility." He was busy at work as principal director in the trusteeship division of the United Nations.

"I, more than anyone, recognize the extent to which my peace efforts in the Near East flowed from the strength of the United Nations," he said.

Dr. Bunche, who succeeded Count Folke Bernadotte, of Sweden, as the United Nations mediator in Palestine, after Bernadotte was assassinated in 1948, effected an armistice that ended the bitter clash between Jews and Arabs and threatened the entire Middle East soon after World War II.

He paid tribute to his predecessor for laying the essential foundations of the Palestine agreements, calling Bernadotte "the great and courageous man who gave his life in the determined effort to bring peace to Palestine."

"At this moment I cannot forget that Count Bernadotte and 10 other members of our team gave their lives in the effort to restore peace to Palestine," Dr. Bunche said.

Dr. Bunche risked his own life in the days that followed his succession to Bernadotte's post.

TWENTY-EIGHT PERSONS WERE NOMINATED

Six organizations and 28 persons were nominated for the peace prize last February. Among the individuals were President Truman, Gen. George C. Marshall, Winston Churchill, India's Premier Jawaharlal Nehru, Count Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi, founder of the Pan-European movement, and Dr. Herbert Evatt, Australian statesman.

Dr. Bunche is the eleventh American to win the peace prize. The first was President Theodore Roosevelt, who received the 1906 award. Others were Elihu Root, Woodrow Wilson, Charles G. Dawes, Frank B. Kellogg, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, Jane Addams, Cordell Hull, John R. Mott, and Emily G. Balch.

The annual prizes are awarded from a trust established by the will of Alfred Nobel, Swedish inventor of dynamite, who died in 1896. The awards are made to those judged to have served humanity best during the last year in medicine, chemistry, physics, literature, and the effort for peace.

FOR PROMOTING BROTHERHOOD

Swedish institutions make all the awards except that for peace, which is made by a committee of five persons elected by the Norwegian Parliament.

For the peace prize, candidates may be proposed by parliaments and governments all over the world and by certain institutions and individuals.

The will of Dr. Nobel, who bequeathed $9,000,000, the interest from which provides the prizes, stipulates the peace prize should be awarded to the candidate "who has worked most or best for promoting brotherhood among people, and for abolition or reduction of the standing armies, and for the establishment and spread of peace congresses."

BUNCHE BORN IN DETROIT

Dr. Bunche, who is 46 years old, is a native of Detroit. He went to the University of California in Los Angeles on an athletic scholarship. He played baseball, football, and basketball, and between classes worked as a janitor.

He won Phi Beta Kappa honors upon graduation in 1927 and then went to Harvard, where he won his master's degree in 1928 and his doctorate in 1934. He was married in 1930 and has three children.

Dr. Bunche joined the State Department in 1944 and was loaned to the United Nations 2 years later. The following year he resigned from the State Department to devote his entire time to the United Nations.

REFUSED POST IN WASHINGTON

After bringing peace to Palestine, Dr. Bunche was the recipient of many honors. President Truman offered him an appointment as Assistant Secretary of State, one of the highest official posts ever offered to a Negro.

He declined to accept the position and there were reports his feeling about racial segregation in Washington was a factor in his decision.

Natchez, On the Mississippi

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, Natchez, Miss., has, perhaps, the most interesting history of any city in the United States. Once a nearly perfect example of the ante bellum South, Natchez today is a picture of contrast. Pre-Civil War homes still remain among busy industries and flowing oil wells. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an article appearing in the Natchez Times, edited by Hon. J. B. Snider, which compares the old Natchez to the new. The article from the Times follows:

NATCHEZ, ON THE MISSISSIPPI

Natchez owes its name to a tribe of sun-worshiping Indians, the original inhabitants of the area. The history of this city—third oldest in the South and oldest in the Mississippi Valley—stretches back over more than two centuries to 1662 when the French under LaSalle first visited the Natchez Indians. In 1700 Iberville and Bienville, the explorers, selected this commanding, 200-foot bluff as the site for a fort completed in 1716. Called Rosalie after the Dutchess of Pontchartrain, this fort was the seed of modern Natchez.

Held successively by France, Great Britain, Spain and the United States, Natchez grew steadily in importance. The city was the first capital of the Mississippi Territory and for many years the history of the Southwest centered here. Thriving on cotton, Natchez once boasted of having more millionaires than any other city in the Nation. But in the years just after the Civil War, prosperity, like the mighty river at her feet, seemed to roll on by Natchez.

A STUDY IN CONTRASTS

Natchez in her golden era never matched the surging activity that is taking place now. Oil and gas flows within sight of splendid old plantation homes. As a matter of fact, 30 percent of Mississippi's $100,000,000 annual oil production comes from wells within a 50-mile radius of the city. Once peaceful plantation fields are the sites of modern factories. There has been a steady and continuous increase in the amount and value of manufactured products over the past 20 years. The forests of the area are the basis for numerous industries which include logging operations, sawmills, paper pulp and woodworking plants turning out large amounts of flooring, wallboard, furniture and boxes.

Forest resources have attracted the International Paper Co., now completing a $20,000,000 plant. With this addition, five large national companies will have major operations centered in Natchez and Adams County. These include Armstrong Tire & Rubber Co., whose production has been tripled recently to 6,000 tires and tubes a day; Blue Bell Inc., garment makers; Johns-Manville Products Corp., makers of wallboard, insulation and related products; and Wilson & Co., meat packers. Such manufacturing industries employ over 3,100 workers, or more than a third of Natchez' labor force.

BASIC GROWTH

The rapid industrial development of the area has jumped the population of the city from 15,296 in 1940, to cover 30,000 today—and it is still growing. Natchez' strategic location for national and world trade was a major attraction for industry, and its position as a trading center also spurred growth. Natchez is the natural retail and wholesale trading center for a seven county area (three Louisiana and four Mississippi counties). There are no other population centers within a 50-mile radius. Well over 100,000 people live within 25 miles of the city. Transportation is superior, including the river, 4 railroads, and radiating highways.

RAW MATERIAL

You have already seen the part played by forests, as well as oil and gas, in the development of Natchez. Woodlands cover more than 40 percent of this trading area—over 117,000 acres. Upland woods are mostly short-leaf and loblolly pine; those of the lowlands are predominantly hardwood—oak, gum, sycamore, pecan, cypress, cottonwood and willow.

Agricultural products range from cotton, corn and sugarcane to the increasingly important livestock and dairying activities. Climate and soil are especially adapted to seed crops and livestock farming. The 9 month growing season allows year around pasturage; add to this an ample rainfall for near-ideal farmers' country.

The highly favorable fuel and power situation is a definite asset. Natchez was first served by gas in 1854. The first electric service was supplied in 1888. Since 1929, Mississippi Power & Light Co. has provided an abundance of dependable, low-cost electric power, constantly kept ahead of the city's growing needs. Today's needs are covered by a two-way 110,000-volt interconnected transmission system, and under construction is an up-to-the-minute 66,000 kilowatt, $8,000,000 steam-electric generating station. The city is also supplied with gas by the Mississippi Power & Light Co., with lines connected to the world's largest dry gas fields.

THE PILGRIMAGE

It would be impossible to leave Natchez without learning of the famed "Natchez Pilgrimage," as much a part of the city as its most modern industry. Since 1932, visitors from all over the world have enjoyed a trip into America's golden past. Opened annually to visitors are a score of historic structures, preserved through wars and economic changes, many of them retaining their original furnishings and decorations.

Natchez has a proud heritage and today is more prosperous than in the most splendid days of great plantations, formal gardens and luxurious homes. Here, the old and the new thrive side by side. Unique is the word for Natchez on the Mississippi.

Hysteria in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHET HOLIFIELD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the Appendix, an editorial by Al Waxman, editor of the Eastside Journal, a newspaper published in my district in California.

With civil liberties gradually being whittled away by scared or vicious men under the guise of patriotism, it is heartening to note that a few real Americans still have the courage to fight back against the wave of hysteria that is sapping the inherent democratic strength of free speech, free press, and free play of "ideas in the market place." The editorial follows:

HYSTERIA IN THE UNITED STATES

(By Al S. Waxman)

What is happening to us? Have we lost our sense of reasoning, have we become a mob instead of a sane nation? Are we going to follow some Pied Piper until we all go over the brink into the chasm?

A wave of patriotic hysteria has taken hold of some of our leaders and they are whooping it up to a point where others, who can distinguish right from wrong, are moving away from their rightful places and staying in the shadows with a hope that all will come out right.

Innocent people are being hurt and righteous citizens are afraid to lend a helping hand for fear they too will be dragged into and through the mire. The hysteria is now so wild it is difficult to distinguish sanely right from wrong, red from pink, Communist from liberal, American from enemy. At least, it is dangerous to admit publicly that you can tell the difference.

Laws and ordinances are being passed without consideration for the general public. Instead of shooting swift arrows into the hearts of the enemy, we are using shotgun methods and not giving a hang whether innocents get hurt at the same time.

The anti-Communist laws which have been passed by the city and county of Los Angeles are dangerous. Very dangerous. Power is being given to officials to determine whether your thinking and mine are American or patriotic. Remember this day, and remember it well, when the officials walk into your front room and declare your thoughts to be unsafe because they disagree with you. Then you will wish you had watched the actions of your city council and board of supervisors.

We agree that genuine enemies of the country should be under constant surveillance. We agree that the safety of this Nation comes uppermost. We agree we have a home front to defend while our boys and men are on the battle front. But, shouldn't we be careful that innocent people are safeguarded against the merchants of hate who prey on the public in times such as these?

A few self-righteous persons can ruin an entire community with their venomous character. Take the recent case of actress Jean Muir. She lost a radio role, and possibly her career, because an accusing finger was pointed at her. Mind you, she was accused of being a fellow traveler—not an enemy—and she lost what she had spent years to build. It might have been you, or you, or you. There was no hearing; no day in court; just an execution.

There is an element of people in this country who have given of their time, effort, fortune, and ability to right wrongs against others. These people have worked and fought for those unable to protect themselves against the vultures of our society. At one time these people were called New Dealers, then they were called liberals, then they were named pinks, now they are labeled fellow travelers. They are accused of working with the enemy. Why?

Why? Why? Why? Because they contributed to the fight against Franco Spain (now acknowledged as the proving ground for Hitler); because they tried to finish the job of freeing the Negroes here (started by President Abraham Lincoln); because they fought slums and blighted-area housing so that "Oakies" (Americans, if you please) could raise their families decently and build a worth-while society for tomorrow; because they fought corrupt politicians and political machines in this country; because they fought to get justice in our American courts for people of foreign extraction (Latin-American and Negro youths included); because they bolstered the USO programs in World War II; because they tried to preserve the Constitution and Bill of Rights of this country? Are these the reasons they are "fellow-travelers?"

They are accused of aiding Russia. They did! You did! I did! In World War II, we were told Russia is "our ally"; that she is "helping us fight Hitler." We worked for aid to Russia, aid to Britain, aid to France. Can that past be used today against these people? No! A thousand times no! But it will be by the self-imposed righteous, patriotic people who want a method to destroy the finer things here.

State Senator Jack Tenney proposes to introduce legislation which would:

1. Outlaw the Communist Party.
2. Bar Communists and fellow travelers from holding public office.
3. Bar Communists and fellow travelers from teaching in public or private schools.
4. Require all candidates for State office to take a loyalty oath at the time of filing for nomination in the primary election.
5. Safeguard labor unions against civil suits resulting from the expulsion of members who are Communists or have Red affiliations.
6. Safeguard employers against civil damage suits which might result from firing of Communists or fellow travelers.
7. Provide for registration of Communists should a pending Federal bill, which so provides, be defeated.

Maybe the Senator's points are good. This writer, however, believes Tenney can't do good—and wouldn't if he could. From the first to his last point, there is a drop from zero to below-zero; if the Communists are outlawed in point 1, where will he find them for registration under point 7?

Tenney would bar fellow travelers from this and that. How are we going to determine who is a fellow traveler? What will be our yardstick? Who will do the measuring? Pray, not people like Tenney. He has used people and people and people as scapegoats for his publicity ambitions.

Even now he has a program of attack against former Superior Court Judge Isaac Pacht, a man who ranks head and shoulders far above Tenney. He has singled out Jewish institutions for attack—because he knew it would merit publicity for him. Are people like Tenney to be the ones who will identify "fellow travelers"? Heaven protect the innocent.

We are in serious danger of forcing the real culprits, enemies of our Nation, underground. From there they will not register. We are building a fifth column now to destroy us. We alone will be guilty when the catastrophe happens (please, God, never).

Let's face realities. Let's be rational. Let's avoid hysteria and mob rule. Let's retain our place in the sun as the greatest Nation on earth. Let's not run over each other in an effort to shout loudest "I am good, he's bad."

Do You Conform to These Principles?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith the following excellent editorial written by Mr. J. O. Emmerich and appearing in the McComb (Miss.) Enterprise-Journal on September 18, 1950:

DO YOU CONFORM TO THESE PRINCIPLES?

Not so very long ago a man from the East asked this editor about the States' rights principles. He seemed skeptical. He had read a lot of propaganda that had him confused. So we commenced asking him some basic questions. His answers were about the same as we ourselves would have given had we been asked the same questions.

We said, "You are a States' righter even though you do not know it." Then we outlined what we considered these basic political concepts.

Perhaps you may be a States' righter and not know it. The following principles which are basic in States' rights thinking are presented for your consideration. Read them carefully and weigh each thought as you read.

A States' righter not only professes but acts on these basic American principles which form our priceless heritage of freedom:

1. "I believe in the United States of America—the greatest Nation of free men and women on earth, where the poorest is far richer than the richest of all other lands where opportunity still exists for those who have the will to work and provide for themselves.

2. "I believe in the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States: 'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.'

3. "I believe in the right of each State to govern its own internal affairs without dictation or interference from outsiders.

4. "I believe in local self-government as opposed to the concentration of all governmental power in Washington.

5. "I believe in individual freedom as opposed to a welfare state of a superplanned economy for every individual.

6. "I believe in my right to worship as I please, work for whom I please, employ whom I please, determine my own present and future without the meddling of bureaucrats who want to plan my every thought and movement for me.

7. "I believe it my duty to help keep America and Americans free and untied by selfish and power-mad politicians and bureaucrats who dream of the superstate.

8. "I believe the best way to keep America free is to preserve and maintain the rights of the various States and of the citizens thereof to determine their own internal affairs as they see fit."

Don't be led to believe that the States' rights organization and those who espouse the principal outlined here hope to create a new party. This is far from the basic thought in mind. A new party would have hard sledding under almost any circumstances. But the organization does believe that there is room for much educational work to be done. The States' rights movement is educational in its basic conception. The last Presidential fight was not to create a new party but to offer a protest to what was happening in our own party. Neither Republicans nor Democrats were given comfort by those who sought to uphold the basic principles. Both parties abandoned principles for expediences. Thus the protest was made.

Do you believe in the principles outlined above? If so you are more of a States' righter than you really know.

No Job for Amateurs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the September 15 issue of the Christian Science Monitor offers sane comment on a subject which has produced too much hysterical thinking and action. Effective control of Communists and communism in this country cannot be brought about through the type of hysteria which produced—and influenced such an overwhelming number of national legislators to vote for—the Wood-McCarran bill. I commend the Monitor editorial to the attention of my colleagues. It follows:

NO JOB FOR AMATEURS

We would stake a good deal on an assertion that everybody in the United States, from archconservatives in both major parties clear through the ranks of the Socialists would heartily support legislation which would thoroughly dispose of the actual menace in domestic communism.

The Kilgore portion of what has come to be known as the McCarran bill aims at the core of the danger. In event of declaration of war, or imminent invasion, foreign-inspired insurrection, or other circumstance declared a national emergency by Congress and the President, it would empower the Government to round up and intern all foreign agents, saboteurs, spies, and members of the Communist party. It also would protect and facilitate the individual's right to judicial review.

The trouble is, Congress seems likely either to drop the Kilgore sections or to lump them with provisions which threaten not only to smother freedom of opinion and to harm many sincere and loyal people, but also actually to hamper apprehension of the real subversives. And the President will have no choice but to sign or veto in toto what comes to him.

This newspaper already has pointed out how the arbitrary power to declare any group subversive and compel it to label everything it says or prints "Communist Front" could be turned to choke off any reform at the moment unpopular or misunderstood.

Of more immediate concern is the prospect of swamping the FBI with the task of seeing to it that every one of some 60,000 Communists registers, and that the roster of every alleged "front" organization is complete and correct. The dangerous spies and saboteurs won't register. In fact, not many take the risk of tying up with suspect organizations. The few that have would go underground while the FBI ferrets out political ideologists whose attempts to persuade Americans already have failed dismally.

As we have remarked before: We don't like rats around the national farmstead. But we are chary of amateur exterminators who propose a little poison for the general water supply—especially when even that wouldn't get many rats.

The Infamous Katyn Forest Massacre of Polish Army Officers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the name "Katyn" evokes horror in the mind of every decent citizen of the world. Why? Because it was in Katyn Wood, near Smolensk, Russia, that there was found the graves of several thousand heroic Polish Army officers murdered by Communist Russia. These officers had been taken prisoners by the Red Army following the diabolic Soviet attack on Poland in September, 1939. That attack was in accordance with the Ribbentrop-Molotov agreement to divide that free and independent nation—Catholic Poland.

The horrible story of the Katyn massacre, though long suppressed, has once more emerged before the eyes and in the conscience of mankind. The dreadful murder of these heroic Polish soldiers will never be forgotten by the civilized inhabitants of mankind.

WHY DID DEMOCRATS SUPPRESS REPORT?

One of the most shocking aspects of the Katyn massacre was that a report on the massacre by a United States Army officer was suppressed for seven long years. I repeat—the United States report was suppressed for 7 years. Now it turns out that the original copy of that report somehow became "misplaced or lost." That is just one coincidence after another.

Friends of Poland have a right to ask why this report was so long suppressed. They have a right to ask how come it became "misplaced or lost." Friends of Poland know that it was the present Democratic administration whose diplomats negotiated the infamous Yalta agreement. That secret treaty divided and partitioned Poland, turned over its most valuable lands to the godless Reds. What a vicious stab in the back.

The whole handling of the news of the Katyn massacre is enough to arouse the conscience of every American, just as the horrible deed itself that occurred in that forest is a blot on the record of civilization.

MAGAZINE OF KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS WROTE UP MASSACRE

I have in my hand the New York Times article describing the statement by the Army officer who had prepared the report. I ask unanimous consent that this article, as well as an article published in the Knights of Columbus magazine, Columbia, in September 1948, by Julius Lada, be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I think that after reading these items, the American people will more clearly recognize why our Republican Party has been fighting against Democratic double crosses.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of September 19, 1950]

UNITED STATES AIDE BLAMES SOVIET ON KATYN—SUPPRESSED REPORT BY OFFICER SAYS RUSSIANS MURDERED THOUSANDS OF POLES

WASHINGTON, September 18.—A report by a United States Army officer who saw the freshly opened graves of several thousand Polish officers in Katyn Forest, near Smolensk, and reached the conclusion that the mass murder was committed by Russians, was released by the Department of Defense today after having been suppressed for 7 years.

The officer was Lt. Col. John H. Van Vliet, Jr., now serving in the Army's Far East command. He was a prisoner of war of the Germans in 1943, and was taken to the scene of the atrocity to be an Allied witness, presumably for German propaganda purposes.

Realizing the international implications of the German action, Colonel Van Vliet refused to go from his prison camp, near Rotenburg, Germany, to Smolensk except under duress, and he refused to express to the Germans any opinion as to the probable guilt for the crime. So far as he knew, the German propaganda authorities never made any use of his visit to the scene.

Capt. Donald Stewart, of the field artillery, a Lieutenant Colonel Stevenson, a South African signals officer, and Capt. Stanley S. B. Gilder, a British medical officer, were sent from prison camps on the same mission, likewise under duress, the report said. A statement by Captain Gilder was also released today. It confirmed Colonel Van Vliet's account of the forced journey they made to Smolensk, but indicated no conclusion as to guilt.

Colonel Van Vliet was finally liberated and reached United States lines on May 5, 1945. Through the intervention of Gen. J. Lawton Collins, now Army Chief of Staff and then commanding the Seventh Corps, he was sent back to Washington to report on this matter to Maj. Gen. Clayton Bissell, then Assistant Chief of Staff, G–2 (Intelligence), War Department General Staff.

As a result of his interview with General Bissell, he was instructed to dictate a full account of his experience. He was then ordered by General Bissell to say nothing further about the matter to anyone, and he obeyed these orders until last April 26. At that time, Maj. Gen. Floyd L. Parks, Army Chief of Information, asked him for a new statement, the original deposited with General Bissell having become misplaced or lost.

"I believe that the Russians did it," today's statement said. "The rest of the group that visited the site stated to me that they believed the Russians did it."

It had the following to say about Colonel Van Vliet's frame of mind at the time of the inspection trip

"At the beginning of the newspaper publicity concerning Katyn, I believed the whole thing to be one huge, well managed, desperate lie by the Germans to split the Western Allies from Russia. I hated the Germans. I didn't want to believe them."

[From Columbia of September 1948]

NEW LIGHT ON THE KATYN MURDERS

(By Julius Lada)

In accordance with the Polish-Soviet agreement of July 30, 1941, signed after the German attack on the Soviet Union, the formation of a Polish Army on Soviet territory was begun. Gen. Wladyslaw Anders, released from Soviet captivity, was appointed its commander in chief under the authority of the Polish Government in London. This army was to be formed of Polish citizens taken prisoner by the Soviet Army after its attack on Poland on September 17, 1939, and of those deported from Polish territory during the Soviet occupation whom the Soviet Government undertook to set free. Accordingly, on August 12, 1941, the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Soviet Union issued a decree of amnesty, and the Poles began to gather at the recruiting center of their army.

Soon, however, officers from the army command noticed that many officers personally known to them, and whom they knew had been taken into Soviet captivity in 1939, failed to report. When asked to give information on the whereabouts of the missing Poles, the Soviet liaison officers answered that they were unable to give any, and mentioned in a general way that a great number of the Polish prisoners of war were set free in Poland in 1940. Since the Polish authorities knew, from letters received from the families of the missing officers prior to the opening of German-Soviet hostilities, that they had never returned to Poland, instructions were given to the Polish underground to find out whether they had not been detained in German prisoner-of-war or concentration camps. At the same time a bureau for the investigation of this matter was formed by the command of the Polish Army in the Soviet Union. Major, then Captain, Joseph Czapski was appointed its chief.

REPORT PUBLISHED RECENTLY

This bureau, both during and after the war, collected all the available material on this question and published recently a report in book form for which General Anders wrote the foreword. It has appeared in Polish under the title Zbrodnia Katynska w Swietle Dokumentow, published by Gryf Publications Ltd., 56–61, Hatton Gardens, London E. C. 1, at 12/16. "This book," writes General Anders, "is the product of several years' hard work, carried out most carefully by many men under one editor. It contains new and authentic evidence, published for the first time, collected by men whose names for obvious reasons (if their families are in Soviet-controlled lands) cannot in many cases be disclosed. The aim of the book is to reveal the truth about a case which has been until now purposely kept dark and unsolved in the eyes of the world's public opinion."

On September 17, 1940, the official organ of the Soviet Army, the Red Star, affirmed that during the fighting which took place after September 17, 1939, about 10,000 Polish officers were taken prisoners by the Soviets. After General Anders was released from a Moscow prison in July 1941, he was informed by Lieutenant Colonels Berling and Dudzinski that about 15,000 Polish prisoners, predominantly officers but including also a number of police and frontier guard NCO's, were detained in three big camps in Soviet territory, namely, Kozielsk, Starobielsk, and Ostaskow. Lieutenant Colonel Berling later became commander of a Polish division which the Soviet authorities formed after breaking off diplomatic relations with the Polish Government on April 26, 1943, and is now a general in Poland. His evidence, as given by a man who collaborates with the Communists, is of particular value. He said that about 400 officers were transferred from these camps, in the spring of 1940, to the camp of Pavlishchev Bor, from where they were later on taken to the camp of Griazovietz. This information was subsequently fully confirmed by the officers from Griazovietz, who joined the Polish Army and gave the following evidence.

All three camps were, oddly enough, organized in former orthodox monasteries. In Kozielsk, situated approximately 150 miles southeast of Smolensk, about 4,500 officers had been imprisoned since the end of November 1939, including four generals of whom General Bohatyrewicz and General Smorawinski were among those identified in the Katyn mass graves. Half of the prisoners here were reserve officers, others included professors and university lecturers, physicians, surgeons, and many hundred lawyers, teachers, journalists, industrialists, merchants, and so forth. There was among them one woman, pilot officer Lewandowska. In Starobielsk, situated on the river Aydar southeast of Charkov, about 3,910 officers had been detained since the end of November 1939. Among them were eight generals. At least half of these prisoners had been taken by the Soviet Army after the surrender of Lwow on September 22, 1939, in spite of an agreement that the defenders of that city would be set free. In Ostaskow, situated on the border of Lake Seliger northwest of Kalinin, about 6,500 prisoners of war had been confined, including 400 officers, 300 of whom were police. The rest consisted mainly of members of special corps such as the frontier guards, prison warders, intelligence corps and so forth.

Before Christmas 1939, priests and chaplains detained in these camps were removed with the exception of the senior chaplain, Jan Ziolkowski, who, owing to an oversight remained in Kozielsk. His body was later identified in the Katyn mass graves. This measure was taken by the Soviet authorities in an attempt to break down religious life which remained vigorous till the end.

In spite of the opposition, moving examples of these religious practices are to be found in the memoirs and statements of those who remained alive. "Common evening prayers," writes a former prisoner at Kozielsk, "are an old tradition in the Polish Army. The prisoners attempted to maintain this practice which, however, was strictly forbidden by the authorities. These orders were ignored and the services were continued, but after some of us had been punished for taking part in them, we substituted a few minutes silence instead of praying aloud.

TIME FOR SILENT PRAYER

"Imagine the interior of a former Orthodox church in which 600 prisoners were accommodated. Five-tiered bunks covered every inch of the floor space. The church building was plunged into semidarkness, which a few electric bulbs could hardly dispel; here and there candles and small kerosene lamps added a flicker of light. Every night at about 9 o'clock the hum of voices and the din of comings and goings which filled the place were sharply stilled by a voice from the completely dark choir: 'Silence, please.' At once every movement in this human beehive stopped and everyone stood still. A silence fell as at the consecration of the Host during mass. Remote sounds from the outside were deadened by the walls of the church. Prisoners of many creeds—Catholics, Protestants, Orthodox, Jews, Free-thinkers—all observed these few minutes of silence as an expression of their common belief in the spiritual life.

"In November and December 1939 divine services were organized in the camp at night. Army chaplains said mass and distributed holy communion in the form of ordinary ration bread. The night, the darkness, the background of the Orthodox church, all added a queer and impressive touch to the ancient Latin service. Very soon the camp authorities heard of these services and some of the priests were punished by solitary confinement in the so-called 'carcer.' This made no difference, and real religious feeling grew notwithstanding all the efforts of the reeducators."

Of all the priests removed in December 1939 only one, Father Kantak, who is now in the Middle East, was heard of again. He owed his survival to the fact that he was a citizen of Danzig. The others disappeared without trace. Father Ziolkowski, considered by the authorities as an ordinary major, carried out his ecclesiastical duties in secret till the liquidation of the Kozielsk camp.

The prisoner were very carefully examined by the NKVD. They were questioned individually, frequently for many hours, and had to give extremely detailed accounts of their lives and of their views, and fill endless forms. Each prisoner was photographed from various angles and the reproductions were kept in his dossier. In Kozielsk, General Zaroubin was in charge of these investigations.

At the beginning of April 1940 a simultaneous, carefully prepared liquidation of the three camps started and, by early May 1940, these camps no longer existed. Statements published in the book describe in detail how the prisoners were gradually removed in parties numbering from 1 to 300. In the case of Kozielsk a telephone call from Moscow, usually about 10 a. m., gave the orders for a transport on a given day, enumerating the prisoners by name. The receipt of such a call took a long time, and frequently the prisoners were able to hear the names as the recipient repeated them aloud. Sometimes names were read out of typed cards dated in Moscow.

LITTLE KNOWN ABOUT PRISONERS

The first party left Kozielsk on April 6, 1940, believing that they were to go to distributing centers from which they would be set free. The last three transports left Kozielsk on May 10, 11, and 12. Two transports, totaling about 200 prisoners, one on April 16 and the other on May 12, reached the camp of Palishchev-Bor. The fate of the remaining 4,250 officers remained unknown till their bodies were identified in the mass graves of Katyn Wood 3 years later.

The only fact known before was that the transports from Kocielsk were unloaded at a station situated some miles west of Smolensk. Nothing was heard either about the 10,000 prisoners from Starobielsk and Ostashkov, except for about 200 of them who also reached Palishchev-Bor. Thus, about 14,500 Polish prisoners of war, including about 8,000 officers, vanished. Three percent of them remained alive. Information collected later shows that the prisoners from Starobielsk were murdered near Charkov, but their graves were not discovered. According to some statements the prisoners from Ostashkov were drowned in the White Sea.

While the above information was being collected, the Polish Government and the High Command of the Polish Army continually inquired from the Soviet authorities about the 8,000 missing officers. These representations became more insistent, particularly after the Polish Underground reported that the missing officers were neither back at home nor in the German camps. When visiting Premier Stalin in Moscow in December 1941, General Sikorski, the Polish Prime Minister, again requested the release of all Polish prisoners and gave him a list of missing Polish officers, compiled by their former fellow prisoners, and containing 3,845 names. Stalin assured Sikorski that all Polish citizens had been set free and suggested that perhaps those missing escaped to Manchuria, although flight through the entire territory of the Soviet Union could obviously never have taken place.

On March 18, 1942, General Anders delivered to Stalin an additional list of 800 other missing officers. In reply to all verbal and written requests concerning the missing prisoners, the Soviet authorities firmly maintained that all prisoners had been set free, officers first of all, and that the fate of those missing was unknown to them. When, on July 8, 1942, the Polish chargé d'affaires, Sokolnicki, asked M. Vishinsky for a list of those set free, drawing his attention to the fact that detailed lists of prisoners of war in camps were made by the Soviet authorities. Vishinsky declared that he had no such lists.

The silence about the missing officers was suddenly broken on April 13, 1943, when the Berlin radio announced that the German authorities discovered in Kosogory, in the Katyn Wood, a mass grave containing the bodies of about 3,000 Polish officers, among them the body of General Smorawinski. In the following German communiqués it was announced that another grave containing 1,500 bodies were discovered and that medical and investigation committees, as well as foreign journalists, had already arrived in Katyn. Two days later, on April 15, the Moscow radio retaliated by stating that these officers fell into German hands in the summer of 1941, and were murdered by them. Thus the Soviet authorities were immediately ready to give precise information about the missing prisoners, whilst up till the German announcement, all of them, including Premier Stalin, M. Molotov, M. Vishinsky, General Panfiloff, and General Rajchman, continually stated that nothing was known about the fate of these people.

In addition to this, the fact that all prisoners without exception were ruthlessly evacuated by the NKVD before the advancing German Army overran Soviet territory, contradicts the Soviet allegations that the Polish officers in question might have fallen into German hands. Eyewitnesses' terrifying accounts of how this was done, how prisoners who could not be evacuated were killed or burned alive and how those unable to walk fast enough were shot out of hand by the Soviet guards, form a separate chapter of the book under review. Similar accounts are to be found in Victor Kravchenko's I Chose Freedom.

On April 17, the Polish Government announced that it had instructed its representatives in Switzerland to request the International Red Cross in Geneva to send a delegation to investigate the true state of affairs on the spot. At the same time they made it clear that the Germans, being themselves guilty of innumerable atrocities against the Polish people, had no right to set themselves up in this affair as defenders of international justice. On the same day, the Polish Minister of National Defense issued a communique in which he disclosed the Polish Government's information about the missing officers and explained that, in view of the above facts and of national anxiety over the fate of those missing, the newly discovered mass grave should be investigated by a competent international body. On April 25, the Soviet Union, instead of agreeing to the requested investigation as was expected, broke off diplomatic relations with the Polish Government. The International Red Cross then declined to carry out investigations on the ground that it could only act at the request of all parties concerned.

The book contains the official collection of documents published by the Germans; the official Soviet communique; the report of the International Medical Commission and that of Dr. M. Wodzinski; and numerous witnesses' accounts of what was found in the mass graves. Dr. Wodzinski, who before the war was one of the official Polish pathologists, went to Katyn as early as April 29, and worked there till June 3, 1943, personally supervising all the excavations. He gave the following verdict.

Four thousand one hundred and forty-three corpses, buried in layers, mainly face downward, were found in eight graves in Katyn Wood. After careful examination of their uniforms, personal documents, identification cards of various sorts, certificates of vaccination issued at Kozielsk camp, diaries, notes, correspondence and photographs, they were positively identified as the Polish officers from Kozielsk camp. They were all murdered in precisely the same manner—by a shot in the back of the head, the bullet coming out at the top of the forehead. A number of bodies wearing either old Soviet military uniforms or clothing typical of that country, were found in other graves nearby. Examination showed that these corpses had been buried between 5 to 15 years prior to the massacre of the Polish officers, leading to the conclusion that that wood had already been used for similar executions for a period of years. This was also confirmed by some local inhabitants. Judging by the large amount of cartridge cases and bullets found in and around the graves, it must be concluded that the executions took place beside, or even inside, previously prepared pits.

No traces of any struggle were found and it can therefore be assumed that the victims were rendered powerless before being executed. In about 20 percent of the cases, the hands of the victims were tied with a rope behind their backs. The execution of those found in the first seven graves took place at the end of March and during April 1940. All dated personal notes, diaries or correspondence found on these bodies stopped abruptly then. Soviet papers, mostly in Polish and published at Kiev, which were found on the victims, were also of the same period. The winter outfits of the victims also point to the fact that they were killed before the warm season. In the case of grave No. 3, where the bodies were wearing summer uniforms and the papers found on them were often dated in early May, Dr. Wodzinski estimated that the executions took place in the first half of May 1940.

The murder of thousands of Polish officers in Katyn Wood is a fact that has been recognized by all the commissions, even including the official Soviet Commission which carried out investigations, and by numerous people who visited the mass graves. However, contrary to all evidence collected by those who had been on the spot during the exhumations in the spring of 1943, the Soviet Commission, composed solely of Soviet citizens, tried to prove that the Poles had been murdered by the Germans between September and December 1941. The date of the murder is, of course, of paramount importance in the case. Katyn lies in Soviet territory and an organized mass execution could not possibly have been carried out by the Germans in the spring of 1940, a year before Hitler invaded the Soviet Union.

The book also provides very detailed and complete evidence to the effect that the Katyn executions took place in April and May, 1940. It points to the fact that the Poles had been killed in the same manner as Soviet citizens whose bodies had been found in graves nearby and who had been shot between the years 1928–38, at a time when only Soviet authorities could have carried out executions in Katyn. It includes accounts of eyewitnesses who testified to the effect that the Poles had been executed by the NKVD, and demonstrates the discrepancies and contradictions in the Soviet statements on the subject of the missing officers.

In spite of the fact that the mass murder in Katyn Wood is one of the most notorious war crimes which not only shook world opinion but created the first rift in the Allied camp; in spite of ample material evidence and numerous witnesses available at the time of the Nuremberg trial; and in spite of the fact that the indictment in the Nuremberg trial included the Katyn crime, the International Military Tribunal failed to pass judgment on this case. The Tribunal's judgment, promulgated in October 1946, does not mention the Katyn crime and consequently no German has ever been convicted of the murder.

This omission throws particular light on the whole case. A Soviet general sat as one of the four judges on the Tribunal and a Soviet legal officer was one of those who prosecuted the accused. It was obviously in the Soviet interest to be cleared of any possible suspicion as having been the guilty party. The Soviet representatives had no doubt every opportunity to produce sufficient evidence to condemn the Germans. In spite of this, the Katyn crime is the only crime mentioned in the indictment which has been passed over in silence in the judgment of the Tribunal.

It is in the interest of justice, and of the prestige of the institutions guarding international order, that the murderers of these thousands of Poles should be brought to trial. The Poles demand a fair and impartial international trial and are ready to produce all relevant evidence in their possession.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert the following speech which I gave at the National Democratic Conference in Chicago on May 15, 1950:

I want to talk directly and plainly about the President's health program because that's the kind of program it is. Nothing difficult or complex or technical involved. This is a clear, forthright program designed to meet a real need and there's no reason why we can't discuss it in those terms.

There are seven main sections in this well-rounded program to improve the Nation's health.

Briefly, they are:

1. Federal aid to medical education.
2. Aid to medical research.
3 An increase in grants-in-aid to States for hospital construction.
4. Special aid for rural and other physician shortage areas, together with assistance to farm-health cooperatives.
5. Aid to States for State and local public health work.
6. Aid to States for maternal, child health, and crippled children's services.
7. This is the controversial national health insurance system, so often and falsely dubbed "socialized medicine" by people who do or should know it is nothing of the kind.

I'll outline the details of this simple insurance system in a minute, but first I want to make clear the enormous difference between national health insurance and socialized medicine.

We don't plan to take over any hospitals, we don't plan to give orders to any doctors, we don't propose any changes in the way American medicine—the finest in the world—will be practiced. That would be socialized medicine, but we seek no part of it, plan to make no move in that direction.

Instead we propose national health insurance, designed to see that all, not just some citizens of this country get the finest medical care available, that and no more. Calling that socialism is being downright moronic—or what is worse, deliberately distorting the truth.

At this point, let me tell you a story about Pat and Mike. It isn't a funny story, not even a pleasant one, but it illustrates the basic situation with which we are concerned.

Both Pat and Mike had accidents a year ago. Pat was working in a machine shop. He slipped on a grease slick and half an hour later was in a hospital with a broken leg. Mike also worked in a machine shop, but he was crossing a public street when he too skidded on a grease slick and wound up in a hospital with a broken leg.

Pat and Mike were laid up for quite a while. They both had tricky compound fractures. Plenty of time in the hospital and a lot more at home. Well, so what?

Just this. Pat was injured at work, so everything went well for him. Since it was an industrial accident, he and his family received workmen's compensation. He got enough money to cover his hospital and medical bills and partially support his family. With his savings he got through the crisis without going into debt. Pat's back at work, healthy and happy, building for the future. And nobody I know called it socialism.

Not so for Mike. He, too, worked in a shop, but because his accident happened elsewhere he got no support money from anybody. When he went off to the hospital he was on his own. His small savings were wiped out in 2 weeks.

Before Mike got back to work he was deeply in debt, his wife and children had been on the relief rolls, and Mike himself was bitter and unhappy. When he did get well he wasn't building for the future like Pat; he was and still is in debt to the past. This tragic situation may pass—or it may not. The point is that it need never have existed.

There is no reason why we shouldn't have a program to help Mike just like the one that helped Pat help himself. In all fairness, I ask you, is there any basic difference in the two cases so far as their effect on family life and the physical and mental health of society as a whole are concerned? I don't think so.

There are four basic financial worries in the minds of the great majority of the people of this country. One springs from old age, another from unemployment, and a third from industrial accidents. The fourth, and often the greatest fear of all—comes from the cost of medical care, from the tremendous cost of chronic or catastrophic illness and the mounting day-to-day expenses for the thousand less serious ailments or accidents which are the lot of all of us.

Important steps have been taken to remove the first three fears through Government insurance programs, but we have as yet done nothing about the costly burden of medical care.

What could be more natural than to look to a comprehensive national health insurance system to round out a full social-security program?

I think the events of your lives and those of the people you know are sufficient proof of the need for such a program. Unless you are one of the fortunate wealthy who can afford the best care at all times, or one of the very poor who are eligible for what is usually good charity care, the chances are that a case of cancer in your family might wipe out every asset you have in the world inside of a year.

If you live close to the margin—and most of us do, because we must—a prolonged case of pneumonia or a major operation might well be almost as devastating financially.

If those of us who are neither rich nor poor get adequate care in emergencies, it is because we mortgage our lives to the future. What is the solution then to this crucial problem?

The same solution we have applied to our social-security problems—insurance.

That, that alone, is the administration proposal for a prepaid medical care system. The provisions of the proposal are clear and direct. Each wage earner would pay a small amount each week into a national health insurance fund—exactly as he now does under old-age and survivors insurance. He would pay in proportion to his income—1½ percent of income, but not more than $72 a year. Employers would make an equal contribution, just as they now do in our other social-insurance systems.

The money would be collected through the social-security system without requiring any new agency and only slight additional overhead expenses. The funds would then be returned to local plans run by local citizens and doctors. The measure guarantees freedom of choice to both doctors and patients. All medical matters remain in the hands of medical men, free from interference. Just one basic change from the present system is involved. The money paid into the health-insurance fund will be used to pay all medical bills. Our system of medical care remains the same, but the national health-insurance fund pays the bills through local agencies.

There are some who have objected that the fact the money passes through the hands of a national agency will overcentralize control. I recommend that such critics actually read the bill. It contains the most effective possible safeguards for local autonomy.

The basic unit of the entire plan is the local health service area, most frequently covering a city or county. The State will decide and control the membership of the area's health-service administration and all officers and employees would come under the State's civil service merit system.

This is a simple, but effective plan to remove the barrier that stands between so many American people and adequate prepaid medical care—the barrier of the almighty dollar.

What's the opposition all about then? Well, it has many voices, heard in many places, but it is all in some degree inspired by the American Medical Association. Virtually every protest can be traced to the AMA's multimillion dollar publicity campaign against national health insurance.

Now, I don't think any of us should be surprised at the attitude of this professional organization, although I admit myself sometimes a little flabbergasted at the no holds barred, questionable circuslike tactics being used by the huckster hirelings of our dignified doctors.

The truth is that the AMA has fought almost every kind of public-health progress in this country. Its entrenched leadership has been consistent in only one respect through the years; they have resisted change of any kind, be it good or bad.

Their history of reversal, non sequitur and turn-about on national health insurance and voluntary health insurance plans is too well known to be repeated here, but I think a bit of current history on another important part of the President's health program is useful in making clear the shenanigans of which the AMA is capable.

I speak of Federal aid to medical education. Because of the limits of time, I'm not going to document this story right now. But I have every necessary document here with me and anybody is more than welcome to examine them.

Back in 1946, a number of highly placed doctors, including a Dr. Herman Weiskotten, now chairman of the AMA's council on medical education, were making such statements as, "More than half of the medical schools of the country are so inadequately supported that they are hardly in a position to conduct a thoroughly satisfactory undergraduate program of medical education." The feeling was close to unanimous and two possibilities were discussed by the AMA council, a voluntary fund-raising program and Government aid. The voluntary fund-raising project flopped and local governments declared themselves unable to help.

Deans of medical schools and educators throughout the country then began to plead for Federal aid to medical education.

Quickly the AMA began to back pedal verbally, sometimes in very unfortunate phrases. There was, for instance, the contention of Dr. Donald Anderson, secretary of the AMA council on medical education and hospitals, in October 1947, that "the maximum deficit that could possibly be forecast for 1960 does not exceed 15,000 physicians." This by way of pooh-poohing desperate need to train doctors for some of the areas that you ladies and gentlemen from rural areas particularly have reason to know exist. Fifteen thousand physicians. If, as is sometimes said, one doctor is needed to serve every thousand people, that means Dr. Anderson was saying we didn't need to do anything about the doctor shortage because there would be only 15,000,000 people without medical service at best. Shades of the Hippocratic oath.

The rest of the story is soon told. Recognizing the real need for Federal aid to prevent severe cutbacks in quality and quantity in the training of our future doctors and nurses, the Senate last year passed an aid bill and sent it to the House.

The AMA, still more concerned with its closed medical shop than anything else, fought on. It submitted a series of amendments, many of which were adopted, but the organization still refused approval.

Largely for that reason the bill is still in a committee of the House, delayed for more than a year because the AMA persists it is not needed. Well, is it?

I think the answer should come from the medical schools themselves.

In addition to the wires and letters which have poured in from medical school deans and administrators, this is what Joseph C. Hinsey, chairman of the Committee on Financial Aid to Medical Education of the Association of American Medical Colleges wrote me in January.

"The action of the AMA opposing H. R. 5940 (the aid bill) after it had passed your committee and . . . the Senate, was taken independently of our Association and without a poll of our membership. Our Committee on Financial Aid to Medical Education decided unanimously that we should poll the individual medical colleges by telegrams * * * the poll of the membership with returns in from 63 schools shows 47 favorable and 16 opposed."

And there's a lot more we won't go into today. The facts are clear. The AMA knows a need exists, but is attempting to deny it in the face of proof from the medical schools the AMA lobbyists claim to be protecting. It's a farce, the same kind of farce staged by the AMA anytime its monopolistic grip has been threatened in the last 25 years.

I think that's enough to show you how the only real opposition to the President's health program is motivated. I hope that next time somebody spouts the AMA line about so-called socialized medicine or aid to medical education in your presence you'll straighten them out. And we can get on with the job of improving the Nation's health without false issues and the kind of "now you see it, now you don't," shell game, the AMA has attempted to palm off as ligitimate argument.

As I said earlier, this country has the most advanced medical knowledge and facilities in the world. We must and will put them within the reach of every American citizen with the President's health program. Thank you.

Newspaper Comment Regarding Hon. Alexander Wiley's Record in Public Office

---

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared regarding reactions which I have received from the press of Wisconsin and the Nation. I ask unanimous consent that this statement and a series of appended newspaper quotations be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. President, during my 12 years in public office I have tried to keep the closest contact with the newspapers of my State and with editorial comments throughout the Nation. I have always felt that the press is one of our foremost guardians of the public welfare. We of Wisconsin are proud of our papers.

I WELCOME EDITORIAL VIEWS PRO AND CON

Like all men in public life, there have been times when I have disagreed with some particular newspapers. Yes, there have been times when I have come in for my share of being on the receiving end of constructive criticisms. However, I welcome such constructive comments. I feel that no man in public life should be immune to the frank and open comments of the free press of our country.

Everyone of us benefits from advice from outside observers. No man is so all-wise that he can be right all the time. No man can find universal agreement of all his policies all the time.

APPRECIATION OF FINE EDITORIAL SUPPORT

I am, however, tremendously grateful for the fact that throughout my years as United States Senator I have received literally hundreds upon hundreds of very gracious editorial comments from the daily and weekly newspapers and magazines of Wisconsin and the Nation. I am humbly appreciative for their editorial support.

I am not taking any bows or asking for any pats on the back, but I am merely stating the facts.

There are those in the ranks of my opposition who have tried to defame my record, who have tried to distort criticisms of me. Boys will be boys, smear artists will be smear artists.

But for the sake of the record, I am presenting below some of the selected quotations which have appeared down through the years in the newspapers of Wisconsin commending my efforts in Washington.

I think that these comments will show that by and large I have had the support of the press, because they recognize that I have humbly been on the job 7 days a week, 52 weeks a year, trying to do a genuine, sincere, honest job for the people of our State and Nation—for peace, for prosperity, for freedom, for fair treatment of all groups.

THESE EDITORIALS SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

As I stated at the start, no man can be right 100 percent of the time. But a man can sincerely try as I have tried, to be right as much of the time as possible and to win the support of as many of our people and as many of our newspapers as possible by conscientious public service.

In a spirit therefore of humility, I am presenting the facts and letting those facts speak for themselves. I am presenting these excerpts from a few of the hundreds upon hundreds of gracious column writeups and editorials which have been carried in the press regarding my efforts in the people's behalf.

I hope that my readers, after reviewing these comments, will feel more strongly than ever before on the wisdom of voting Republican Tuesday, November 7, 1950.

NEWSPAPER EDITORIALS FROM WISCONSIN AND OTHER STATES ENDORSING SENATOR WILEY'S EFFORTS

PART I. NEWSPAPER COMMENTS DURING 1950

[From the Palmyra (Wis.) Enterprise]

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN WEEKLY SUMS UP MANY REASONS FOR SUPPORT OF SENATOR WILEY

ALEXANDER WILEY, the senior Wisconsin Senator from Chippewa Falls, just now completing 12 years of service to the people of Wisconsin, is presently a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate on the only ticket he knows, the Republican ticket.

Senator WILEY has been labeled the man who works for his constituents; diligently safeguarding the interests of Wisconsin's prime industry for all of his 12 years, he is well known for his strict policy of making the interests of his constituents his first consideration; be they widow, orphan, farmer, or small-business man, or veteran, he can be relied upon to do the things asked of him.

Throughout the entire State one can hear hundreds of instances of poor and rich alike who, perplexed over some personal problem, have written their senior Senator for aid, and at all times his help was forthcoming.

He has in his 12 years demonstrated the fact that he is a man who can be relied upon to do all in his power to preserve the American way of life, ready at all times to battle the left-wing labor leaders who are even now, as in 1944, spreading their gospel of hate in an effort to unseat him. Thousands of dollars are being spent in Wisconsin to do the bidding of the administration, "Beat WILEY."

But the honest workers, farmers, professional men, doctors, lawyers, bakers, grocers, Mr. Average Citizen wasn't fooled then and won't be now.

Senator WILEY has always maintained that America should have a Cabinet Department for Peace. He can be depended upon to fight for an adequate approach to our world problems. He is the kind of man Wisconsin needs in his high office to safeguard America from another war—a world war III—bloodier than all other wars combined.

Wisconsin and America need more men like WILEY in office. Men who have the interest of the common man at heart and who are willing to go to bat for them. We know he is endowed with the courage of his own convictions, and with full and complete knowledge of that for which he speaks.

Senator WILEY has always been the champion in the Senate of the St. Lawrence seaway and other causes dear to the Midwest.

Senator WILEY can be depended upon to support the principles of promotion of the system of private enterprise, of conservation of resources, of equitable taxes, effective foreign relations, of fairness to the consumer, and an effective farm program..

The people of Wisconsin will go to the polls in November knowing that the man they want in the United States Senate will be ALEXANDER WILEY and that the rantings and ravings of his enemies are not something new, but a rehash of the 1938 and 1944 campaigns, designed to tear down and defeat the principles of check and balance in the Government. They know that placed in the hands of men like Senator WILEY, the American way of life will survive.

[From the Wisconsin State Journal]

MADISON PAPER CHEERS WILEY VOTE TO PROTECT CONSUMERS

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY wins a pat on the back for his pledge to protect natural-gas consumers from the gouge that presently threatens them.

Senator WILEY's declaration that "consumer rights must be protected" means one vote that calls for unanimous praise from a State just beginning to get the blessing of natural gas and thus a target for the hungry rate raisers.

[From the Green Bay Press-Gazette]

WILEY IS SPOKESMAN FOR AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE

Senator WILEY made an impressive showing in his two previous campaigns. In 1938 he smothered his rivals on two party tickets. In 1944 he triumphed over the Democratic nominee by about 100,000 votes, which was no mean margin in a Democratic Presidential year.

Senator WILEY, in fact, is as strong, in our view, as are the Republican Party and its philosophy as a whole in Wisconsin. There are yet no signs that we can see that Republican hegemony here will be overturned soon. Those who oppose Senator WILEY inevitably oppose the Republican Party too, for he is a firm disciple of the principal tenets of the Republican idea.

It is one of Senator WILEY's articles of faith that the free-enterprise system is inherently preferable to socialism. If the Republican Party has any meaning in mid-century, it is as the political vehicle for the free-enterprise idea.

It is noteworthy that the most violent condemnations of Senator WILEY's record come from those who have advocated the Socialist principles and purposes with which he has stanchly disagreed.

JANESVILLE PAPER EDITORIALIZES FOR WILEY REELECTION—WILEY ENDORSEMENT SETS NATIONAL PACE

The public generally is ignorant of what might happen if Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, and six other Senators now facing the election test, are not sent back to the Senate. Fortunately, Wisconsin Republicans saw the need and endorsed ALEXANDER WILEY for reelection in November.

With the present schemes of the administration aiming toward spending of billions for a number of socialistic ventures, the only hope of keeping this country from a $75,000,000,000 budget is to retain Senators and Congressmen who are known to be sound thinkers.

Unless these men are returned to the Senate there is little hope of keeping the administration from running hog wild, jumping the Federal budget by whatever number of billions fits their Brannan plans, socialized medicine, business financing, Federal dam projects, federalized steel industry, etc.

Senator WILEY has proved his worth in the Senate. He serves Wisconsin well. More important, he serves the Nation as a leader in our National Legislature. He should be returned to the Senate.

[From the Waukesha Daily Freeman]

WAUKESHA PAPER PRAISES FIGHT FOR MAIL SERVICE

The people of Wisconsin should recognize the fine work of United States Senator ALEX WILEY is doing with respect to having postal service restored. He called Postmaster Donaldson's order an outrage the day it was issued and has continued to hold to the belief that the service could be restored without a cent of additional expense to the taxpayer.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Press-Register]

ALABAMA PAPER LAUDS FIGHT AGAINST SOCIALIZED MEDICINE

When Senator WILEY warns of the fallacy and danger of socialized medicine, he does the Nation a genuine good deed.

He has just sounded such a warning from the floor of the United States Senate.

He declared that "Government control of medicine will result in a lowering of America's health standards and in a further move down the road to state socialism in the United States."

Moreover, he pointed to the further great waste of tax money that can be expected if Federal bureaucracy gets its hands on medicine.

"Government control of medicine will mean," he said, "more national deficits because uncounted billions of dollars will be squandered by bureaucrats."

Senator WILEY is correct when he says Government control of medicine would be detrimental to the public welfare.

[From the Shawano County (Wis.) Journal]

NORTHERN WISCONSIN WEEKLY AFFIRMS WILEY SUPPORT

There is probably not a single home in the county that has not heard of the efforts this outstanding Senator has put forth to help the dairy farmers of Wisconsin.

Senator WILEY was first elected to the United States Senate in 1938. He has since been reelected. He had been a lawyer and businessman and farmer, having successfully operated a dairy farm for some 30 years.

Senator WILEY has visited often in this county and has many friends in Shawano.

* * * *

The third highest ranking Republican in the Senate is ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin. He has sufficient seniority to be in a very strong position to serve Wisconsin. This is particularly important in this grave hour of international need arising out of the Korean war. In time of crises, you need men of experience in public office—not novices who would take years to find out what government is all about.

Most of the work of Congress is necessarily done in committees. Senator WILEY occupies committee posts of a higher rank than has ever before been attained by a Wisconsin legislator in 102 years of Badger statehood.

During the Eightieth Congress, Senator WILEY was the chairman of the powerful Judiciary Committee which handles the Nation's antitrust affairs, civil liberties, anti-Communist efforts, etc. The Senator is the only Wisconsin man who has ever been chairman of this influential committee.

PART II. COMMENTS PRIOR TO THIS YEAR

[From the Washington Times Herald]

CAPITAL PAPER LAUDS HIS INDUSTRY

He works hard. As chairman of the important Judiciary Committee, which handles a third of all Senate legislation, he personally reported out 205 bills last session, more than any other man in the House or Senate.

He is very religious, hates "synthetic thinking," such as Henry Wallace's "cockeyed ideas."

[From the Reserve Officer]

LEADER FOR PREPAREDNESS, PEACE

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY has scored a long list of legislative "firsts" in his career in the United States Senate, including his warnings long before the advent of World War II, of the danger of an attack on Pearl Harbor, the potential danger of critical shortages of wartime materials, the dangers of overcentralization of government and industry. His pioneering suggestion for a permanent liaison group between the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Department of State was acclaimed during the war by the Christian Science Monitor as "the most important, constructive and forward-looking suggestion on behalf of the future peace which has come from Congress since the United States formally entered the war."

[From the Brillion (Wis.) News]

WISCONSIN NEWSPAPER APPLAUDS FIGHT AGAINST SOCIALISM

"It is well that Senator WILEY has so faithfully discharged his duty to his constituents and his country. Would that we had more people so diligently devoted to our way of life and the comforts it has brought us compared to the unfortunate victims of socialistically dominated countries."

[From the Young People's Friend, Anderson, Ind.]

CHURCH MAGAZINE DESCRIBES WARMTH

Fifty of the Church editors met in the Senate dining room. There were two regular waiters serving our group but our time was limited and Senator WILEY got up and helped serve. He did this in a natural, unstrained manner out of the goodness of his heart. It looked to me like a good example of Christian brotherhood and fellowship.

Earlier the Senator made a good speech. He emphasized what I have believed and advocated for a long time. "It is not by legislation alone but by increased spiritual knowledge and activity that the way will be opened for us to advance."

[From the Sheboygan (Wis.) Press]

DEMOCRATIC PAPER BOOSTS WILEY PROCHEESE BATTLE

Senator WILEY took the floor last week in an address calling attention to the so-called Plymouth-plus plan which has penalized Wisconsin producers of cheese more than $3,000,000, and still the order prevails. We want to compliment and congratulate him for making such an important contribution in the interest of an industry that made Wisconsin tops as the cheese-producing State before the war and until MPR 289 was put into effect by the Government.

[From the Parkersburg (W. Va.) News]

PROTECTOR OF RIGHTS OF 48 STATES

There has been much talk about the disappearance of State rights explicitly reserved in the Constitution but very little if anything has been done about it. It remained for United States Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, to take the first practical step to attempt to gain relief.

It is all but too late unless the people are stirred to action. Senator WILEY proposes an investigation to determine just how far this trend of encroachment and obliteration of the States has proceeded * * *.

Mr. WILEY says the situation urgently demands such an inquiry, and we say that he is exactly right.

We hope that something comes of Senator WILEY's far-seeing and courageous resolution.

[From the Boston Herald]

WILEY'S FAIR LABOR PROGRAM HAILED BY MASSACHUSETTS PAPER

It is good to hear that out of the confused and frightened discussions in Washington about practical ways and means of controlling monopolistic labor at least one definite, straightforward program has emerged. Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican of Wisconsin, has announced that he will sponsor in the new Congress a 10-point program * * *.

You cannot fail to agree with him on the imperative need of finding some method to end for once and for all time shutdowns in industries essential to public safety and health.

[From the New York Sun]

NATIONAL COLUMNIST ENDORSES PROPEACE EFFORT

Billions are spent for war and war preparation but virtually nothing is spent to prevent war except when a crisis arises.

There is no department of Government which gives its undivided attention to the subject of peace. Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin, Republican, had a good idea about this and made a speech about it in the Senate a year ago. He suggested that a Department of Peace be established to concentrate and specialize on the maintenance of peace.

[From Through the Washington Keyhole]

PRAISED FOR VISION, COURAGE, STATESMANSHIP

Wisconsin's Republican senior Senator, ALEXANDER WILEY, has done a consistently fine job for the American free enterprise system. Few Senators have as long a list of legislative "firsts" and of constructive bills introduced as ALEX WILEY. He has demonstrated the vision, courage and statesmanship that his State and Nation recognize they need so desperately in these critical times.

Tax Bill Aids Oil Interests, Lawyers Told

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. CARROLL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following article from the Washington Post of September 19, 1950, regarding the Senate amendment to H. R. 8920, the pending tax bill, which would have converted ordinary income from oil production to capital gain:

TAX BILL AIDS OIL INTERESTS, LAWYERS TOLD

The Federal tax bill which may soon become law contains gross, almost crude inequities and favors "oil interests and everything that smells of oil," Dean Erwin N. Griswold, of Harvard Law School, declared yesterday.

The noted educator teed off on the pending tax bill in a speech to the tax section of the American Bar Association convention.

He told the tax lawyers it was their duty to do something to remedy the situation, that they owe a duty to "John Q. Public" as well as to the moneyed corporations.

"In times when taxes must be high, it is most essential that they should be entirely nondiscriminatory," he said. "But we are about to enact a tax law which contains gross, almost crude inequities."

Particularly discriminating, he said, were the provisions favoring the oil equities.

"Where was the voice of the tax section on that matter?" he asked. "The tax section ought to be quick to act in the public interest. John Q. Taxpayer needs our help, too."

Giving a review of recent trends in Federal taxation, Griswold urged the lawyers to stop grumbling about taxation.

He declared:

"Certainly, we as tax lawyers ought to complain very little about the taxes. I will venture the thought that there is scarcely a person in this room who is not better off because we have had high taxes than he would be without taxes or even lower taxes. * * * We are all so accustomed to groaning about the burden of taxes, and to thinking about how much we would have if we had for ourselves all of the money we have paid for taxes that we are apt to forget that we would never have had the money in the first place if it were not for taxes. Most of us would not have as much left after taxes if it were not for the taxes.

"We have long had death and taxes as the two standards of inevitability. But there are those who believe that death is the preferable of the two. 'At least,' as one man said, 'there's one advantage about death—it doesn't get worse every time Congress meets.'"

A Record of Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I have considered it a great pleasure and honor to have served in the Congress of the United States over a period of years, during which problems of great importance have come before the Congress for solution. I do not believe that in any similar length of time in our Nation's history, except of course, the years surrounding our birth as a Nation, and its subsequent preservation in the war between the States, have so many and varied problems affecting the welfare of our Nation and its people been presented.

In the early years of my service the Nation had a period of so-called prosperity. We learned to our sorrow in 1929 that it was not of an enduring character. There followed a period of distress that brought great hardship to our people. Many were reduced to the mere necessities of life. In some instances it was difficult to get even such. There was hardly a segment of our people who did not experience hard times. Never was there a greater need for sympathetic understanding upon the part of legislators in Congress. Never was there a time that called more clearly for help from the Federal Government. Businessmen, farmers, and workers of every kind and character were calling for relief. My experience as a small child, during the Cleveland depression in the early 1890's gave me an understanding and sympathetic heart for those who suffered in this last depression. I considered it a privilege to be a Member of Congress and help in every way possible by word and vote to support those measures that gave promise of help to a distressed and discouraged people. While some were inclined to doubt the constitutional right to enact Federal legislation of this character, I can say that never did such doubt arise in my mind. I was ever mindful of the fact that this Nation was founded to provide for the life, liberty, and happiness of our people, and, that under the all-inclusive welfare clause of the Constitution, it was not only our right but our duty to pass legislation of a helpful character. As I look back on those days it is with the feeling that I was privileged to be in Congress and help in the work so necessary to be done in those fateful days.

In this period of depression many acts of substantial character to promote the welfare of our people were adopted. Of course, there were the several types of relief measures to provide employment for the unemployed, assistance to municipal bodies in the form of public works projects that enabled localities to build schools, and other necessary construction that would not have been possible without Federal relief to the hard-pressed local taxpayers, mortgage assistance to stem the tide of foreclosures, Federal assistance to farmers to enable them to overcome obstacles with which they were faced, loans to businessmen to enable them to carry on and thereby increase employment, Federal guaranty of bank deposits that was necessary to revive confidence, and many other measures of so many and varied kinds that it is impossible in the short confines of these remarks to enumerate them all.

I gave support to all this legislation. I endeavored so far as my influence and vote was concerned to further its adoption. It was gratifying to see the good that was done as a result of its enactment.

As we emerged from the depression period we were engulfed in World War II. Pearl Harbor came upon us a bolt out of a clear sky. We were caught unprepared. Following our entrance into war it was necessary to build up our military strength, make provision for the welfare of our service men and women, make financial arrangements to enable our industries to increase their production. Questions of policy, both domestic and foreign, were arising continually. All of this required time and effort to solve. Congress was in continuous session and worked day and night in an effort to do its part.

We came out of the war victorious but with problems that were staggering. Problems that required prayerful consideration. Problems of future peace, world security, and the rehabilitation of nations destroyed and the relief of suffering people. I saw these conditions first hand. I was appointed to a special committee by Congress to study the post-war problems of Europe. We visited England, France, Belgium, Luxemburg, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Russia, Iran, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. We met and conferred with the leaders in government in all of these countries. We were the only committee of Congress that had a direct across the table conference with Stalin. The meeting was held in the Kremlin. We also met in conference His Holiness, Pope Pius. We came in contact not only with leaders in government, but, also the businessmen and the rank and file of people. We heard their pleas for help. We saw the need. In addition to all of this, we conferred with our own Ambassadors and other representatives of our own country. We met and talked with our military leaders from General Eisenhower through all the grades to privates in the field and the 17,000 service men on the ship by which we returned. If any committee of Congress ever got first hand information, our committee did. Upon our return, we made our report to President Truman in the White House. We informed him of what we had seen and heard. We made recommendations direct to him. We did likewise with respect to Congress. There is no doubt in my mind that we performed a very useful service to Congress and the people of our country. It helped us greatly in meeting those early postwar problems.

But, the war had also left us with many perplexing problems at home. Controls of one kind and another that were necessary in time of war, became irksome after the war was ended, high cost of living, inflation in other forms, heavy taxation, and, many other perplexing problems had to be decided.

And, now that we are hardly out of World War II, and before all of its problems, foreign and domestic, had been settled we are in the Korean war. And, again we are faced with problems that are pressing in character. Caught unprepared and without proper and sufficient military equipment we must build again the military machine that went out of existence with the ending of World War II.

As a Member of Congress it has been my privilege to serve on the Naval Affairs Committee, Military Affairs Committee, and now the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In my two previous assignments the information that I gained has been very helpful to me in deciding issues of a military character. The committee to which I am presently assigned has an exceedingly extensive jurisdiction covering outstanding activities such as all forms of transportation, including rail, bus, motortrucks, inland and coastal waterways; communications, which includes radio, television, telephone, telegraph, and cables; security exchange and certain types of investment legislation; Federal power, relating to interstate transmission of all forms of power, including electricity, natural gas, and related subjects; Federal trade, which covers trade practices; civil aviation, and all that relates to the operation and control of all types of civil aircraft; food and drugs, to insure safety and honesty in the administration of such to our people; Bureau of Standards, relating to scientific development; enemy property, to provide for the administration and settlement of the property in the custody of the Government, taken over by it, as a result of the last war; petroleum, in all its different aspects, including production, refinement, distribution, and sale. The committee also has jurisdiction over public health. It is this, more than any other subject within the jurisdiction of our committee, that has given me a feeling of genuine pleasure and appreciation of doing something constructive and worth while for all of our people. The accomplishments of our committee, and in which I feel honored to have had a part, have been widespread, and have materially advanced the welfare of our people. I am pleased that some of this legislation bears my name, and all of the bills have had my active support.

No better advice has ever been given to the people of a congressional district, than that given some years ago, by Champ Clark, Democrat, when he was Speaker of the House of Representatives. He said:

> Men should be sent to Congress because they can be of service, and having proved that they are of service, wisdom dictates that they shou'd be kept here so long as they continue to be of service, and it may be confidently asserted that the value of the services of a man of capacity, character, industry, and good habits increases in exact proportion to his length of service.

I have gone into some detail in setting forth my experience in Congress because I believe that we need men of experience in Congress at this critical time in our history. I trust that my experience and sincerity of purpose will enable me to do my part as manfully, courageously, and as well as our boys are doing their part in Korea. And, with God's help I will do my part to the best of my ability.

Retailers of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MORGAN M. MOULDER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Speaker, the retailers of America are entitled to full recognition for their great services rendered to the people at the country crossroads, in the villages, towns, and cities of America. From the very beginning of the history of our great and powerful Nation the retail merchants have been an indispensable influence toward our progress and prosperous development. Our national economy, our great industries, and our everyday way of life could not function without the services of the retailers, the grocery store, the general store, the drugstore, the hardware store, feed stores, equipment stores, the clothing store, the furniture store, the garages, hotels, restaurants, the filling stations, the specialty shops and stores and others. They are service institutions and the channels through which our great commerce flows and depends upon. They are essential in every community, and the retailer is a civic leader in the affairs and progress of every community.

My first job was in my father's grocery store. It was hard work. The hours were long and the work was confining. Retailing is a skilled occupation. A man needs the power of Samson, the resourcefulness of Napoleon, the determination and patience of Job, and the wisdom of a jury of Solomons. However, my early training, working for my father in the grocery store, was a valuable education and experience of nostalgic memories.

Mr. Speaker, elementary rules and principles applicable for the success of retailers should be applied in Government affairs. Our Government is a combination of political, business, and social science, and in order to succeed in our endeavor to render governmental services for the general welfare of the people, we must, insofar as expenditures and finances are concerned, conduct and administer governmental affairs and services on sound business methods.

It has been said that "the nearest approach to self-esteemed immortality on earth is a Government bureau," and I believe that Members of the Eighty-first Congress are fully aware of and sensitive to the fact that various bosses, heads, or department executives of Government bureaus and agencies, as well as many of their assistants and other employees, are inclined to be contemptuous of the duly elected representatives of the people in Congress, and frequently thumb their noses with derision at Congress.

We must not jokingly say or believe that a bureaucrat is a Democrat holding a Government job which a Republican wants. In fact, thousands are Republicans, but, in my opinion, the majority of such Government jobholders are neither Democrats nor Republicans; they are Government bureau politicians and specialists in obtaining and keeping influential positions in our Government.

Waste and red tape are twin brothers. They go hand in hand. Our present civil-service system permits, encourages, and results in bureau expansion by ambitious bureaucrats. This is what one Government official said several years ago:

> "I have seen guys take a job that used to be done by two girls and build it into a special section employing more than a dozen people. That way they could point to the number of employees under their supervision and get themselves a higher civil-service rating and a boost in pay. I once watched a man who took a simple job, subdivided it into eight functions, wrote lots of memoranda, hired more people, called staff conferences, had the minutes of the conference recorded, mimeographed, and distributed, and so forth, and so on. He became a big shot."

Mr. Speaker, you will recall my statement and argument on the 29th day of June, last year, when I said: "We must strive to promote economy, efficiency, and improved service in the transaction of the public business in the executive branch of the Government. We are employed by the people as their Representatives in Congress to provide the proper legislation for the efficient execution of their Government business."

As a Member of the Eighty-first Congress, I am proud of my support and vote for H. R. 2361, a bill providing for the reorganization of Government agencies and for other purposes, which was approved and passed by the House of Representatives on the 20th day of June 1949. This bill, H. R. 2361, was passed by the Senate, signed and approved by the President and is now Public Law 109, Eighty-first Congress.

Under the provisions of the bill, now Public Law 109, Eighty-first Congress, the President is authorized to examine, and from time to time reexamine, the organization of all agencies of the Government and determine what changes therein are necessary to accomplish the following purposes:

1st. To promote the better execution of the laws, the more effective management of the executive branch of the Government and of its agencies and functions, and the expeditious administration of the public business;

2d. To reduce expenditures and promote economy, to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government;

3d. To increase the efficiency of the operations of the Government to the fullest extent practicable;

4th. To group, coordinate, and consolidate agencies and functions of the Government, as nearly as may be, according to major purposes;

5th. To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head, and to abolish such agencies or functions thereof as may not be necessary for the efficient conduct of the Government; and

6th. To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

Public Law 109, Eighty-first Congress, declares that the public interest demands the carrying out of the purposes specified in the above-numbered subsections 1 to 6, inclusive, and that such purposes may be accomplished in great measure by proceeding under the provisions of the act, and can be accomplished more speedily thereby than by the enactment of specific legislation.

Since the enactment of that law the President has submitted numerous governmental reorganization plans and I have vigorously supported and voted for such plans, which I hope the executive department will effectively execute to achieve the purpose of Public Law 109, passed by this Congress. If not, then we should pass specific legislation to compel the achievement of our goal for efficiency and economy in our Government so that it will give better service at lower costs to all citizens.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I insert in the RECORD as part of my statement an editorial published in the Columbia Daily Tribune, May 15, 1950, as follows:

MOULDER VOTES FOR ECONOMY

When it came time to act on an amendment to cut $600,000,000 off the general appropriation bill in the House last week, Representative MORGAN MOULDER was the only Democrat among the Missouri delegation who voted for economy in Government. When it came time to act, all the rest of Missouri's Democratic Congressmen voted for spending, in spite of the fact that some of them had previously indulged in a lot of talk about economy.

Added to cuts already made by the House Appropriations Committee before the bill reached the floor, the omnibus appropriations measure is now more than $2,000,000,000 below the sum requested by President Truman. If the House cuts stand up, general appropriations for the fiscal year starting next July 1 will be approximately $28,500,000,000.

We believe a big majority of the people of America—particularly those in rural areas—are opposed to the kind of big spending the Federal Government has carried on since the war. In every case where the people have gotten their hands on a ballot to pass on a tax increase they have voted it down by a thumping majority.

This being the sentiment of the people, then those Members of Congress who do a lot of talking about economy in Government and then vote for a continuation of big spending are out of step with their constituents. They haven't the courage to stand hitched when the time comes to really do something about reducing the cost of Government so that deficits can be wiped out and taxes reduced. They could go on talking economy forever, but unless they are willing to vote for it, there is no hope for the overburdened taxpayers of this country.

Representative MOULDER stands out as an exception to this unfortunate rule that seems to prevail among Members of Congress. He says he is for economy. And, lo and behold, he votes for economy.

Since the date of that editorial our country has been compelled to expand its military operations and national defense program, and additional billions of dollars have been necessarily appropriated by Congress for that purpose. I am in complete accord with that policy and program to provide for our national defense and security, which policy and program received my vigorous support and vote in Congress. Even so, such necessary additional appropriations make it more important than ever that we limit other expenditures to the lowest amount consistent with efficient performance of essential duties, by eliminating duplication and overlapping of service, by consolidating governmental services, and by abolishing unnecessary governmental functions, services, and activities.

"Expansionism" in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of September 22, 1950:

EXPANSIONISM IN ASIA

In undertaking to present the Soviet Union as the apostle of peace and the western democracies, and especially the United States, as the imperialist exponent of expansionism, Mr. Vishinsky returned to some familiar falsehoods in his first major address to the General Assembly. "The Soviet people," he declared, "is alien to military tendencies and expansionist plans such as those which influence and lead the influential circles in control of capitalistic countries." A little later he became more explicit and charged that General MacArthur had expounded upon expansionist plans against China and against the whole Pacific region.

Apparently expansionism is the keynote in the present vocabulary of abuse, taking its place alongside the familiar fulmination against imperialism and colonialism. It has long been the theme of the North Korean Communists and their Russian mentors that the aim of United States policy was to make Korea an American colony. Presumably Mr. Vishinsky is trying to put some rhetorical meat on the skeleton of this lie with his present concern with expansion.

In any case it will be worth while to look at the record of the expansionist capitalistic countries in Asia in recent years. It may be worth while to see how it compares with the record of the Soviet Union in the same area. For the time being we can disregard the mammoth depredation of Soviet expansion in the west and see what the imperialists and the Communists have done in Asia. Here is a small part of the record:

Great Britain: Granted independence to India, Pakistan, Burma, and Ceylon; established Malayan citizenship and instituted a greater degree of self-government in Malaya in the express interest of the indigenous population; retroceded the Weihaiwei naval base to China; gave up extraterritorial positions in Shanghai's international settlement and other Chinese cities; expressed the willingness to enter negotiation with China on the retrocession of Hong Kong whenever the Chinese were prepared to take over the obvious obligations; undertook the substantial reduction of military and naval establishments in Asia wherever possible.

France: France has not moved as rapidly as Great Britain in modifying the colonial position, nor as rapidly as many persons would desire. But France has recognized the right of Indochina to self-government and has set up at least partially independent regimes for Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. Likewise the colony of Chandernagor has been returned to India after a plebiscite. What action has been take has all been away from expansionism rather than toward it.

The Netherlands: Granted political independence to Indonesia and refrained from retaliation when the Indonesians modified the agreement against Dutch wishes by creating a unitary state.

The United States: Granted complete independence to the Philippines; provided for the institution of civil government in Guam and Samoa; placed the former Japanese-held islands under a trusteeship and invited United Nations inspection and criticism; renounced all special privileges and unequal rights in China; made and is still making every effort to end the occupation of Japan.

In that record there is a significant absence of territorial expansion. Annexation somehow doesn't appear. No fresh spheres of influence have been created. Everywhere there have been changes and they have all been in the direction of greater liberties for more persons.

Now for a quick look at the corresponding record in Asia of the Soviet Union, the fountainhead of this antiexpansionist sentiment. Will it bear a similar inspection? What Asiatic people has the Soviet Union made independent of its rule?

The Soviet Union: Annexed Tannu Tuva; annexed southern Sakhalin; annexed the Kuriles; took complete control (virtual annexation) of outer Mongolia; set up the Autonomous Border Area of western Manchuria and inner Mongolia under complete Russian domination; took control of Dairen and Port Arthur, Manchuria's major seaport and naval base; took control of the Manchurian railways; took special privileges amounting to complete economic domination in Manchuria and in Sinkiang (Chinese Turkestan); set up a completely subservient regime in North Korea and sponsored and defended its aggressive invasion on the Republic of Korea; strengthened enormously its military, naval and merchant marine installations in the Pacific area.

There is obviously some imperialism and some expansionism rampant in Asia. But a look at the record reveals whence they come and in what guise. It is an old trick of Communist double-talk to accuse one's opponent of what the Communist has already done. There is no better example than this propaganda about designs upon Asia. It is not merely false; it is ridiculous in its impudence.

Internal Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, for several years I have been a most vigorous advocate of checking communism and Communists at home and abroad. On very many occasions I have denounced the activities of subversive groups and warned the American people of the dangers of this determined and widespread antidemocratic movement.

The present so-called security bill goes very far afield of achieving effective control of communism. It has been so materially altered during its recent legislative course that I regard some of its provisions as being, in effect, not only unnecessary but actually dangerous to our American constitutional system.

In my opinion, in order to control the activities of Communists in this country, it is not necessary to scrap the Constitution.

To the contrary, it is most imperative at a time when there is so much apprehension and concern among our people that our representatives in Government should make special efforts to be calm and dispassionate in their judgments and strive to be free from the clutches of that hysteria which frequently runs through the Nation during a crisis and which could very easily lead us into the abandonment, or at least the serious curtailment, of our God-given constitutional liberties.

Free speech and free expression is a precious American right. Like freedom of conscience, freedom of worship, freedom of the press, and freedom of assembly, and the other great principles of the Bill of Rights, it must be zealously guarded by our leadership against encroachment, limitation, and ultimate suppression.

If the Government but chooses to enforce them, there are laws on the statute books to check and punish espionage, sedition, and sabotage, and to bring before the bar of justice for swift prosecution those who teach and urge the overthrow of the Government by force. That was demonstrated by the recent Communist trials in New York.

But it is most unwise and highly dangerous as well as entirely unnecessary to enact a law like this one which is modeled after the principles and practices of the totalitarian police state and which grossly violates the fundamentals of the American Constitution.

Now is the time for all Americans to stand by our free institutions which we will preserve only if we are vigilant and work aggressively against efforts to check, limit, and weaken them.

The way to do this is to protect the constitutional safeguards of the individual and scrupulously to avoid hysterically conceived measures which are capable of doing greatest violence to the American way of life in that they set up the patterns of totalitarianism in this country and thus destroy precious liberties.

The Importance of Rural Electrification to Colorado Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. CARROLL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, although I have represented an urban district during my service in Congress, I have done my best to encourage the rural electrification program in the farm areas of Colorado and the rest of the Nation.

The more than 40,000 farm families which are served by Colorado's 22 rural electrification associations are well aware of the benefits of REA power. It is no exaggeration to say that the rural electrification program has transformed the lives of persons living in rural areas in Colorado as well as other States.

When the rural electrification program began about 15 years ago, only 1 in 10 of the farm homes in Colorado had electricity. Ninety percent of our farm population lived without electric lights or the other electrical appliances which city people have accepted as an essential part of their existence. Ninety percent of the farms in the State could not use electrical machinery. This last fact is especially important, since in some parts of Colorado the use of electricity is essential to pump water for irrigation.

Today, only 15 years after the REA program was initiated, only 10 percent of Colorado farms are not electrified. Now, nine-tenths of the farm population of the State may enjoy the advantages of electric lights, electric washing machines, and refrigerators, and electrical machinery for irrigation and other uses on the farm. Electricity has lightened the farm wife's drudgery and has decreased the workload of the farmer.

As I say, the people in the rural areas of Colorado are well aware of the benefits of REA. They know it is not socialism or communism—rather, it is a typically American solution to the problem of bringing American living standards to thinly populated areas.

Nevertheless, an attempt has been made by some private utilities and their political hangers-on to misrepresent and distort the REA program. Therefore, I wish to emphasize to all the residents of Colorado—those who live in the cities as well as in rural areas—that the REA program has been a boon to businessmen throughout the State as well as farmers.

The farmer-owned and farmer-operated rural electrification associations are going business concerns. They not only are bringing low-cost power to areas which would otherwise have no electricity; they also are paying back their loans from the Government, plus interest, ahead of schedule. In addition, they are making a major contribution to Colorado's wealth through increasing the State's business activity and productive resources.

Nearly 13,000 miles of line have been built and energized by Colorado Rural Electrification Associations at a cost of approximately $25,000,000. These lines carry nearly 100,000 kilowatt-hours of electrical energy to consumers each year.

The operating revenue of Colorado REA's is nearly $3,500,000 a year. Colorado REA's have paid the Government approximately $1,500,000 in interest on their loans, and in addition, are repaying the principal ahead of schedule.

The REA program in Colorado means new business for the State. The 13,000 miles of REA line were built by private enterprise. Much of the power transmitted to consumers by Colorado REA is bought from private utility companies. The electrification of Colorado farms has resulted in the sale of more refrigerators, electric washing machines, electric irons, and other electrical appliance and farm equipment. In turn, the use of electrical farm equipment such as machinery for the pumping of irrigation water has resulted in increased production of foodstuffs, and has added to the agricultural wealth of Colorado.

One of my chief concerns in Washington has been the encouragement of the system of Bureau of Reclamation transmission lines designed to bring power to REA's and municipalities. The basic reclamation law wisely states that public instrumentalities, such as cities and rural electric associations, should have the first opportunity to obtain power produced by reclamation projects. These huge projects are built by the people, and public agencies should have preference in obtaining reclamation power. As part of this program, the Bureau of Reclamation has built a network of transmission lines extending across the northern and eastern section of Colorado, and additional lines are in the process of construction.

During recent years, private utilities have made a determined effort to cripple or halt this transmission line program. They have brought out the old argument that the reclamation transmission lines are useless duplications of lines already built by private utilities. Actually, the reclamation lines have served to bring additional power into areas where the private utility lines have been inadequate to supply the demand.

In my opinion, there is no legitimate reason for conflict between private utilities and the Government transmission line and REA programs. REA's are serving areas where the private utilities have been unable or unwilling to serve. Therefore, I have noted with pleasure a recent agreement between the Public Service Co. of Colorado and the Bureau of Reclamation whereby the Public Service Co. contracts to carry power over its own lines to REA consumers wherever feasible. It is my earnest hope that this arrangement will work out to the satisfaction of REA members throughout the State. I wish to assure these REA members, however, that I intend to keep careful scrutiny upon the operation of this agreement, and that I shall do everything possible to assure that the REA's are getting fair treatment. I intend to see that this wheeling arrangement is used to benefit the farm consumers of Colorado, and not as a disguised means of shackling or curtailing the REA program.

Secondly, I shall do everything in my power to assure that the wheeling agreement is not used as an excuse to halt further necessary development in the construction of the Bureau of Reclamation transmission lines system. Certain additional construction is necessary before this system can give adequate service to Colorado REA's. This construction is not inconsistent with the wheeling of power by the Public Service Co., and it should be continued.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot overemphasize the importance of the REA program. When this subject was under consideration on the floor of the House earlier this year, I received many letters from Colorado farmers, telling what REA has meant to them. I remember especially a letter from a 70-year-old farm woman who writes that she had lived on a farm within a few miles of the city of Denver for more than 20 years and had never had electricity in her home until a REA was formed in her neighborhood a year or so ago.

Persons such as these have not been served by private utilities, because it would be unprofitable for a private company to bring power to their doors. Their only hope of receiving the benefits of electrical energy is through the REA program.

As I stated before, the number of electrified farms in Colorado has increased from 10 to 90 percent since the REA program was initiated. This revolution in farm life would not have occurred had the REA program not been in existence. The effectiveness of REA is graphically illustrated by the fact that during the period when electrified farms in Colorado were increasing ninefold, the number of farms with telephones has remained almost static. It was for this reason that I gave my active support to the rural telephone bill passed by the Eighty-first Congress, which has given farm families the same opportunity to obtain telephones as the REA program has given them with regard to electricity.

I am proud to have been able to fight alongside with Colorado farmers in their battle for the REA program during the past 4 years. I have worked and voted for adequate funds for the REA program upon every occasion. I have appeared before the House and Senate Appropriations Committees on behalf of the Bureau of Reclamation transmission line program, and I have fought for these transmission lines in debate on the floor of the House. These actions have aroused the ire of powerful vested interests, but I am confident that Colorado farmers will continue to give me their support in my work for the REA program. In the years to come, Colorado REA's will continue and expand their program of service to the farm areas of the State. No special-privilege group can be allowed to stifle the farmers' typically American desire to share in the benefits made possible by American freedom and enterprise.

Excerpts From Committee Reports on S. 784

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, little time was used for the explanation of the bill, when S. 784 came up under House Resolution 818 of the Committee on Rules, on August 31. The time allotted for the rule on consideration was largely used to speak "out of order," in a somewhat heated debate on President Truman and a defense of his actions in an important matter. However, thereby many Members of the House learned little about the private bill.

The following "quoted" excerpts are from the 38 pages of the latest committee report, House Report No. 2135, Eighty-first Congress, second session, on the bill:

The following congressional reports on this subject matter are the result of legislative exhaustive inquiries:

Report by the late Senator Gibson, reporting on behalf of a subcommittee of the Senate Claims Committee; this report is dated May 6, 1936; it is referred to on pages 10 and 11 of Senate Report No. 548.

Senate Report No. 2313, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session.

House Report No. 3066, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session.

House Report No. 2733, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session.

House Report No. 3005, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session.

Senate Report No. 1717, Eightieth Congress, first session.

Senate Report No. 548, Eighty-first Congress, first session.

Report by the Congressman, the Honorable SAM HOBBS, a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House. This report is dated May 25, 1950. (It includes the aforesaid report by Judge HOBBS.)

The above congressional reports record the fact that the Government, as the successor in interest of the Fleet Corporation and as its liquidator, still retains at present (May 1950) the companies' funds in the amount of $384,256.26, without moral, equitable, legal, or justifiable warranty; the restitution of these funds, as provided in S. 784, as a matter of fact and in reality, does not come from any source of public funds or taxpayer funds and is not a drain on such public funds; this restitution only does constitute, in effect, a return of private funds, of which the Government is a custodian without having any right to continue such custody.

THE PREROGATIVE OF THE CONGRESS

Congress has the prerogative and constitutional right to act as a tribunal in this case. The following extracts from a Senate publication are pertinent thereto.

"Memorandum on Proceedings Involving Contempt of Congress and Its Committees, United States Senate, January 6, 1947. Printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary."

This memorandum was prepared by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the Eightieth Congress; it was approved by all its members; it was prefaced by remarks by Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY, then chairman of the committee.

"The power of Congress to investigate facts is well settled by our history and precedents. The Constitution makes the legislative grant to Congress and implied in the grant is the power to do those things necessary to bring the grant into being. One means which Congress has taken to carry out the power is the committee process.

"The general lack of understanding of the status, duties, and powers of the congressional committees is a matter for concern in an age when the efficient functioning of legislative bodies is the principal bulwark of freemen against totalitarian ideologies.

"A legislative inquiry may be as broad, as searching and as exhaustive as is necessary to make effective the constitutional powers of Congress. * * *

"A judicial inquiry relates to a case, and the evidence, to be admissible, must be measured by the narrow limits of the pleadings. A legislative inquiry anticipates all possible cases which may arise thereunder, and the evidence admissible must be responsive to the scope of the inquiry, which generally is very broad."

Senate bill S. 784 is in accord with our constitutional law, which warrants that—

"Private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation."

It is evident that the published reports of exhaustive investigations by congressional committees have recorded a full exposition of the facts, and have cited their judgment that the funds herein concerned must be returned to the citizen companies as provided for in S. 784.

The conclusions in the above congressional reports had always the same objective, namely, to bring about a return and restitution of the companies' cash property remaining "unreturned" in the custody of the Government, acting in its capacity as the successor in interest of the Fleet Corporation, as a result of the effect of the mandate of Congress, i. e., the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The cash funds herein involved are in the custody of the Treasury Department, having become placed there in such custody as the result of the congressional mandate which put into effect the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 (sec. 203A thereof).

The Fleet Corporation was discontinued by the mandate of the Congress; it appears a matter of simple justice to have the Congress use its discretion to mandate the successor of the Fleet Corporation to return to the companies the balance of their cash surety funds which the Fleet Corporation should have returned when due.

An identical bill passed the Senate in the Eightieth Congress, but was referred to the committee too late to be given consideration before adjournment. This bill passed the Senate on July 6, 1949, and referred to the committee.

Seldom, if ever, has the Congress of the United States taken such a continuing interest in a controversy between a citizen and governmental agencies.

This interest by the Congress in this case is fully warranted. It commenced in 1936, when the late Senator Gibson, on behalf of a Senate committee consisting of himself, the former Senator Townsend and the former Senator Black, concluded a report dated May 6, 1936, on behalf of this committee, to wit:

"Thus there still remained (after the return of $250,000 by the Fleet Corporation's check to the companies) in the hands of the Government unreturned funds amounting to $384,256.26."

The published Senate reports of the Eightieth and the Eighty-first Congresses pertinent to this subject matter declare that—

There is a factor of public interest in this case.

The Congress has always pursued the policy that the foundation of good government rests squarely on justice.

The Congress has always maintained the policy that there cannot ever be finality on the part of the Government without justice.

The Senate bill, S. 784, will correct the injustice inflicted on the companies for so many years.

The refusal to return the funds of the companies had been consistently based by Government counsel on the alleged contention that the companies and Schundler had breached contracts for the purchase of the vessels; this contention was a misapprehension of the facts.

The Executive disapprovals were grounded upon invalid assertions and upon representations made to the former President that the Government had been damaged by breach of contracts of sale of the vessels and that the Government could confiscate the unreturned cash property, unreturned by the Fleet Corporation and withheld in its custody, as liquidated damages.

The Court of Claims found that this was not true and that these assertions were invalid; the court determined and held that there were no sales and that the companies did not breach any contracts that there were no liquidated damages; to quote the court itself verbatimly, to wit: "There were no valid contracts to sell. Plaintiffs breached no contracts," and as the court's commissioner summarized it, to quote him verbatim—

"Plaintiff companies, therefore, did not breach any contracts, and thereby damage the United States to the extent of $384,256.26 or any part thereof."

It is noteworthy that in early 1921 Admiral Benson appointed a committee consisting of the then Commissioner Frederick I. Thompson; Commander A. B. Clements, who was the special assistant of Admiral Benson; Hon. W. W. Nottingham, assistant general counsel of the Board-Fleet Corp.; and Hon. J. A. Philbin, ship sales manager and vice president of the Fleet Corp. for many years. This committee directed in early 1921 the escrowed cash funds to be returned to the companies and set up the formula of accounting of disbursements in keeping with the operating contract, and it is this method which the internal revenue applied in its determinations. The directive of this committee was not carried out by the Fleet Corp. at that time and failure to do so became the commencement of the delay in the return of the funds due the companies.

CONCLUSION

It is noteworthy that up to this time every Member of Congress has recognized the equity and morality of this demand of the companies for the return of their cash property herein involved. Reference is made to page 1 of Senate Report No. 548, to wit:

"After this case came to the attention of the Congress and was fully investigated by Members of the Senate and of the House, and reported on to Congress, Congress has consistently endeavored to provide the relief due to these companies, which common sense and justice, honorable and equitable consideration of the facts do require."

Tidelands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, this session is about to come to an end. We have considered many problems of major importance to our people; and the Korean war has come along in the middle of our domestic program to interrupt it. We therefore have not passed upon many problems which otherwise should be disposed of immediately.

The tidelands problem is one of those which have been pending for many years. At first it seemed that the claim of the Federal Government to the ownership of these lands was preposterous; and many persons did not treat it seriously. As time has gone by, the claim has gradually become more serious until now it is threatening the very existence of any State right or interest in these lands.

I think this problem which means so much to many of our States should be settled as soon as possible. In fact, it should be settled before we adjourn this Congress. Further delay may mean the complete loss of any serious claim which tideland States may have in these valuable properties.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most serious matter which the State of Louisiana must face. Already a large part of its revenues comes from tidelands; and the State is going to be seriously punished by any act of the United States in taking away revenues previously coming to it from the tidelands. Just what these revenues amount to in dollars and cents, I do not now have the total amounts; but I do know that the complete loss of this revenue from Louisiana tidelands will mean perhaps additional State taxes must be levied upon our people to meet the deficiency caused by this loss.

I was deeply concerned the other day to learn that the Attorney General of the United States was asking for an accounting by the several States of its tideland revenues collected in the past. Such an accounting is another threat to the financial ability of the State of Louisiana. It will again force upon our people in Louisiana the realization that some day we may be compelled to readjust our State finances on a different basis as a result of the dispute over the title to the submerged oil lands off the coast of Louisiana.

All of this means one thing, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment. The time for further delay and procrastination has passed. This issue must be met and met now. Delay will not improve the position of the State in this dispute and delay will not make our case stronger. Every additional delay means loss of further strength to the States which are carrying on this fight against the further encroachment of the powers of the Central Government. I am sorry that we have not been permitted to vote on this matter during the course of this session; but I hope that when we reconvene in November, the Congress will set to work to bring this matter forward to an issue and a final vote.

Harvard Dean Urges Bar Association To Oppose Senate Loopholes in the Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. CARROLL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, it must be gratifying to those Members who have been critical of the Senate amendments to H. R. 8920, the pending tax bill, which would have reopened many loopholes closed by the House and have added even larger new loopholes, to see the splendid work of the managers on the part of the House. It is regrettable, however, that the Government must continue to lose $190,000,000 a year through tax avoidance by coupon clippers because of the opposition of the Senate to withholding on corporate dividends in the same manner as taxes are now withheld on the salaries and wages of working people.

In view of the active sponsorship by some of the leading members of the tax section of the American Bar Association of some of the Senate loopholes, I think it particularly appropriate and timely that the dean of the Harvard Law School, Mr. Erwin N. Griswold, should have publicly raised the question about the role of the tax section on these important issues. Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert a portion of an address by Dean Griswold delivered before the tax section of the American Bar Association in Washington, D. C., on Monday, September 18, 1950:

* * * now we must look ahead, and I would like to venture a few words for tax lawyers for the days to come. The history of the 1920's is not going to repeat itself. We are not going to have the era of economic plenty and lowered taxes which we had looked forward to. Probably we should have foreseen that it was not to come, but we did allow ourselves to hope. Now we are confronted with reality and the pleasant dream is gone—or going. As tax lawyers, whether for the Government or for private clients, we have a great responsibility in the difficult days to come.

Way down in the South Seas somewhere there is a little island where there is no unemployment, no crime, no beggars, no radios, no taxes—and no inhabitants. We are likely to forget that taxes are a necessary concomitant of organized society, and that we are all undoubtedly very fortunate that our society is organized.

Certainly, we as tax lawyers ought to complain very little about the taxes. I will venture the thought that there is scarcely a man in this room who is not better off because we have had high taxes than he would be without any tax law to practice. Tax law has become a highly specialized field, which has required trained practitioners. It has not been my observation that they have gone generally unrewarded.

But I will go farther than that. I will suggest that there are few members of the bar, indeed, few citizens, who are not better off physically and financially because there are high taxes than they would be without taxes at all. We are all so accustomed to groaning about the burden of taxes, and to thinking about how much we would have if we had for ourselves all of that money we have paid for taxes that we are apt to forget that we would never have had the money in the first place if it were not for the taxes, and that most of us would not have as much left after taxes if it were not for the taxes. Holmes put it succinctly when he said that taxes were what he paid for civilization; and that is even more true now than it was when he said it.

I do not mean to condone waste and extravagance in Government expenditure. I am all for controlling that in any way we can. But by far the largest part of our tax load comes as the result of two things: (1) Our highly complex industrially organized society, presenting many problems that must be taken care of and can be handled effectively only on a collective basis, (2) the present state of the world, and the need for protecting ourselves from the threats directed at our society.

A large part of our taxes during the past 10 years was devoted to protecting us against the Nazi aggression. Can it be doubted what would have happened if we had not organized and provided that defense and paid for it in part by taxes? And have we not all got more than our money's worth? And is the present situation much different? We can all regret desperately that there is such a threat to our security. But if there is a threat, is there any expenditure we make which benefits us more than that we pay to the Government in taxes?

We should not forget, too, that taxes not only provide us the means of defense, but they also serve another important function in times like these. They are one of our most effective protections against inflation. For most of us inflation is a far more serious financial threat than the amount we actually pay out in taxes. If the war can be kept localized, we should surely pay its cost currently, and we will be better off in the long run if we do.

I do not for the moment mean that the tax lawyer should not work for his client, help him minimize his taxes, and fight hard for him when necessary. That is all part of our adversary system, which I believe to be in general a good system. Many tax questions are necessarily complex, and they are likely to be worked out best when there is an able practitioner making the best possible presentation on each side. What I am saying is that I hope that tax lawyers will keep their perspective. They should sell their services to their clients—I hope they do—but not their souls. Taxes are not a necessary evil. They are, in times like these, a downright blessing. We should surely be quickly lost without them. Let us not forget that fact even as we act as ministers in particular cases to see that the system operates in accordance with law. But where the law is inadequate, or could be improved, let us recognize that fact, too. As the leading organization of tax lawyers in the country the tax section has a great and grave responsibility in times like these.

Tax law is necessarily technical, and we are people who are peculiarly qualified to deal in those technicalities. We are rather quick to move to action when there is some portion of the law which affects some particular group of taxpayers. But we ought to be equally quick to act in the public interest. Just plain John Q. Taxpayer needs our help, too. If we do not exert our talents to guard against discrimination and special privilege, there will be few others who can help him.

It is quite clear that the tax section has made much progress in this direction. Let us strive even more than we have to maintain our professional independence and to contribute to the building of a tax system that will really spread the burdens of our times with fairness and equality.

It has been a great source of satisfaction to me over the years to see the growing strength and maturity of the tax section. I think we are all greatly indebted to Cecil Kilpatrick for his fine leadership during the past 2 years. A lot of fine and important work has been done. But the tax section has a great public responsibility which it is not yet fully meeting. In times when taxes must be high, it is most important that they should be fair and nondiscriminatory, that they should not be full of loopholes and special privileges. Yet right now, in the midst of a real shooting war, we are apparently about to enact a new tax law which contains some gross, almost crude, inequities. Where has the voice of the tax section been on these matters. What about family partnerships and stock options? Is there really any decent justification for the handouts which are reportedly about to be given to a special few taxpayers on these matters? What about the gross inequities of the law in favor of the oil and gas interests and everything that smells of oil? Is there any justification for adding to that discrimination now by the so-called "in oil" provision of the present bill? Where was the voice of the tax section on that matter?

Mr. Speaker, it will be interesting to see what the tax section of the American Bar Association does about this gentle hint by the dean of the Harvard Law School.

Plot To Overthrow Our Present Form of Government by a Fascist Group

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WRIGHT PATMAN
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Committee for a Fascist Government alias the Committee for Constitutional Government, organized by and operated by E. A. Rumely, is making an all-out effort to change fundamentally our form of government. I do not charge that there is an effort to overthrow our Government by force, except an attempt is made to mislead and deceive the people into believing that changes should be made that would cause a radical departure from our form of government under the present Constitution.

Rumely and his gang are trying to make it impossible for Congress to have enough money to provide for things this Fascist group is opposed to. An effort is made to change our Constitution through petitions by 32 States as provided in article V of the Constitution but which has never been used. This is an effort to sneak through an amendment to the Constitution that will limit to 15 percent the income taxes on any person or corporation and not permit Congress to levy an inheritance or estate tax at all. This limitation will effectively do what this Fascist group would like to have done and that is to destroy our programs on social security, for veterans' relief, improvement of rivers and harbors, public roads, soil conservation, support prices for farmers, the Government lending its credit for an interest charge, which is repaid, to farmers and families in the city to buy farms and homes on long terms at low rates of interest, and other programs of benefit to the people.

NEWSPAPERS NOT CARRYING THIS

You will not see much about this organization in the newspapers. For some unknown reason, the newspapers have not advised the people of this serious plot that is aimed at the heart of our fine Government, which has made our country prosperous.

As long as a majority of the people own their own home and farms as they do today and as long as people have good jobs at good pay under good working conditions, there is no danger of socialism or communism; but there can be danger from the extreme right in the form of fascism; so while we are zealously fighting any intrusion from the left in the form of communism or socialism, let us not overlook an equally devastating enemy approaching us from the right in the form of fascism. Public sentiment is a powerful weapon.

Rumely, the court records disclose, was guilty of treason against the United States during World War I. He was a German propagandist. He has been in propaganda work ever since. Since World War I, he has been propagandizing against the Federal Government of the United States, using any of its powers to help the people in any way, shape, form, or fashion. He has been trying to get the Constitution amended in a way that would cause our Government to take an "about face." He has carried on a persistent and ruthless campaign against labor and farmers and strictly in the direction of helping those who have the most and especially the privileged group. His whole campaign has been in the direction of making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

ANY LAW LIBRARY HAS THE FACTS

Anyone who wants to know more about this man, Rumely, should go to the nearest law office and examine 293 Federal Reporter, which contains the case of Rumely et al. against United States. The Circuit Court of Appeals, commencing on page 532 of that volume.

Reports to the People of the Ninth Congressional District of Illinois

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIDNEY R. YATES
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, since my election to the Eighty-first Congress I have attempted to maintain close communication with the people of the Ninth Congressional District of Illinois in order that they should know of my activities in their behalf and so that they should be in a position to judge my efforts.

Each week while the House has been in session I have prepared a newsletter summarizing the work of the Congress for the preceding week. I have done so in the belief that a Representative should report to those who bestowed their trust and confidence in him and, incidentally, in the hope that a first-hand review of congressional activity might prove of interest. On the whole, I believe these messages have been important.

I am presenting copies of my last four newsletters, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 22, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: If you were a Member of Congress, would you vote for a bill which you believed to be a bad one, perhaps harmful to the best interests of your country? Would your opinion be changed merely because the bill had been described and widely publicized as an anti-Communist bill? Would the fact that election for your office was only a few weeks away alter your opinion?

The vote on the McCarran bill conference report last week tested many a Congressman's conscience. Political realists who are friends of mine, advised me that a vote against the bill, even though made in complete good faith, might result in my political defeat, despite the fact that my entire voting record has been anti-Communist and I have time and again reaffirmed my strong conviction that the threat of Communist imperialism and aggression against the free nations of the world must be strongly opposed; and that the danger of Communist sabotage and subversion in our own country must be fought tooth and nail if we are to protect our American heritage and ideals.

To the best of my ability, I try to follow the rule for political conduct laid down by a great fighting Irishman, Daniel O'Connell: "Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong." I voted against the McCarran bill, refusing to believe that a record of fighting the menace of communism made over the entire Congress would be disregarded unless I voted for this bill. I have been a strong supporter of the Marshall plan, the military assistance program of furnishing arms to democratic European nations, the Truman policy to fight communism in Turkey and Greece, and the bill granting aid to Korea. I have voted for appropriations to strengthen our military forces, for creation of the Central Intelligence Agency, and for the bill to strengthen the Nation's internal security, which had been approved by the Department of Justice and the Department of Defense. The Communists have violently opposed all of these bills.

There are a number of reasons why I voted against the McCarran bill, but I think the predominant one is the fact that J. Edgar Hoover has indicated his opposition to the bill. I am no expert on fighting Communist espionage and sabotage, so that I rely on experts like Hoover for advice. Hoover is opposed to driving the Communists deeper underground and making his job of keeping check upon them almost impossible, which the McCarran bill will do. Another counterespionage expert named Paul Jensen, described the bill as an amateurish attempt at counterintelligence, designed to catch headlines, but not spies.

I voted against the bill, too, because it creates an instrumentality which would permit the hate-mongers and smear technicians to ruin the reputation and effectiveness of fine liberal anti-Communist people and organizations by a campaign of inference and not fact. The bill destroys much of our American freedoms and places in jeopardy the right of an American to have a different opinion.

The President vetoed the bill and sent over a powerful message asking that the bill be rejected. Two passages impressed me: "H. R. 9490 (McCarran bill) would not hurt the Communists; it would help them * * * It would actually weaken existing internal security measures and would seriously hamper the FBI and other security agencies * * * Spies and saboteurs would willingly spend years of effort seeking to find out the information that this bill would require the Government to hand them on a silver platter." I supported the President and voted to sustain his veto.

When one of the Congressmen expressed concern over his vote against the bill, Congressman CARROLL, of Colorado, smilingly reminded him of the marine sergeant of World War I, who waved his men over the top with the cry: "Come on, you so-and-so's—do you want to live forever?"

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Member of Congress.

P. S.—As I write this, I have just received word that Senator LANGER, who also vehemently opposes this bill and who has been fighting valiantly against it in the Senate, has exhausted himself after a 6-hour speech and has been rushed to the hospital. He had intended to speak indefinitely against it in order to prevent overriding the President's veto.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 15, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: Congressmen returning to Washington this week after a 10-day recess found themselves in the center of a legislative rebellion. They had been home either for their primary elections or to begin their campaigns for the November election, and they anticipated going home again quickly after cleaning up the few remaining legislative matters. Rumor had it that Congress might adjourn this week end if the conference reports on the new tax bill and the McCarran-Wood bill could be disposed of. That expectation seemed to vanish, however, when Congressmen EBERHARTER, of Pennsylvania, CARROLL, of Colorado, and several of their colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee led a rebellion to disapprove sending the tax bill to conference until provision had been made for an excess-profits tax at once. They proposed that the House do not adjourn until such a tax had been approved.

Earlier this year, before the outbreak of the Korean conflict, the House had passed the new tax bill, a bill which was designed to remove excise taxes on retail sales of such items as jewelry, furs, etc., and to close up many of the loopholes existing in our present tax structure. While the bill was under consideration by the Senate, however, the fighting in Korea began, making necessary the raising of additional money with which to fight the war and build our defenses. House provisions for removal of the excise taxes were quickly eliminated, and income-tax rates on individuals and corporations were increased. When the bill finally passed the Senate 192 amendments of various kinds had been approved, but none providing for the imposition of an excess-profits tax, although Senator PAUL DOUGLAS and Senator CONNALLY, of Texas, had fought to have one incorporated in the bill.

In view of the tremendous number of changes, the job of reconciling differences between the House and Senate versions of the bill promised to be a long, arduous task. The attempt to begin that job was made during the recent recess by a motion to send the bill to conference. Inasmuch as there were not sufficient members of the Rules Committee in Washington to make up a quorum and grant a rule, the only manner in which the bill could be sent to conference was by unanimous consent, but Congressman EBERHARTER objected and prevented the bill from going to conference.

This week the rule was obtained and EBERHARTER shifted his attack for an excess-profits tax by moving that the House instruct the Committee on Ways and Means to provide for a tax on excess profits now. It is very difficult to amend a rule on a conference report, but EBERHARTER, CARROLL, and Congressmen YOUNG, of Ohio, and KING, of California, undertook the fight. In a joint letter to the Members of the House, they pointed out that the great majority of Senate amendments made only technical changes which legalized new tax avoidance loopholes or reopened loopholes closed by the original House bill. They pointed out that the Senate had made no provision for a tax on excess profits now, but as the letter put it, innocuously attempted to direct the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Finance Committee of the next Congress to report a bill for an excess-profits tax.

The floor fight by the Eberharter group received quick support from those of us who want to check war profiteering and unjust price rises. Congressman CARROLL pointed out that we must take additional steps to curb inflation. An excess-profits tax will do much to curb the drive for higher prices and stem the tendency toward inflation. "Everywhere," he said, "the consumer, the farmer, the small-business man is caught in an economic trap—the trap of rising prices with increased taxes. How can we in good conscience go before the people and say that we will do nothing to stop war profiteering?" Congressman EBERHARTER took the floor to state that more was involved than a matter of the revenue which we so sorely need. "It is a moral issue," he said; "the American people have a right to expect equality of sacrifice in the present emergency."

The Eberharter group carried the House with them. EBERHARTER'S first motion to amend the rule by writing in an excess-profits tax provision was ruled out of order by the Speaker on the ground that it was not properly a part of the present bill. But EBERHARTER'S second motion which was to direct the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee of this Congress, not the next one, to report out an excess-profits tax bill as early as practicable in this session, carried on a roll call vote by 331 to 2.

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Member of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: The flu laid me low last week and I spent most of the week in bed. It was the first bad cold I have had in over a year, so I really have no cause to complain; but I regretted very much having to miss the debate and voting on the bills which came to the floor during the week.

The cold did not catch me until Saturday night, after the House had met in one of its rare Saturday sessions to dispose of the $17,000,000,000 supplemental appropriations bill. This bill added $11,500,000,000 to the amount previously appropriated for military use and made the total for this purpose for the year approximately $25,000,000,000, not including funds for the Atomic Energy Commission, Foreign Assistance Program, and stockpiling projects.

A large sum? It certainly is, but as Congressman GEORGE MAHON, of Texas, pointed out, it is woefully inadequate for total global warfare. MAHON, who is the able chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations, spoke for more than an hour on military appropriations in the recent past and what was in prospect for the immediate future. He explained in some detail where the monetary appropriations for the last 5 years had been spent and showed the reasons why it is almost impossible to be fully prepared in all the troubled spots in the world at the same time.

"Preparation for total world-wide warfare, said MAHON, "would cost us a minimum of $100,000,000,000 a year, if we were to seek maximum preparedness. If that be so," MAHON asked himself, "why are we not spending the $100,000,000,000 in an all-out preparedness effort, rather than the mere $25,000,000,000?"

He answered his own question by saying that the Joint Chiefs of Staff, our top military personnel, upon whose decisions our entire military policy is based, do not believe that world war III has begun, even though we are fighting in Korea. They believe world war III may still be averted and there is no need yet for all out military spending. The present appropriations, MAHON indicated, provide for all the needs of the Armed Forces in creating a strong mobilization base.

In the absence of war, MAHON went on, we must operate from a strong mobilization base rather than being completely mobilized for war. "Nothing would release a potential enemy more than to have us bankrupt our country and destroy our economy by maintaining over a period of years, complete readiness for armed conflict. Our country proceeds upon the theory that our best interests are promoted by taking certain calculated risks." What happened in Korea could happen in Yugoslavia, Iran, Germany, or any one of a dozen places where we have relatively a handful of men. MAHON pointed out: "It has either been a matter of taking calculated risks of some degree, or mobilizing millions of men, arming them to the teeth and stationing them at strategic places all the way around the perimeter of the free world".

There is never a moratorium on politics in Congress. Unheard, apparently, was MAHON'S fine speech and his final statement that "actually, absolute security is unattainable" for no sooner had he concluded than Congressman WIGGLESWORTH, of Massachusetts, one of the ranking Republican members of the Appropriations Committee, took the floor to sound the charge for what will probably be the keynote of the Republican campaign this fall. "Mr. Chairman," he cried, "the people of America are demanding to know what has been done with the billions of dollars approved for national defense since World War II. They are demanding to know how we were caught so lamentably unprepared and so unequipped in Korea."

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Member of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 25, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: I have received many letters from people who are much concerned with our preliminary setbacks in the Korean war, asking "Where did the money go which we appropriated for defense?" I thought a discussion of this point would be timely. Ordinarily I do not like to write a letter which contains many figures and statistics, but in this instance, I believe it is the only way the subject can be properly presented.

Approximately $90,000,000,000 were appropriated and spent for the military functions of the Department of Defense for the fiscal years 1946 to 1950. Of this amount approximately $42,000,000,000, or 45 percent, went to pay for the cost of liquidating many of the expenses of World War II, most of this sum having been spent during the year 1946 when our Nation was speeding its demobilization and reducing its Armed Forces from 12,000,000 men to the peacetime level of 1,500,000 men and women. This liquidation cost included the amounts paid for terminal leave to military personnel who were demobilized, the amount paid to contractors whose wartime production contracts were terminated, and items of that character.

After deducting such liquidation costs, the remaining total amount available for postwar needs of the Armed Forces was approximately $48,000,000,000. Most of this money has gone toward payment of maintenance costs. The cold war has been primarily a maintenance operation. Occupation of conquered countries required by international law has been expensive. Then, there has been the necessity for incurring special costs which cropped up when our Navy was sent to various parts of the world in the interests of preserving peace and when we were suddenly compelled to undertake special operations such as the Berlin airlift.

This is the breakdown of the distribution of such costs:

	Billions of dollars	Percent
Military personnel costs (pay, food, clothing, etc.)	19.86	41.0
Maintenance and operation (aircraft, ships, installations, etc.)	12.78	26.4
Major procurement (weapons, planes, ships, etc.)	8.53	17.6
Research and development	2.25	4.6
Civilian components (National Guard and Reserves)	1.86	3.8
Service-wide administration and classified projects	1.39	2.9
Retired pay	.78	1.6
Military public works	.49	1.0
Mobilization and war readiness	.39	0.8
Other	.11	0.2
Total	48.44	100.0

This breakdown indicates that two of each five defense dollars were spent on military personnel costs such as pay, food, clothing, and transportation.

One and one-quarter of each five defense dollars went for overhead costs such as maintenance and operation of aircraft, ships, installations, and other such necessary expenses.

This means that substantially more than half of our defense outlay—approximately $3.25 from each $5 was paid out just to keep our manpower fed, clothed, housed, paid, and our equipment maintained.

One of each five defense dollars has been spent for such essential activities as research and development on new weapons, maintenance of the National Guard and Reserves, administrative work and classified projects such as the atomic-bomb tests, retired pay, military public works, planning for mobilization and war readiness, and other such work.

Less than one dollar of each five defense dollars, approximately 75 cents, has been used to procure weapons, ships, and planes.

These figures are rounded and approximate, but they tell the story of where the money has been spent for military purposes in the last 5 years.

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Member of Congress.

The Peekskill Incidents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 15, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I extend my remarks by including herein the presentment of the October 1949 grand jury of Westchester County, N. Y., dated June 12, 1950, on the so-called Peekskill Communist riots on August 27 and September 4, 1949:

PRESENTMENT OF THE OCTOBER 1949 GRAND JURY OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY—THE PEEKSKILL INCIDENTS

(Supreme Court of the State of New York, county of Westchester. In the matter of the investigation of certain alleged incidents in the town of Cortlandt and elsewhere in the said county of Westchester on August 27 and September 4, 1949.)

To the Supreme Court of the State of New York held in and for the county of Westchester:

The October 1949 grand jury respectfully presents and reports to this court as follows:

This grand jury was impanelled for the October 1949 term of this court and was charged on October 3, 1949, by Hon. James W. Bailey, justice of the supreme court, "To conduct an investigation into the unfortunate disorder which accompanied the assemblage of a certain communistic group in the vicinity of Peekskill on August 27 and September 4 last." The charge related to two concerts in the town of Cortlandt on said dates at which Paul Robeson was to sing.

As a further part of his charge to the jury, Justice Bailey read the following portion from a statement by the Hon. Thomas E. Dewey, Governor of the State of New York, in which he directed a grand jury investigation:

"I have instructed the district attorney of Westchester County, in addition to completing the investigation of the incidents of August 27, to make a complete, unlimited, and exhaustive grand jury investigation of all of the incidents which occurred, including the following:

"All the disorders which broke out after the meeting of September 4, and whether these disorders were the result of organized planning on the part of any individual or group.

"Whether the meeting was initiated and sponsored for the purpose of deliberately inciting disorder and a breach of the peace, and

"Whether it was part of the Communist strategy to foment racial and religious hatred."

Governor Dewey's statement also directed that the investigation consider:

"Whether the Communist-led guard forces are a quasi-military force."

This grand jury had been drawn in the regular course from the panel of grand jurors to serve as the regular grand jury for the October 1949 term, but was not directed to devote itself exclusively to these incidents.

SCOPE OF INQUIRY

Since being impanelled in October, the grand jury has held 46 morning sessions and 22 afternoon sessions; 247 witnesses have been heard and examined and some of these have been recalled for reexamination from time to time as occasion required. The witnesses have included officials of New York State and Westchester County, members of the police departments of New York State, Westchester County, and local communities, representatives of the Westchester County sheriff's office, organizers and supporters of the Robeson concerts, officers and members of various veteran organizations, residents of the city of Peekskill and the town of Cortlandt and its vicinity, and a large number of persons who were present on one or both of the occasions under investigation, either as concert-goers or as onlookers, some of whom sustained either property damage or personal injury. Witnesses were also heard who were especially competent to discuss the ideological, racial, and social issues that may have been involved.

All persons who requested to be heard by the grand jury were given such an opportunity, and their testimony was taken at great length, even though this proved frequently repetitious.

The leaders of the veterans' organizations who testified waived immunity in addition to all Westchester County officials and New York State Police officials. All persons who made arrangements for or who were actively connected with sponsoring the concerts, including officials of certain Communist-dominated unions which supported the concert of September 4, 1949, who were called to testify, refused to waive immunity.

In the course of its investigations, the grand jury had called to its attention certain reports on the disturbances in the town of Cortlandt on August 27 and September 4 which had been prepared and released by private organizations. To make certain that no evidence was overlooked which might be material to a complete investigation and understanding of these affairs, the grand jury examined the investigators who prepared them; and many persons mentioned therein who had not already served as witnesses.

The testimony taken by this grand jury amounts to more than 5,500 pages.

In addition to the witnesses, voluminous documentary evidence was examined, including still photographs, motion pictures, maps of the area, certain relevant newspaper matter, telegrams and letters, police records, and posters and circulars relating to the concerts.

The "incidents of August 27" and "the disorders which broke out after the meeting of September 4" arose from attempts that were made by certain Communist-dominated groups to hold concerts at which the baritone Paul Robeson was to be the principal attraction. These concerts were staged for the benefit of the Civil Rights Congress, a group organized for and serving solely the interests of communism. The concert planned for August 27, 1949, was prevented from being held by persons hostile to Paul Robeson and his Communist associates. Elaborate precautions were taken to prevent interference with the second concert, and it was held on September 4 with Paul Robeson singing as scheduled. On August 27 a substantial number of persons interested in attending gained admittance to the concert grounds in the expectation that Robeson would appear. A much larger number of persons attended the concert held on September 4. At both the affair scheduled for August 27 and the concert held on September 4, certain disorders and violence occurred resulting in serious injury to various individuals and damage to personal property.

The investigation into these matters has now been completed and the grand jury herewith submits its report.

In order to understand the nature of and underlying causes for the disturbances on August 27 and September 4, it is necessary to have a concept of the character of the community in which these events occurred.

Both the incidents of August 27 and September 4 took place in the town of Cortlandt, Westchester County, N. Y. Cortlandt lies approximately 40 miles north of New York City on the east bank of the Hudson River and has a year-round population of about 15,000 people spread over an area of 42 square miles. Adjacent to it, but not a legal part of it, is the incorporated city of Peekskill with 18,000 residents.

Each summer the year-round population of this region is augmented by large numbers of summer residents and vacationists. To Cortlandt and the adjacent town of Yorktown alone come approximately 20,000 persons, and for this entire area of the mid-Hudson River Valley, the number of summer residents is estimated as high as 50,000. A large majority of these people come from New York City.

Many of these people settle in so-called colonies, located at various points outside Peekskill. Over the years these colonies have developed their own community interests and activities and to a large extent have led a life apart from that of the local residents. There are active minorities of Communists and Communist sympathizers in some of these colonies.

In addition there are Communist-supported camps in the area and adjoining counties which accommodate another large segment of the summer population. Camp Beacon, the largest of these, accommodating up to 1,400 persons at one time, lies about 17 miles north of Peekskill. A dozen or more other Communist camps are located within 40 or 50 miles of Peekskill. Differing from the colonies with their individually owned homes, the camps are organizations, incorporated in some instances, which provide living accommodations for large numbers of people, central dining rooms, and the usual recreation facilities of the summer resort. On the surface these would seem to have no different purpose from that of the many hotels and resorts which are found throughout this popular vacation area. Others are set up as sponsored by labor or fraternal organizations.

These camps, however, constitute important units in the Communist organization, offering inexpensive vacation facilities, but serving also as recruiting and indoctrination centers and in some cases as training schools for the Communist Party. Except at certain times the camps are open to anyone regardless of affiliations but it is interesting to note that their advertising is concentrated in the pages of the Daily Worker, the official organ of the Communist Party. Their general atmosphere and their daily programs are openly and aggressively pro-Communist. Week-end guests of honor and speakers, as announced in the Daily Worker, include many nationally known leaders of the Communist Party. After Labor Day certain of these camps become schools secretly offering to selected groups of Communist Party members intensive training in Marxism, Leninism and methods of overthrowing the United States Government.

The Communists are using these camps as recruiting and training grounds and as potential centers of militant party action when occasion requires. Any attempt to understand fully the background of the incidents under investigation should take into account this record of Communist activities in the area.

The plans and sponsorship for the concert of August 27, 1949, were similar to those for concerts held previously in the area and were designed to appeal to the same public which had supported such gatherings in prior years. In the years 1946, 1947, and 1948 organizations known to be Communist-dominated sponsored concerts featuring Paul Robeson as the principal singer. These were held at Lake Mohegan, in the city of Peekskill, and near Peekskill respectively. These concerts were supported actively by residents of the colonies and camps and attracted audiences numbering up to 4,000 people. No disturbances developed on any of these occasions.

Those interested in holding a Paul Robeson concert in 1949 were repeating a pattern which was developing into an annual custom of staging some "cultural" event to financially aid some Communist purpose.

Publicity about the concert was released through the Daily Worker and the Compass. Local supporters of the concert in the Cortlandt area sold tickets and promoted attendance among their friends. The concert was to be open to anyone who cared to buy a ticket. This was all in general accord with the pattern which was followed in previous years.

The acts and statements of Paul Robeson during 1949 and the growing awareness on the part of the American people of the inherent dangers of communism to the United States were the underlying causes of the outbreak of the disorders in Cortlandt on the evening of August 27, 1949.

In the months prior to August 1949, revelations of Communist activity in the United States focused public attention on this threat to our system of government. The investigations by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the lists of subversive organizations released by the Attorney General of the United States, the trial of the 11 Communists before Judge Medina, the Hiss trial, the Coplon trial, the disclosure of a Communist spy ring in the United States and Canada intent on obtaining military secrets of the highest importance, and general publicity about communistic activities in the Nation's press all tended to create a background of distrust and resentment by loyal Americans against Communists and their supporters.

More specifically, Paul Robeson himself had been quoted widely in the Nation's press in statements derogatory to his native land and favorable to Communist Russia. These statements, quickly challenged by other prominent Negroes, served to emphasize in the public mind Robeson's position as a Communist leader. Thus Paul Robeson in 1949 became a symbol of communism itself.

The cumulative effect of these events was a definite resentment against Robeson's appearance in the town of Cortlandt in August and September 1949 and this resentment was the basic cause of the violence which developed.

The disorders on August 27 were not the result of organized planning on the part of any individual or group. This conclusion is based on a full study of testimony and evidence relating to the events and actions during the week preceding August 27, including local newspaper publicity and the organization of a protest parade.

Prior to 1949 the Peekskill Evening Star, which is the only daily newspaper in the area, gave only a minimum of news coverage and no editorial comment to the several Robeson concerts described above. In 1949, however, when it became known that a fourth Robeson concert was scheduled, the Star devoted considerable space to the approaching affair in both its news and editorial columns and, in addition, printed letters from subscribers, some supporting and some opposing the concert.

"THE DISCORDANT NOTE

"It appears that Peekskill is to be 'treated' to another concert visit by Paul Robeson, renowned Negro baritone.

"Time was when the honor would have been ours—all ours. As things stand today, like most folks who put America first, we're a little doubtful of that honor, finding the luster in the once illustrious name of Paul Robeson now almost hidden by political tarnish.

"Paul Robeson rose to preeminence as an American artist on stage and radio, and was applauded by an America that was oblivious to his color. In spite of modest background, he rose with highest academic honors through our college system, and was chosen an All-American football star.

"His magnificent voice, which thrilled millions, opened up a brilliant career for him that easily could have led to a place in the halls of American fame. His influence with his people, properly directed, could have won a place for him beside Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver, as truly great Negro Americans.

"Any possibility of such attainment is now, in the opinion of most Americans, lost to him forever.

"The local concert will be held this coming Saturday at the Lakeland Acres Picnic Grounds. The singer is being presented by the People's Artists 'for the benefit of the Harlem Chapter, Civil Rights Congress,' according to posters appearing in the neighborhood. Inasmuch as the Civil Rights Congress has been cited as 'subversive and Communist' by Attorney General Tom Clark, and has been referred to by the Congressional Committee on Un-American Activitie. as being 'dedicated not to the broader issues of civil liberties, but specifically to the defense of individual Communists and the Communist Party,' it becomes evident that every ticket purchased for the Peekskill concert will drop nickels and dimes into the till basket of an un-American political organization.

"If the Robeson 'concert' this Saturday follows the pattern of its predecessors, it will consist of an unsavory mixture of song and political talk by one who has described Russia as his 'second motherland,' and who has avowed 'the greatest contempt for the democratic press.'

"The time for tolerant silence that signifies approval is running out. Peekskill wants no rallies that support iron curtains, concentration camps, blockades, and NKVD's, no matter how masterful the decor, nor how sweet the music."

The full effect and significance of this publicity in the Star cannot be established clearly, but this grand jury believes that it served to bring to the surface and intensify the latent resentment against communism which already existed in the community. There is no evidence, however, that this publicity was intended to incite disorders or that it led to organized planning of disorders on the part of any individual or group.

The veterans of Peekskill and the surrounding area decided to hold a protest parade along Hillside Avenue in front of the grounds that had been chosen for the concert. The grand jury finds no evidence that it was organized for any purpose other than the expressed one of an orderly protest against communism.

The plans made by the police authorities for policing the concert scheduled for August 27 were adequate in the light of previous experience and reasonably foreseeable expectancies.

The town of Cortlandt does not maintain a police force and has only one constable whose duties are limited to service of civil process. So the town officials on August 26 requested the sheriff, the principal law enforcement officer of the county, to assign a few men to the scene and also requested the State police, who patrol the area, to assign a couple of men to handle traffic. The sheriff thereupon assigned three deputies, and on August 27, the captain of the State police assigned two uniformed troopers to handle traffic at the main intersection nearest the concert grounds, three plain clothesmen to the scene, and a reserve force of 18 troopers to be held at the Putnam Valley substation, this being the headquarters covering the Cortlandt area. Westchester County had a long history of orderliness and similar Robeson concerts had been held in preceding years without violence. In the light of their experience the precautions taken by those peace officers met the standard of good police procedure.

Telegrams signed by a group of persons interested in having the concert proceed without interruption were first published in the newspaper, and then sent to certain officials in the county and State, being received on August 26. Although the signers of the telegram lived in the area and were aware that it was patrolled by the State police, they failed to contact either the State police or the sheriff of Westchester County.

Early on the evening of August 27 the deputies and State police went to the scene as ordered. About 200 persons were already within the concert grounds, which was an open field, whose entrance was a dirt road leading from Hillside Avenue, the main highway. When the parade started a large number of local residents, including women, young girls, and families with their young children, were along both sides of the road and some of these had parked cars just off the highway. The parade was orderly and without violence. While it was taking place, heckling and name calling went on between the Robeson followers gathered at the entrance and the crowd of onlookers, with some of the marchers joining in.

More than 2,000 people were expected for the concert and of this number about 200 had arrived by 7:30 p. m. A half hour later no further admission to the grounds by car was possible because of the parade, the congestion caused by concertgoers, and general traffic along Hillside Avenue to and from Peekskill. This highway is two lanes in width, one for traffic in each direction.

The veterans marched and countermarched past the entrance to the grounds on Hillside Avenue. At its conclusion the leaders ordered the marchers to disperse and return home. It was then between 8:15 p. m. and 8:30 p. m.

At this time it was dark and various persons had gone part way down the dirt road leading into the concert grounds. The parade being over, they were joined by spectators, curiosity seekers, and individual veterans. As this group advanced down the narrow road the concertgoers brought a truck up from the concert area and parked it across the road at a culvert about 100 yards from the entrance to the concert grounds at Hillside Avenue. Some 25 or 30 of the concertgoers, some wearing arm bands, indicating they were ushers or guards, formed a defense line in front of the truck in order to prevent the oncoming crowd from going further.

As time passed various individual arguments ensued between members of the two groups, various epithets were hurled back and forth, fist fights took place, and stones were hurled indiscriminately by both factions. Some veterans, nonveterans, and concertgoers were injured. While the two groups faced each other on the dirt road near the culvert one of the veterans was stabbed by one of the so-called ushers associated with the sponsors of the concert. This injured veteran was carried to Hillside Avenue where large numbers of spectators learned that he had been stabbed. Up to this point the deputy sheriffs on duty at and near the culvert had been successful in preventing serious disorders and in keeping the two groups from coming together in a manner threatening widespread violence. It was then about 8:30 p. m. The news that a veteran had been stabbed spread rapidly among the hundreds of people along Hillside Avenue, who became enraged at the Robeson followers. This stabbing provided the spark which converted all of these people into an unruly crowd determined to prevent the concert from being staged. When this crowd pushed down the dirt road to join those already there, the concert guards retreated, and the crowd ran down to the concert area and broke up some of the chairs and burned folders containing blank checks, containers, and other forms relating to donations. Some of the containers were clearly marked as having been used to solicit funds for the Lenin memorial. A deputy sheriff succeeded in preventing further serious trouble by turning off the floodlights which illuminated the stage area.

During this time a large wooden cross was burned on a nearby hill. This was an unfortunate prank by a few teen-age boys and had no relation to the Ku Klux Klan or any other antisocial or antireligious organization; nor was it connected in any way with the veterans' organizations.

The dirt road, particularly from the culvert to the highway, was still crowded. One of the deputy sheriffs had earlier left the grounds and called the sheriff's office to send all available deputies from the jail and any who could be reached at their homes throughout the county. Believing that this force would soon arrive, that deputy ordered those of the concertgoers who had gone to their cars, parked near the stage, not to go up this road. Some of the drivers, disregarding or not hearing this order, started up the dirt road and the first of these attempted to speed through the crowd. Boulders and timbers were thrown across this road, and some of the cars were stoned. Eight were halted, their occupants ordered out, and the cars overturned. All efforts to leave the grounds ceased. In a few minutes the sirens of the arriving State police cars were heard and the crowd scattered. Together with the first few of the additional deputy sheriffs this force began to restore order. By 10 o'clock the police forces under the command of the captain of the State police and of the sheriff totaled 23 State troopers and 21 deputy sheriffs and complete order was restored.

This force threw a protective cordon around the concertgoers, escorted those with cars to the highway, and arranged for transportation for those who had come from New York City and other places in the county outside the Cortlandt area.

All of the car owners and all of the concertgoers known to be injured were given an opportunity to testify. None has been able to identify his assailant. With the exception of the stabbed veteran and one concertgoer, no others were seriously injured.

THE INCIDENTS OF SEPTEMBER 4, 1949

The concert of September 4 was planned by the Communist Party to take full advantage of the events of August 27 and as a demonstration of the power of its supporters to hold a meeting in a hostile area.

The leaders of the Communist Party in the New York area went far beyond a reasonable protest of the events of August 27. They used the situation as a means of obtaining sympathy and support for their activities and as an opportunity for stirring up religious and racial issues. Furthermore, they organized a tremendous demonstration of strength in which for the first time they used, on a large scale, their "goon squads," organized as a security guard.

On August 28 a large rally was held in Katonah in Westchester County at which speakers from various Communist-controlled organizations in New York City and Westchester County described the events of the night before and stirred up interest in holding another concert. On August 29, the officers of the Communist-controlled fur workers unions issued a joint statement urging a second concert and pledging to defend and support one—a pledge which was fulfilled with men and money. On August 30 Paul Robeson addressed a mammoth rally in Harlem in which he stated that "From now on we take the offensive" and that he would bring his own protection with him on his return to Peekskill. On September 1, announcement was made by People's Artists, Inc., of New York City which was the sponsor of the August 27 concert, and by the group in Westchester County who were interested in the first affair, that Paul Robeson would return on September 4 to sing at the former Hollow Brook Country Club, about a mile from the scene of the first proposed concert.

The Daily Worker called for a gigantic turn-out. It listed automobile routes to the concert and also eight points in Manhattan where chartered busses would be available. Specific locations and times of departure were given for members of the Communist-dominated United Office and Professional Workers Union, Local 65 of the Wholesale Warehouse Workers Union, and the International Fur and Leather Workers Union. In its editorial which appeared on September 3, the Daily Worker called for attendance by at least 20,000.

In accordance with the statements of Paul Robeson a security guard consisting of several thousand men was provided by the concert organizers. Plans were adopted for transporting this guard to the grounds in busses chartered for the purpose and in private cars. Thus the Communist led forces prepared themselves to hold their meeting in an area which was antagonistic to their reappearance.

It was part of the Communist strategy in connection with the September 4 concert to foment racial and religious hatred. During the week before September 4, the Daily Worker repeatedly emphasized that the August 27 incident was wholly anti-Semitic and anti-Negro. Mass meetings held in Westchester County and New York City under Communist auspices reiterated this same charge. National and local leaders of the Communist Party in statements and speeches used such phrases as "an attack on minority groups led by the Ku Klux Klan," "Anti-Semitism and Negro baiting." Robeson made the usual Communist attempt to ally the party with Negroes and Jews as the likely victim "if the Fascist-inspired prowar forces win." A leaflet emphasizing the alleged "anti-Negro and anti-Semitic Lynch Mob" was distributed by the Civil Rights Congress, the American Labor Party, the Tenants Council, and the Communist Party, which outlined the locale of the concert, directions for autoists, and locations for interested persons to board buses to be provided.

In Harlem a poster was distributed reading "People of Harlem * * * the Ku Klux Klan held a lynching party in Peekskill yesterday." The Communist Civil Rights Congress issued a news letter entitled "Stop the anti-Negro terror."

The testimony before the grand jury shows that more than 2,500 men were assembled at the concert as the security guard. They came from Brooklyn, Manhattan, the Bronx, Long Island, from Westchester and from Communist camps located in other counties. About 300 men assembled at 5 a. m. near Communist Party headquarters in Brooklyn. A leader and his aides divided them into groups which filled nine busses. Most of these men carried baseball bats. The men were a strong-arm group and made up a part of a "security guard" charged with the responsibility of protecting the concert area. On the trip to the town of Cortlandt Communist songs were sung and threats were made against the veterans whom they blamed for the disorders of the previous week. In excess of 1,000 men were transported to the former Hollow Brook Country Club in this manner. Other groups came in private cars and helped make up the "security guard" of over 2,500 men.

Although the concert was scheduled for 2:30 p. m. most of these men reached the grounds before midmorning. Their leader wore the uniform of a United States lieutenant. They were stationed in military formation, shoulder to shoulder, in two huge circles, one circle around the perimeter of the concert grounds, another inner circle with a third ring around the stage area itself. This force remained in position for from 8 to 10 hours. They were armed with baseball bats, bottles, pepper, and can openers.

When the police arrived on the scene in the morning and saw the situation, they called the leader and demanded the surrender of the weapons from the security guard. Some 30 bats were surrendered, but the rest were concealed within the concert grounds. The police decided not to force the guards to relinquish the remaining weapons lest such action provoke serious trouble.

This was the first time that the Communists had disclosed their organized and militant forces on so large a scale in the Nation. These forces, usually described by their leaders as "defensive and protective," have been used many times on lesser occasions and in smaller numbers in an offensive and aggressive manner.

The Communist use of small groups, commonly known as "goon squads," for intimidation, coercion, and incitement of trouble has been frequently revealed in industrial strife, race riots, and other social disorders in this country. What the American people had not hitherto witnessed was a full-scale demonstration of the power of the Communists to mobilize their militant forces quickly and in sufficient strength to constitute a potential challenge to the authority of government. The concert of September 4 supplied the opportunity for such a demonstration.

The security guard was a disciplined force and conducted itself in a military manner under the direction of leaders as a quasi-military force, but did not come within the definition of a "military company or organization" set forth in the military law of the State of New York.

While the security guards provided by sponsors of the concert were prepared to use force if necessary, they conducted themselves in an orderly and peaceful manner, with the exception of two incidents within the concert grounds which necessitated minor police action.

The veterans groups of Peekskill and its neighboring towns planned another protest parade on the road leading past the entrance to the concert grounds. This parade was held according to plan without serious incident and at its conclusion, the commander ordered the colors furled and the marchers were directed to return home.

Widespread publicity arising from the violence on August 27 and the feeling created by the stabbing of a veteran on that occasion attracted thousands of spectators who lined the road during the parade and remained in the area after its conclusion.

Although violence did break out after the concert this did not result from planning or organization on the part of any individual or groups or people to incite or foster such disturbances.

It was obvious to the Westchester County authorities that if the concert planned for September 4 was to be as tremendous a demonstration as was being promised in New York by Paul Robeson and his followers, a severe traffic problem would be created on the few narrow roads leading to the concert area. Furthermore, it was apparent that the campaign of hate being whipped up by Communist propagandists and the establishment of their own security guards on the scene in close proximity to the parading veterans organizations could provide the setting for a full-scale riot. The police authorities took every precaution and did all that they could within their powers to ensure proper and adequate policing at the September 4 concert.

The authorities decided to use none but trained and uniformed police. In addition to the State police regularly located in Westchester County, the Governor of New York, at the request of Westchester County authorities, ordered all available members of the force from other areas to be present. Arrangements were further made for half of the Westchester County Parkway police to be transferred from their regular duties on the busy Labor Day week end. All deputy sheriffs, except those needed at the jails, the sheriff's emergency force, and volunteers from the police departments of 31 municipalities of the county were also directed to be on hand.

Finally, the Peekskill police and auxiliaries were assigned to duty within that city and on its highways up to the northern boundary about 2 miles from the concert grounds. Fifty Putnam County police and deputy sheriffs were patrolling that county and its highways about 2 miles north of the concert scene.

Altogether 904 experienced police officers were on duty covering the concert area and its environs on September 4.

Prior to the day of the concert, the authorities responsible for policing the affair studied the terrain, chose the position for a command post and drew up a plan for disposition of the police forces. A helicopter was chartered to observe and report conditions from the air; a State police radio-equipped trailer, radio police cars, walkie-talkies, and loud-speakers were provided. Preparations were made to have at the scene a field hospital, staffed by a doctor and three nurses, and two ambulances; also such emergency equipment as fire trucks, wrecking units, portable flood lights, and generators.

In contrast to the affair of August 27, the concert announced for September 4 was held as planned. An audience of over 15,000 people assembled at the scheduled time and place, having entered the concert grounds under police protection, and listened to a program of music and speaking without interference.

During this time veteran groups paraded on the nearby highway approximately one-fourth of a mile from the concert stage in protest against communism as represented by the concert's sponsors and participants. The parade was conducted in an orderly manner. Only one individual created a disturbance by riding a horse into the entrance, but he was immediately stopped by police and arrested. At its close the marshal ordered the veteran to return home.

Crowds of spectators, estimated at more than 5,000, lined the highway past the entrance to the concert grounds. Many of these were women and teen-age boys and girls. Their attitude toward the concert-goers was indicated by booing and cries of "Commies!" and "Go back to Russia!" and similar epithets, including isolated and anti-Semitic and anti-Negro expressions. The concertgoers in turn shouted derogatory remarks at the spectators. Nothing developed to interfere with access to the concert and all who wished to attend were able to do so.

Whatever the potentials for disorder at this time, the police were able to maintain order and to prevent interference with the concert.

The New York State troopers, Westchester County Parkway police, deputy sheriffs and the police from the various municipalities of the county were assembled and organized into a single effective policing unit. Many of the police served voluntarily and all of them did so at great personal risk, and since they were serving outside of their communities, they were not protected in their pension rights, if they were disabled on that occasion. Most of the local police had been on duty from midnight to 8 a. m. and then all day at Cortlandt and had to return to their respective homes and go on duty again from midnight to 8 a. m.—a stretch of 32 hours without rest of any kind. All of the State police from upstate had to drive home the night of September 4, some as far as the Canadian border, and go on duty on Labor Day, September 5, without any rest. One of the State troopers received a deep gash in the skull from a thrown rock.

At the conclusion of the concert a heavy concentration of police moved the crowd back from the only exit and cars started to leave the grounds. A short distance away the first group of about a dozen cars was stoned by hostile spectators. A mobile squad was immediately rushed to that point, the area cleared and traffic rerouted. No further incidents occurred near the exit.

The terrain in the Cortlandt area is hilly and wooded and in many places along the roads there are high wooded banks from which stones could be hurled without detection. Some hoodlums were arrested on the spot and are being prosecuted but under the circumstances it was not possible for even the large police force on the scene to apprehend all of those guilty of stone throwing. Most of the stonings took place within a mile or two of the concert grounds but some occurred miles away. Stonings occurred as far away as Tarrytown, approximately 20 miles from the point where the police were required to be concentrated.

Some of the marchers and some of the spectators had heard the master of ceremonies refer to the veterans as "un-American filth." This remark inflamed many who heard it.

Orders had been issued to the police forces lining the roads to keep the concertgoers and spectators apart at all costs. To make certain that no one broke through their lines, the police were told to stand their ground and not to leave their posts. This strategy necessarily enabled hoodlum elements in some instances within sight of the police, to harass and stone cars and busses leaving the concert area. Nevertheless, had those in charge of the policing not followed this plan, more serious violence, and possibly mass killings, might well have occurred.

When reports of stonings came in to emergency headquarters by phone, walkie-talkie or by radio from the helicopter, squads in police cars were dispatched to the trouble points. Arrests were made in some cases, and in others the culprits fled as the police cars approached.

Most of the security guards maintained their positions for hours after the concert. Hundreds of them were in the grounds until long after dark. This made it necessary to keep a large force of police in the immediate vicinity of the concert grounds at a time when they were also needed along the roads.

Many persons riding in cars and busses suffered bodily injury as a result of these stonings. Some people were hurt critically. Nine members of the police forces were also injured. In addition three private automobiles were overturned at points located a mile or more from the concert grounds. One of those responsible has been indicted by a previous grand jury, and criminal proceedings were instituted against 10 others arrested by police along the highways.

As the afternoon drew to a close, there was great confusion in the concert area. Many of the bus drivers deserted their vehicles. Some of these busses were later driven by qualified drivers chosen from the concertgoers.

By 6 o'clock most of the concertgoers had left the area. The remaining members of the security guard started to leave in private cars and busses. On the way out of the grounds one of the guards swung at a policeman with a baseball bat. Thereupon all remaining cars and busses were stopped and their occupants were searched for weapons. More than 200 baseball bats and many tire irons and bottles were confiscated. Then this group was permitted to proceed.

As darkness approached approximately 700 of the security guard who were stranded without transportation gathered and demanded permission to march in a body to Mohegan Colony about 2 miles distant. Permission was refused and the group was taken there under police escort in busses commandeered for that purpose and driven by regular drivers under orders as deputy sheriffs. The concert area was finally cleared at about 10:30 p. m.

The plans for policing the concert of September 4 were well executed in the light of the circumstances which existed, and, moreover, the police did not use any more force than was justified in the emergency, and in the tense, inflammable situation which confronted them.

GENERAL FINDING AND CONCLUSIONS OF THIS INVESTIGATION

The previous sections of this report have been devoted specifically to presenting the findings and conclusions of the grand jury with respect to the charge made to it by the Honorable James W. Bailey, justice of the supreme court, and the statement directing the investigation made by the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey, Governor of the State of New York.

In addition, the jury has made certain findings and conclusions of a general character which either relate directly to the events which transpired in the town of Cortlandt on August 27 and September 4 or are considered pertinent to the investigation. This section of the report, therefore, will be devoted to a presentation of such findings and conclusions.

1. While this grand jury was engaged in its investigation, the American Civil Liberties Union undertook to make public what it described as a report of violence in Peekskill and which purported to be an accurate description of the two incidents which occurred in the town of Cortlandt. Definite conclusions as to these affairs were included. The report was signed also by several other national organizations, but it was initiated and prepared by the American Civil Liberties Union. A copy of the report was sent by the director of the American Civil Liberties Union to the foreman of this grand jury in the early stages of this investigation.

When the report was submitted, the grand jury undertook to conduct a thorough inquiry into its text, sources of information, and conclusions in order to make certain that no evidence pertinent to the grand jury's investigation might be overlooked.

Testimony by the investigators of the American Civil Liberties Union revealed that the inquiry was based from the start on a biased assumption as to the underlying cause of the disorders. An examination of the report itself indicated that gossip, rumors, and unverified stories of prejudiced persons were accepted as evidence in support of this premise, while competent testimony which did not support it was rejected. A careful checking of certain statements quoted in the report and the descriptions of certain incidents therein proves them to be inaccurate as to the facts and grossly misleading in the implications conveyed.

Inasmuch as the American Civil Liberties Union has considerable influence on a large number of persons, this grand jury feels an obligation to point out the flimsy foundation upon which the report was based. Much of its text and some of its conclusions are so far from the truth as to be scandalous.

The wide distribution of its report by the American Civil Liberties Union and the resulting press publicity can hardly have failed to obscure rather than clarify public understanding of the real nature and significance of these incidents. Thus the Communists were supplied with an effective propaganda weapon, ideally suited to their technique of using exaggerated social tensions, false issues, and confused liberal thinking to conceal, while at the same time furthering, their real purposes.

2. The grand jury is convinced that the violence which developed on both occasions at the town of Cortlandt was basically neither anti-Semitic nor anti-Negro in character. Despite the surface indications of racial and religious prejudice in some of the epithets hurled at the concertgoers, it is clear from the evidence that the fundamental cause of resentment and the focus of hostility was communism.

The two parades of the veterans, in each of which the local post of the Jewish War Veterans voluntarily participated, were conceived and executed as protests against communism, and communism alone.

Scurrilous anti-Semitic pamphlets and stickers found in the area on September 4 were traced to the activities of two professional anti-Semites from other parts of the State and were not distributed or posted by the veterans or local residents. The attempts of these two to give out the literature was stopped by veterans and spectators who resented their activities, and who drove them from the concert area. The public boasts of one of these linking himself with the veterans are not true to the facts.

To the extent that community resentment centered in Paul Robeson, it was directed against him not as a Negro but as one whose reported acts and utterances identified him in the public mind as a leading proponent of communism.

Notwithstanding these facts, the Communist Party lost no time in exploiting this situation for its own purposes. As described in an earlier section of this report, every weapon of Communist propaganda was immediately put into action after the August 27 incident in order to build up a false picture of racial and religious hatred at Cortlandt.

By this barrage of condemnation and protest over anti-Semitism, Negro-baiting, and Ku Klux violence, to which the incident of September 4 gave fresh impetus, the Communists succeeded in diverting attention from the simple fact that hatred of communism itself lay at the root of the disorders.

All of this followed the usual Communist strategy, in line with the official instructions laid down by Moscow. The present instance is important in revealing how quickly and skillfully the Communists can seize on any civil disturbance and by distortion and misrepresentation twist it into a "cause" with which to rally their own front organizations and at the same time enlist the sympathy and support of outside individuals and groups.

3. This jury cannot condemn too strongly the un-American unwarranted, and lawless acts of violence which took place at Cortlandt on August 27 and September 4. That such crimes were committed against persons sympathetic to the cause of communism does not excuse the acts in the slightest.

Their perpetrators are to be censured in the strongest manner as having caused serious injury to the best interests of the community and of the United States.

These disorders were materially beneficial to the cause of communism. Avowed Communists, fellow travelers, and left-wing sympathizers are not turned from their beliefs by such demonstrations of violence. The Communist cause undoubtedly gained sympathizers among many who sincerely resented the disorderly acts on both occasions.

In addition the situation which was created at Cortlandt gave the Communists propaganda material which could not have been more perfect had they designed it for themselves. The disorders and violence were publicized throughout the world at a time when this country was engaged in a world-wide effort on the diplomatic front to maintain and win over adherents to the side of democracy.

It is tragic that the type of behavior which loyal Americans find repugnant in communism was resorted to by misguided patriotic citizens as a protest against communism.

Unfortunately only a few of the perpetrators of these acts at both the August 27 and September 4 affairs were arrested and prosecuted for their crimes. At the August 27 incident the disorders were committed in the darkness when the law enforcement officers present already had their hands full controlling the mob, and observation was difficult. On September 4 the police could not chase and capture all the culprits because of the necessity of maintaining assigned positions and of keeping the opposing groups apart in order to prevent mass violence.

Since that time the authorities have made a determined effort to identify those who committed crimes through a mass of photographs and by questioning a large number of individuals. These efforts, on the whole, have proved fruitless. In a few instances, the lack of credible corroborative evidence has made indictments impossible.

Patriotic and loyal Americans, both as individuals and as groups, must be on the alert against being drawn into Communist traps which may be set for the purpose of inviting situations that might encourage violence. Throughout the county of Westchester and the Nation, responsible local organizations such as churches, schools, professional, and business associations, veterans' organizations and other civic groups should actively discourage their members from being present when affairs sponsored by subversive groups are being held.

In addition, local officers should be given sufficient authority to permit them to exercise the widest discretion in preventing the development of conditions which might result in an outbreak of violence.

4. It is a part of the Communist strategy to create a distrust of public officials by distortion and magnification of incidents such as these, and also to bring about incidents to harass those officials and distract them from their functions of serving the community. This grand jury believes that all police officials of and in Westchester County are able and ready to fulfill their obligations to all citizens to the limit of their available manpower. But if the situation of September 4 should recur, there are not enough police available to cover the roads and bordering fields in a rural area. To deputize untrained persons is not the answer. This grand jury respectfully suggests to the officials of the county and the State that liaison be established and plans made now to handle any future incident, and that State guard units numbering thousands of uniformed men, trained in riot duty, be made available to supplement local and State police.

5. Two methods for meeting the threat of communism are apparent to this grand jury.

First, legislative bodies should continue to consider appropriate laws to combat the Communist problem. Citizens should keep themselves informed about legislative proposals and should express their opinions in that regard to their duly elected representatives.

Second, education concerning the true purposes and meaning of communism should be undertaken in every community. Many unsuspecting persons are hoodwinked into becoming associated with Communist activities because they are not informed about the real manner in which the party operates. Communists frequently identify themselves with worthy causes and then infiltrate the organizations which have been set up to pursue them. Ultimately, under a cloak of respectability, the Communists use these organizations to follow their own nefarious purposes.

In addition, the Communists often create their own welfare organizations with names that would lead innocent people to lend their support to them believing that they are devoted solely to achieving what appear to be desirable objectives.

This grand jury doubts that the potential risks of having Communist cells in Westchester County are fully appreciated by its residents. Community leaders and local organizations should undertake to make certain that ignorance regarding this movement is dispelled.

6. The grand jury's investigation has shed important light on certain aspects of Communist organization, resources, and purposes as disclosed on August 27 and September 4. The specific actions under study were local to Westchester County and the New York area; what these actions revealed has a far wider significance.

The speed and dexterity with which the Communists organized the demonstration of September 4, assembling with only 3 days of preparation in a rural community 40 miles from New York City an audience of 15,000 people and a security guard of 2,500 men, points to an alert and thoroughly prepared organization. That this organization is not confined to New York City but has its ramifications throughout Westchester County and adjacent areas is clearly established by the evidence relating to both incidents.

Its proximity to New York City makes Westchester County an ideal field of operation for the Communist Party and convincing evidence indicates the existence throughout the county of a network of Communist cells. The camps and colonies referred to earlier in this report constitute larger centers of Communist activity, important both as recruiting and as training sources. These cells, camps, and colonies are well known to all of the police authorities having jurisdiction in Westchester County.

Whatever the number of party members in the county may be, their activities in front organizations and their infiltration into other, entirely reputable, organizations gives them an influence out of all proportion to their actual numbers.

Of chief significance locally is the fact that in Westchester County there are individuals and groups professing an alien ideology controlled by the absolute discipline of the Communist Party, and ready to serve its purposes at any time and in any way. Since the Communist Party is dedicated to the overthrow of this Government by whatever means necessary, including violence, the grand jury is convinced that the presence of these Communist groups in Westchester County constitutes a serious potential menace to the community.

A close study of the concert of September 4 indicates that on that day Westchester County was used by the Communist Party as a proving ground to test its machinery for mobilizing its forces, manipulating public opinion, and, more important, for rehearsing its strong-arm forces.

These strong-arm forces, whose militant strength was revealed in the security guard at Cortlandt, must be recognized for what they are—the shock troops of a revolutionary force which is controlled by a foreign power and committed to methods and ultimate ends incompatible with our constitutional system.

Respectfully submitted.

Reservists Face Employment Discrimination

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended editorial from the September 9, 1950, issue of Armed Force deals eloquently with the problem faced by many citizens because of their membership in the Reserve components:

JOB FOR THE CCPB

Very real—though sometimes hidden—penalties are now being paid by hundreds of thousands of men throughout the Nation because of the mere fact of their membership in civilian component organizations, or because they fall within foreseeable draftage limits. In many instances, these men are being denied employment or blocked from deserved promotion because of the fear of employers that their tenure in specific jobs may not be sufficient to hire them or advance them.

From the employers' standpoint, a good argument often can be raised to support this reluctance to become involved with employees who may be yanked out of civilian clothes and garbed with a uniform in the near future. This is particularly true with reference to the more desirable, and more remunerative, positions, which generally call for varying degrees of on-the-job training or special skills attainable only by practical experience. In smaller firms, or those less secure financially, vital economic considerations may overrule the employer's latent desire to be unselfishly patriotic.

This is small comfort, however, to the man whose own economic necessity or domestic responsibility demands that he get employment, remain employed, or that he advance his career, and whose progress is blocked by his own patriotic participation in Reserve or National Guard activities. If he happens to be one of several men competing for a coveted job, he cannot avoid a suspicion that his civilian component activity is acting to his detriment.

One tragic aspect of this is that many who are affected by this particular aspect of war psychology may well be never called into service. For some there will be no war-service demand, for others, dependency ties or unsuspected physical deficiencies will make them ineligible. Under the present deferment regulations, however, there will be no way for them to ascertain this until they actually are summoned for active duty.

With full realization of the complex problems faced by the Armed Forces in determining present and future needs, it admittedly would be next to impossible, as matters now stand, to rule in advance on all cases of this sort. With most Reserve policy matter now falling within the purview of the Regular establishments, perhaps a study of the problem, leading to recommendations to ease this situation, could properly be instituted by the Civilian Components Policy Board. This group should, by its very nature, have the most intimate first-hand knowledge of civilian component problems, and perhaps could make room on its agenda for an exploration of the impact on individual welfare of the present type of mobilization.

At the very least, possibly some system could be devised to offer those reasonably sure that they will not become subject to call a chance to find out for certain. It seems logical to presume that some way could be found to reassure those with chronic disabling ailments, or with insoluble dependency situations, that their eligibilty for service is almost nil. The ordinary hardships inflicted on the individual during war, or even during partial mobilization, are taken for granted, and generally are borne without undue complaint. The CCPB would perform a real service, both to the individual civilian component members and to the Armed Forces, if it could point the way to minimizing unnecessary personal hardships and penalties on the Nation's civilian soldiers.

A Few Highlights of the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARRATT O'HARA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall be returning within a few days to my neighbors and friends in the Second District of Illinois. During the sessions of the Eighty-first Congress I have resided at a hotel across the street from my office, so that desk and bed have been separated by not more than 5 minutes, and this arrangement has enabled me to give the fullest possible measure of my time in an earnest effort to serve at least with industry the men and women whom I have the great honor to represent.

For the many gracious and helpful considerations accorded me by the Speaker and the leadership of the House I am deeply appreciative, the more so because it has been these recognitions that have made it possible for me to serve my constituents better than otherwise would have been the case. My assignment to the Banking and Currency Committee, the only member from Chicago, I accepted as a compliment, not to me, but to the people of the Second District of Illinois, who were so vitally affected by the conditions growing out of the housing shortage.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the sound and constructive housing legislation framed in our committee and enacted by the Eighty-first Congress has been a legislative achievement of major importance. The effect has been reflected in the current home construction figures, which have reached an all-time high.

I shall not be satisfied, however, until we have attained the objective of a decent roof within the means to buy or to rent of every family in America. I was the cosponsor of a bill in the Eighty-first Congress which at least would have started us on the road. This bill would have brought the monthly shelter cost from $90 to $60, a difference of one-third, which with many families in the middle-income group means the difference between having or going without. It was an honest and a practical attempt to bring home ownership under the present high-cost conditions within the reach of many more people. After a hard fight it was defeated on the floor of the House, but only after the real-estate lobby had been forced to its last reserve of pressure. I shall reintroduce this bill in the Eighty-second Congress, and I expect it to pass.

MINIMUM WAGE

During the period when I was Lieutenant Governer of Illinois and chairman of a committee that attracted national attention to the low wages paid to women in employment, many of the clerks then in the fashionable stores of Chicago receiving $5 a week and less, the first State minimum wage laws were passed. This was the beginning of the minimum-wage movement. It was a very happy moment for me when as a Member of the Eighty-first Congress I could vote for a bill that assured the humblest worker in our land a wage of at least 75 cents an hour. The bill was passed and became a law.

PENSIONS FOR THE AGED

Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak only on one other matter. I never have been happy with the provision we make in our industrial society for the aged. We wear out men and women, and when the years come on and they cannot keep the pace and are replaced we make provision for them all too meager. I do not like to think of an aging man or woman, who has given to the world years of service and of toil, suffering all the agonies of trying to eke out an existence on a pittance.

Despite the demands of my office work and attendance at my committee meetings and on the floor of the House I have found the time to attend and participate in every conference since I have been a Member of the Eighty-first Congress and of which I had knowledge, the purpose of which was to hurry the day when every person in the United States on reaching 65 would receive on the first of every month sufficient for not eking out existence but for comfortable living.

I shall continue in the Eighty-second Congress to work for that objective. A comfortable living for all our aged is the required condition of any society which meets the concept of decent people.

SOCIAL SECURITY BROADENED

Among the great achievements of the Eighty-first Congress has been the enactment of the amendments expanding the Nation's social-security system.

The new law extends security in their later years to some 10,000,000 additional Americans. It raises benefits to conform with higher costs of living. Furthermore, it liberalizes eligibility requirements; potential recipients of benefits will not be required to work so many years under social-security coverage as before, and retired workers, survivors, and dependents will be able to earn more money without forfeiting the right to their benefit payments.

These benefits are made to the people not as a matter of charity nor as a public dole, but as their earned right. It must be kept in mind that social security is fundamentally an insurance plan.

BROADER COVERAGE

The 10,000,000 new recipients of social-security benefits are, for the most part, persons who have been self-employed, such as grocers, retail-store and gas-station owners, and life-insurance salesmen—full time. Beginning January 1, 1951, these persons will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Also provided for under the new law are agricultural workers—although farmers, in the strict sense, are not yet included under social security. Included under the term "agricultural worker" are persons engaged in such work as raising livestock or fur animals, processing or delivering crops to storage or to market, doing household work on a farm, and handling fruits and vegetables for commercial firms.

Domestic workers in nonfarm homes will be eligible to join the system next January, as will the following: Federal employees not covered already by a Federal retirement system; State and municipal employees, provided the particular State wishes to enter into an agreement with the Federal Government whereby it will be set forth specifically which groups of employees will be covered under social security—any State or city employee already covered by an existing retirement system will be, of course, ineligible for social security—employees of nonprofit institutions, such as churches, hospitals, and schools, provided the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution; certain full-time traveling salesmen—other than house-to-house—many delivery-truck drivers; and home industrial workers, provided they satisfy certain conditions.

LARGER BENEFITS

Immediately effective is an increase in social-security payments; checks to be mailed out October 3 will offer the recipient, on the average, about 75 percent more than he has been receiving.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without dependents:

Now	New law
$10	$20.00

50	92
55	110
60	117
65	122
70	128
75	133

After June 1952 a new formula may be used to compute benefits. This formula will yield approximately twice the benefits now being received. A person can begin to use this new formula just as soon as he has worked for six quarter years—a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The table below shows, roughly, what the benefits will be under this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	86
$200	65	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $10 to $20, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150.

EASIER ELIGIBILITY

In the future persons will not have to work so long in order to be fully insured and eligible to receive payments upon reaching the retirement age of 65. The table below indicates how the new law compares with the old law as to the number of quarter years of social-security coverage required for wage earners of various ages before they can be eligible for payment.

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
76 or over	6	6
75	8	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
67	24	6
66	26	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
61	36	8
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
56	40	18
55	40	20
50	40	30
45 or under	40	40

All of the time a person has worked under social security up to now is, of course, still applicable to the new coverage requirement.

This means that any insured worker now 65 or over who has had six quarter years of social-security coverage can draw benefits immediately.

Again, any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he starts his social-security coverage only next year, will be eligible to draw benefits as soon as he becomes 65.

Finally, the relaxation of coverage requirements will greatly assist those who have just been allowed by the new law to come under social security—e. g., the self-employed businessman. It will not be so difficult for them to attain the requirements for eligibility, so that they might begin to draw payments as soon as possible after reaching the age of 65.

As to how much a retired worker, his survivors, or his dependents can earn without losing the right to receive benefits, the limit has been raised from $14.99 to $50 per month.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

Survivors and dependents of the insured worker will, on the whole, receive the same proportion of the primary benefit—the basic payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents—as at present; therefore, their benefits will increase, on the average, 75 percent—and after 1952, 100 percent—over the present levels.

Other major changes in the law concerning survivors and dependents are:

First. A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits, provided she has a child in her care.

Second. The divorced former wife of a deceased insured worker may in some cases receive benefits on his record if she is caring for his children.

Third. The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—formerly one-half.

Fourth. A dependent husband or widower of a fully and currently insured woman who is entitled to old-age and survivors insurance benefits or who died after August 1950, is now eligible for insurance payments when he becomes 65.

Fifth. Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly, these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivors' benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

Veterans of World War II also are affected by this new law in that it provides wage credits of $160 for each month of active military or naval service to men and women who had 90 days or more of active military service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947.

I was happy to give my active support and vote for this legislation because of the increased benefits it will bestow upon our people. But as the representative in the Congress from the Second District of Illinois, I will not be satisfied until we have reached, as reach we must and will, the objective of an assured really comfortable living for every person in our country who has reached the age of 65.

Address of Former New York Congressman John J. O'Connor on Constitution Day, September 17, 1950, at the New York University Hall of Fame, Under the Auspices of the American Defense Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, one of the ablest and most courageous Members who ever served in this House is our former colleague from New York, the Honorable John J. O'Connor, who was chairman of the powerful Committee on Rules.

On last Sunday, September 17, 1950, he delivered an informative and inspiring address at the New York University Hall of Fame on the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of our American Constitution.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include this outstanding and patriotic American address which I hope all the lovers of liberty in our own country and all over the world could read and live by:

Today, thoughtful Americans, everywhere, will pause, momentarily, at least, on this one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of our American Constitution—to contemplate on what that unparalleled document means to them, and to our children, and to to the entire world.

That hallowed instrument, defining liberty, in plain words, which all might understand, was substantially the first prescription for Government which was placed in written form, so that all who runs may read. It was in fact our second attempt at putting into the written word the principles upon which a free people would establish a government. The insufficient Articles of Confederation was the first edition of our Constitution of the United States.

Prior to those writings, governments and their rulers, emperors, kings, Princes, Sultans and dictators, and all other bosses, self-appointed or otherwise, dared not, or, at least, disdained to condescend to put on parchment or on paper, the rights, or the restrictions placed on their peoples or more especially on themselves, or the liberties and privileges of their subjects. Government was conducted hit or miss—mostly hit, with the club—and as variable as the weather vane. It was fashioned for each moment and every occasion, to suit the whims and the fancies, and the passions, and the madnesses of those in power at the particular hour, and whether those bosses had been placed there by some of the people, or were sitting on thrones by divine right—a sacrilegious phrase—or by usurpation following the force of arms.

Election by the people was not yet included in common parlance. Who bossed them was just none of their business. The people were too dumb to have any concern, a sentiment not entirely obliterated even in our day, if you recall the expressions of New Deal spokesmen, of the present decade.

It was a world-startling and novel experiment, which these 55 delegates—from 12 States—appointed to the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia—framed, and which 39 of those illustrious Americans approved, over their signatures, on that fateful day of September 17, 1787.

Several of those immortal leaders of our Nation are enshrined here in our presence, in this great Hall of Fame. Before you leave these impressive surroundings, gaze once again on the faces of three of those delegates, George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and James Madison. It will accentuate that veneration which you express here today.

From May 12 of that year 1787, 4 months before, they had given their all to the creation of this masterpiece, which the renowned English statesman, Gladstone, praised as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

Look around you in this Hall of Fame of Great Americans and you will see some of those men, who possessed that brain and that purpose, which we have inherited.

You will also see over 70 other great Americans, including 7 American women illustrious and honored for their achievements and their contributions to our country and to the world.

You may know that this distinctive pantheon for American leaders was conceived and begun in about 1900; that every 5 years 100 distinguished Americans, from every State in the Union, meet and vote on the candidates to be included in this honor roll, and a bronze statue placed here to commemorate each one so elected.

Incidentally it was most thoughtful of the founders of this memorial, that one of the qualifications of each candidate be, that he must have been dead at least 25 years. That restriction gives rise to contemplation as to which—if any—of our contemporaries, now living or recently demised, will be nominated for the honor.

Before you leave here today, please traverse the course of the colonnade, from the first replica, of George Washington, along through John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Paine, on to the last placed, and last elected, in 1945, Booker T. Washington. In no other country in all the world, could we find such a line-up, as the school athlete would say—from George Washington, the aristocrat, to Booker T. Washington—born a slave.

Those great Americans, men and women, are remembered here because our Constitution made it possible. They were not picked out, in some smoke filled room, by political bosses, on the sole qualification of race, creed, or religion.

We have currently witnessed that disgraceful and abhorrent method of selection, in the designation of political candidates for New York's State and city offices—a Jew here, a Catholic there, a Protestant for this place, then to the races—an Italian here, a normally Catholic one, then an Italian against him, this time an anomaly, a Protestant Italian, then an Irishman, and so on, ad nauseam. The Communist American Labor Party features the gullible and unsuspecting Negro.

Such a flaunting of the precepts of our Constitution and our American traditions should be challenged by our people, and their disgust emphatically registered.

In the limited field within which to express a choice, there may well be difficulty in registering that protest at the polls, but as long as free speech, guaranteed by our Constitution, is preserved to us, we can utter—and loudly I suggest—our denunciation of this non-American and anti-American method of selecting our public officials.

That spirit of bigotry is a fit companion for its counterpart—subversiveness. And strangely those two usually go hand in hand. No real American entertains either.

When challenged as to lack of sufficient Americanism, such types almost invariably fall back on our Constitution and especially article V, of its sacred Bill of Rights.

Samuel Johnson, the great author, coined the phrase "Patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel."

We may append to that, and prove, that the last refuge of the subversive, who would destroy our form of Government, in aid of Russia, or its communism, is the fifth amendment, which provides that "no person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

All the spies who have been apprehended, as agents of Russia, all the Hollywood fellow travelers and the Hisses, and the Pressmans, the Abts, the Witts, and all their ilk, have enshrouded themselves within the protecting folds of that shield, designed by our forefathers as a guard against oppression, such as the colonists suffered under King George the Third, rather as an aid to subvert the very purposes of our fundamental law. Red herrings. The descriptive color is, at least, correct.

Likewise with certain committees and groups, labeled civil rights this and civil rights that. The good old fifth amendment is seized up, by them, as a protection to those charged with being enemies of our country.

They all leer at the oath all our public officials and our military must take "to defend the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic."

It is the latter, today, the domestic enemies among us, who constitute our greatest danger. That fifth column has been among us, building since 1933, under Government auspices, political patronage, and blessings from high places.

The pattern is similar to happenings in other countries, many now apparently irretrievably behind Russia's iron curtain. Those countries did not just bust through that curtain, when it was lifted. They were invited, coaxed or cajoled in, and they offered little resistance.

Some observing folks wonder, if Stalin and his Russia, and its communism, did succeed in planting a firm foothold on the soil of New York City, for instance, whether there would be resistance enough to prevent the surrender of this greatest metropolis of all the world, to the atheistic, Mongol hordes. Keep asking yourselves that question, and ask it of your neighbors. At the moment I cannot give you an encouraging answer. I can only hope that our people, themselves, will see to it that the officials whom they place in authority, will rigidly enforce all available laws, to save us from any such appeasement and surrender.

That would be the end of what has distinguished our country from the rest of the world—yes, from all of it—freedom.

Repeat that word, freedom, often, so it "echoes in the hilltops and recoils upon the dell." Let it "roll from soul to soul."

Not one freedom do we have—but many.

Read them, again, in the very first amendment to our Constitution, article I of our Bill of Rights:

Freedom of religion.
Freedom of speech.
Freedom of the press.
Freedom of assembly.
Freedom to petition our Government for the redress of every grievance.

Does any such freedom—any single one of them—exist in Russia, or in any of her satellite countries?

Add to those freedoms, specifically listed, the many others, long established as our inalienable rights; such as—

Freedom to go, when and where we please.

Freedom to work where we please—somewhat abridged, I am compelled to admit, in recent years, due to the same anti-American and Communist influences, found in some labor unions.

Freedom to own property, and to pass it on to our children.

Freedom to think—even that freedom is not acknowledgedly granted in Russia or in those states which have copied her pattern.

All such freedoms, with which we are blessed, stem directly from our Constitution, in the same fountainhead manner the moral precepts of most religions flow from the Bible. Appropriately, has our Constitution been well called the Civil Bible of Americans. And that volume might well be found on every family table, alongside the religious Bible, for close study and frequent reference.

These United States of ours are still referred to as a young Nation, still in its immaturity. While we should not resent this compliment of eternal youth, we might well give thought to the impressive fact that, today, after only 163 years, we have the oldest Constitution and the oldest form of government in existence.

Mark you, that.

Despite the predictions of great statesmen and historians, a hundred years ago and since, that our experiment, or our form of "democracy," or "republic," could not long endure, we now, happily find at this good hour, that the form of every government on earth has changed, at least once, since that September 17, 1787—except ours.

It is an unparalleled tribute to our founding fathers that each one of them "builded better than he knew" and certainly better than he ever dreamed would be accomplished, when he left Constitution Hall, on that fateful September afternoon.

So fundamentally sound and appealing to peoples seeking freedom, has our great document been, that it has served as a pattern and many countries have copied it, in whole, or in substantial part, as the expression of their aspirations and the form of government they desired.

Witness some such followers of ours: Canada, Mexico, the five Republics of Central America, nine South American republics, Australia, South Africa, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Ireland, Israel—yes, and even Germany, after World War I—and undoubtedly again, soon, after its World War II.

All those complimentary reproductions constitute a thrilling answer to the prayer of George Washington, uttered when he was chosen to preside over the Constitutional Convention. In that hour, filled with doubts and misgivings, as to what the future might hold, our country's leading citizen implored the delegates, "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God."

The countries just mentioned, which have used our Constitution as a pattern, have indeed repaired to this standard, our great Constitution. Many more will undoubtedly resort to it, as the keystone of their hoped-for freedoms—if we can but continue to preserve it, substantially intact, from the assaults of the subversives among us, both "foreign and domestic." Those are the termites who are gnawing at its foundations.

To so preserve it, we should take new heed the the counsel of Abraham Lincoln, when in speaking of our Constitution, he said:

"Let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in our legislatures, and enforced in our courts of justice."

Please, God, permit us again, to stand here, 1 year from today, in the year of our Lord 1951 and still be under the protecting pages of that great document which we solemnly and proudly and publicly revere here, today, on the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of its birth.

UN Flag Program Wins Wide Support

REMARKS
OF
HON. BROOKS HAYS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to a notable activity of the National Grange.

The idea of making and flying a hand-made flag of the United Nations along with the American flag in every community on United Nations Day, October 24, has caught the imagination of America. Plans are going into action everywhere. Sponsored by the National Citizens Committee for United Nations Day, the flag-making plan is being taken up by churches, schools, farm organizations, business, labor, youth, home demonstration, and 4–H clubs as one concrete way of supporting a plan for peace and learning more about the United Nations organization. In short, it is a means of bringing the United Nations to the grassroots of America, and to make the UN flag a symbol of hope for the world.

The idea of encouraging women and girls to make United Nations flags was conceived by Albert E. Johnson, director of public relations for the National Grange. Mr. Johnson is also chairman of the agricultural advisory group of the National Citizens Committee for United Nations Day. The plan was first announced publicly on August 12 as a cooperative program of the national farm organizations and the Cooperative Extension Service of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Radio stations and the press are showing increasing interest in the idea. Excellent radio programs have already been featured in many States. A national magazine is developing a series of color photographs on the making of the flag, while other national publications will carry feature articles in their October issues. Both the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation will use the flag-making theme on the cover of their national magazines in October, together with feature articles. The story of the plan is being carried overseas through the facilities of the Voice of America and special bulletins to United Nations information centers throughout the world. It is hoped that other nations belonging to the UN will carry out similar projects to demonstrate their faith in the world organization.

I wish to include in my remarks the following report on UN flag-making activities by the Extension Service of the Department of Agriculture:

The idea of making and flying a flag of the United Nations along with the American flag in every community on United Nations Day, October 24, has caught the imagination of America. Plans are going into action everywhere. Sponsored by the National Citizens' Committee for United Nations Day, the flag-making idea is being taken up by churches, schools, farm organizations, business, labor, and youth groups, and home demonstration and 4–C clubs, as one concrete way of supporting a plan for peace and learning more about the United Nations organization.

The local home demonstration agent's office is serving as a center of information on how to make the flag. Reports from Chicago late Wednesday evening showed that more than 5,000 flag-making kits had been shipped. With all but four States represented, this indicates that very shortly patterns and directions for making the flag will be available in every county.

The State fair was timed just right to be used as a springboard for launching the idea in Massachusetts, New York, New Mexico, and Washington. Thousands of women visitors to the New York Fair took one stitch in the flag being made there and left their names on the permanent record to be hung with the flag in the building housing the home economic exhibits. Two United Nations flags are being shown at the New Mexico Fair, one on the Avenue of Flags at the entrance of the fairgrounds and the other in the auditorium of the youth building. In addition a training school for agents and volunteer leaders on the making of the flag is being held on the fairgrounds. The flags of each of the United Nations, as well as the United Nations flag, itself, are being featured at the Washington State Fair.

After the presentation of hand-made flags to President Truman and Secretary Acheson, Indiana home demonstration clubs planned to join with the Grange in making and presenting a flag to the Governor. Virginia and New Jersey Governors will likewise receive hand-made flags made by the rural women of their States. South Carolina is laying plans for a similar presentation to the presidents of Winthrop and Clemson Colleges. Other organizations are planning to send hand-made flags to affiliated groups overseas. For example, the headquarters staff of the American Home Economics Association is making a flag for the Greek Home Economics Association. In many States, counties and communities are arranging for the making and presentation of United Nations flags to officials to be displayed with the American Flag in public places on October 24.

In Arkansas the plan was launched in time to be presented to the 560 women attending the State home demonstration council meeting last week. They endorsed it unanimously. South Carolina already has a Betsy Ross party planned for the annual conference in September. Minnesota's 4–H conservation camp this month will use the United Nations flag along with the American flag at flag-raising ceremonies.

A flag in every community was chosen as the slogan in Arkansas, Louisiana, Missouri, and Virginia. Alabama is including men and boys in its plans as well as women and girls. The fine new sewing center at Jackson's Mill, West Virginia's permanent 4–H Club camp, is planning to make samples for groups wanting to make flags. The Minnesota Farm Bureau women's short course is discussing the making of the flag and its significance. North Carolina has set a goal of 8,000 flags, of which 500 are to go overseas.

Radio stations and the press are showing increasing interest in the idea as it gathers momentum. Excellent radio programs have already been featured in many States. A magazine is developing a series of color pictures on the making of the flag. Nation's Agriculture, organ of the American Farm Bureau Federation, features the United Nations on the October cover. The story goes overseas through the Voice of America and special reports on what Americans are doing to UN information centers. Plans are afoot to provide each of these information offices with a flag made by American women. Local papers are looking for good stories just as soon as they begin to materialize. The problem here in Washington is to keep up with events in order to meet the demand for more information.

Many national organizations serving rural people are taking up UN flag-making activities. The American Home Economics Association through its student clubs and homemakers' groups expects to get many flags made. The headquarters staff is starting the ball rolling by making two flags—one for the new president, Mrs. Florence Follgetter, to be saved for the new headquarters building. The American Library Association is thinking in terms of a flag for every local library. The Citizens' Committee for United Nations Day procured 5,000 copies of the fact sheet for the United Council of Church Women. The junior chamber of commerce has asked for enough copies of the fact sheet to send one to each of the member organizations. The Grange is sponsoring Betsy Ross projects to be carried on through the home-economics chairmen of subordinate granges. In addition, Grange lecturers have been asked to arrange a program on the United Nations.

The idea has been launched and the possibilities are just beginning to be sensed by many groups of people. The results can be far reaching if, in the making of the flags, many people get a better understanding of the United Nations plans for preserving the peace.

My Friend Al Vreeland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the following is a copy of a letter to a New Jersey friend in reply to an inquiry:

I was very pleased to learn my friend, former Congressman Albert L. Vreeland, of the Eleventh Congressional District of New Jersey, has been nominated by the people of that district as the Republican candidate for Congress.

Al's record in the Seventy-sixth and Seventy-seventh Congresses was outstanding and he distinguished himself in many ways, besides making a host of friends among his colleagues, in those times of stress, prewar. He was conscientious, hard-working, and a real patriotic American. His first committee assignment, after being sworn in in 1939, was on the Civil Service Committee and the District of Columbia Committee. In the former committee he was a stalwart supporter of legislation for the benefit of and the betterment of civil-service employees and voted for many pieces of legislation furthering the interests of the Government employee. In the District of Columbia Committee, he championed a bill to raise the pay of the police and firemen of the District and for the two-platoon system in the Fire Department. As a member of the Subcommittee on Public Health and Institutions, after a visit to the Gallinger Hospital and noting the deplorable conditions existing in the psychopathic wards, he realized the necessity of changing the lunacy laws of the District to prevent the many injustices and deplorable conditions existing, relating to these unfortunate mental cases. He thereupon prepared and introduced in the Congress of the United States a complete revision of the laws governing insane persons. After many conferences with the local bar association, medical staffs of the hospitals, and civic organizations, with a few amendments his bill was voted out of the District Committee to the floor of the House and was passed. It is still the present existing law of the District and it was one of the few bills at that time passed by the House and Senate of a major nature carrying the name of a Republican, the then minority party. He received wide commendation from the residents, the bar association, and civic groups in the District of Columbia.

In 1940, because of the outstanding work Al Vreeland had done, not only in the House but in the two committees, he was appointed to the Judiciary Committee, one of the major committees of the House. On this committee he again exhibited his ability and his tireless efforts in studying legislation before that committee and actively supporting it in debate. He was particularly active in the revision of the espionage laws. In 1941, Judge Hatton Sumners, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, appointed him on a special subcommittee to investigate the alleged irregularities existing in the Federal district court in Delaware. As a result of this committee's work, the irregularities were cleared up and those responsible were properly penalized.

During the year 1941, with the war clouds gathering, he made many speeches on the floor of the House, urging a stronger national defense and pointing out the many phases of unpreparedness and lack of equipment existing in our Armed Forces. As late as August of 1941, after a 3 weeks' tour of duty with the Fourth Armored Division, he made a stirring appeal to the House for arms and equipment for our then small Army, pointing out, from his experience, the lack of equipment with which not only to train the Army but to arm it should a war occur. He also made several speeches in Congress on behalf of veterans of World War I, and also for the improvement of the new Army, which was fast being built up to meet the strained conditions of the world. He constantly urged we be adequately prepared should we become involved. He also introduced several bills for the betterment of conditions in the Army and particularly for the Reserve and National Guard being inducted into the Federal service. Among those was a bill to allow promotions based on merit rather than time in grade, to allow credit for longevity for service in the Reserve and National Guard, and to allow credit for service to enlisted men for their enlisted time after being commissioned as an officer.

Al was one of the most ardent, patriotic Members of the House and I remember well, after the House voted a declaration of war on December 8, 1941, on December 9 Al requested a leave of absence, without pay, from the House of Representatives and entered the United States Army in his Reserve rank of captain and remained in the Army until President Roosevelt in July of 1942 ordered him back to the House of Representatives to finish his term. During the period in the Army he attended the Infantry School at Fort Benning and when ordered back was serving with the Seventy-sixth Infantry Division. Upon his return to Congress he addressed the House of Representatives and advised them, in accordance with the orders of the Commander in Chief, he would finish out his term in Congress but would refuse to seek reelection and enter the Army for the duration of the war. Accordingly, Al did refuse to seek reelection and on January 3, 1943, he bade his many friends in the House of Representatives farewell and entered the United States Army, where he served with distinction in the southwest Pacific theater of war.

His many friends were sorry to see Al Vreeland leave us and leave the Congress for what Al considered to be a greater duty, that of fighting the war which he voted to declare. We, his many friends in the House of Representatives, will be happy to have Al back among us to carry on the job he left. Like so many veterans in other walks of life, who left their jobs to enter the service and were returned to their jobs after the war, he is seeking to return to his. I am sure the people of the Eleventh Congressional District, recognizing Al Vreeland's sincerity, patriotism, and ability, will elect him with an overwhelming majority in November and we, his colleagues, will welcome him back among us in January 1951.

Address by Dore Schary at B'nai B'rith Convention, August 9, 1950, San Diego, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I would like to include an address delivered by Mr. Dore Schary at a recent B'nai B'rith convention held in San Diego on the occasion of his receiving the humanities award of that organization.

Mr. Schary is known and respected throughout the country for his liberal views and his outstanding abilities as a film producer. It is my pleasure therefore to include Mr. Schary's remarks in the RECORD:

I am very grateful for the Humanities Award at B'nai B'rith District No. 4, which has been given to me tonight. I am grateful for the spirit behind it. For the good will, and for the seal of approval that you have given my work. For those sentiments that you have included in the award. I can assure you that, while I have won this plaque in 1950, I will try and earn this honor by my work and by my intent in years to come.

I feel perhaps that it would be more fitting and more proper that any humanities award should go, however, to those men who today are fighting for world-wide humanities in Korea under the flag of the United States, the flag of the United Nations, and, very soon, the flags of many other countries.

All of us who back in 1945 had a feeling that we were entering some era of peace, some era of agreement between world powers, can only view this situation in Korea with regret and with apprehension. The same old confusions come back into our minds, into our consciousness, into our very souls. Nobody likes to see other men die to keep alive simple words like "freedom," "liberty," "truth," and "morality." I am quite certain that very few, if any, soldiers die with those words on their lips. I am sure most men fighting for those words die regretfully, die angrily, or perhaps suddenly, and unaware of what has come to them. And yet these men are there, and they fight with tanks, and with guns, and grenades, and with flames for these words that sometimes we take too loosely, words that become sounds and lose their meaning. And yet the meanings are there. And they must be reaffirmed, and we must examine them to clear our minds.

In the casualty lists that are coming back from Korea is again the age-old American example of democracy, of many kinds of people, fighting for one kind of a principle. Those lists include these wonderful, odd American names: names like Klisusky, and Ginsberg; Hopper and Spinelli; Brown and O'Reardon; Jones and McPherson; Olson and Rodrigues. All American names. Now, because of these lists, it occurs to me that this might be a good time to examine our own position in this world crisis because again we are besieged by many varying points of view.

Only a few weeks ago, when we moved into Korea, there was a wild acclamation, a loud cheer of approval, for the prompt action. Then we had to face the realities. The realities of a small group of men; of sparse equipment; of a well-organized attack that could not be averted by what little we had to offer in this new fight for freedom. And then the doubts began. And then, the fears began. Along with these doubts and fears we had to face, once more, the confusion of the party line, and I'm talking about the Communist Party line. Once again as in late 1939 and 1940, we had to face the strange situation of the far left wing being allied in thought and action with the far right, reactionary wing. Once again this strange coalition took place. Damning what we were doing, screaming madly for peace, and not knowing what kind of a peace they were talking about. Certainly no one in this room tonight, and certainly very few people in the Nation, want war. We've been there—we know what it is. Hardly a family is left unscarred from World War II. None of us looks forward to what has to be looked forward to, and yet what are the alternatives? What kind of a peace do we want?

There is the peace of the regimented mind and the regimented soul. There is the peace of the slave camp. There is the peace that includes those things that you must read and those things that you must say; and those things that you must not read and you must not say. There is the peace of science that is dictated by politics; of art that is dictated by politics; of family life, religious life, of all that we hold important—dictated. Sworn to and subscribed. I don't think that this is the peace we Americans want. It is not the peace we dream of. We do not want a peace surrounded by an iron curtain of ignorance. We want a peace where the sun shines and the stars light up. Where hope is in our hearts, where faith is in our souls, and we want to live in an atmosphere where we can raise our children, dreaming always of the best for them, and not in a miserable regimented life that brings ultimately despair, defeat, and death.

We have to look back quite far to develop and perceive the pattern that is being cut for us today by the Communists. All Americans must see this pattern clearly, and we here tonight in this room, as Americans Jews with a heritage from our Nation and from our religion, must examine this pattern, identify it, and never become confused by it. The word "liberal" today, in some places—in most places, is a rather dirty word. It is a word that is interchangeable in some places with "fellow traveler," "parlor pink," "red," and all the rest of the opprobrious words. But let us not be afraid of the word ourselves, let us be sure of our definitions. I identify myself as a liberal, and I'm not confused, nor as I frightened, because I know what I stand for. The word "liberal" means precisely "those political forces that tend to the direction of democracy." Mark that well. "Tend to the direction of democracy." No totalitarian government, whether it is communistic or fascistic, tends to the direction of democracy. Therefore, a liberal cannot ever be attracted by the thought behind totalitarian government. There is this one distinction that you must always keep in mind. Liberalism criticizes democracy in an effort to improve it. The Communist criticizes democracy in an effort to destroy it.

Now let's examine the liberal line. Let's examine the stand that the liberals have made from 1939 to the present day, and I'm talking about Liberals, Republicans, Democrats, and Independents. In 1939, the liberal was for the support of England and the Allies. The liberal knew that this was a war that had to be fought. The liberal knew that fascism must be destroyed. He had seen the evidence of this years before. He knew that in 1931, when Japan invaded Manchuria, we should have moved to destroy aggression, and if we had moved then, we might never have faced as strong a Japan as we had to ultimately. The liberal knew that we should have moved again in 1933 when Hitler moved into the Ruhr. History tells us now that if we had moved at that time, we never would have had to fight a Nazi army as powerful, as effective, or as strong as the one we eventually met and defeated. The liberal knew that we should have moved against Italy when she invaded Ethiopia because the principle, the same principle, was at stake. The principle that stands opposed to aggression.

But the Communists in 1940 shifted from the strong anti-Fascist position. The Communists after the Russian-German pact was created, began to make apologies. Began to tell us that the war in Europe was an "imperialistic war"; that it was a "phony war"; a "cold war"; that there was a "deal" on. All sorts of explanations—all sorts of apologies. The Communist was part of a big peace mobilization at the time. He also was opposed to our defense program. All these things are on the record, and all this maintained up until the time that Germany attacked Russia. Then it was a people's war, suddenly. Then it was a war that had to be fought. And we were all together, fighting the battle. But not the way the Communist wanted it fought. We began to hear from the American Communist Party that Eisenhower didn't know what he was doing; that there was sabotage going on; that the second front should be launched immediately. There were more "generals" cropping up at political meetings than there were in the Army. The liberal tolerated this point of view because a war was being fought. Fascism was being destroyed, and finally and ultimately came that great day when nazism crumbled and fell in flames. The liberal again declared his consistent anti-Fascist, antitotalitarian point of view. He never deviated from it. But the Communist began his political hedge-hopping immediately after the peace. Then came the attacks on the United Nations.

When Russia walked out from the Security Council, where were the screams of outrage from the American Communists, as they screamed when Italy walked out of the League of Nations? And then, the attack on Korea. The rationalization began. The liberal wasn't confused though certainly he wasn't happy about the circumstances; but the liberal knew that the United Nations charge against northern Korea was based on fundamental morality, and the United States accepted this responsibility and went into action. But the Communist rationalization begins now: "Well, after all, the Koreans in South Korea really want the North Koreans to impose their government on them." This is like the argument Hitler gave us about the Sudetenland. Then they say, "Well, after all, the people in South Korea don't know what's good for them." This is the argument Mussolini gave about Ethiopia. "Well, after all, there have been skirmishes on the border, and the South Koreans have really done some of the shooting." This is the argument Japan gave when they attacked China. "Well, after all, South Korea really belongs to the Koreans." This is the argument Hitler gave when he moved into the Ruhr. Those arguments made no sense at that time, and they make absolutely no sense in the Korean question at all.

The facts are crystal clear and they're simple. And they have nothing to do with whether it's right or wrong, to admit Red China into the United Nations, or whether or not Russia participated in the elections in Korea. One set of facts has nothing to do with the basic morality of these facts; a parallel had been agreed upon—the thirty-eighth parallel—by the United Nations. The North Koreans attacked and crossed that parallel. The United Nations met, and agreed on military sanctions. They presented a cease firing order—a cease firing order that had been obeyed 6 times previously; it had been presented in Indonesia, Palestine, in Greece, and in other places, and it has always been obeyed; but this time it was not obeyed, and the United Nations had to stand or fall by the only principle with which it could possibly exist. The principle that was opposed to aggression.

Russia is part of the United Nations. And she must learn to live by the law of the member nations that comprise this great organization. And if she does not choose to live with law and order, then we can see clearly the direction that she has taken and the direction that we must take.

So let's not become confused by loose interchangeable words. Let's not become confused by illogical arguments that are presented emotionally and are designed to cover up the basic issue. Let us only be concerned with the one alterable fact—there is a world organization dedicated to peace—dedicated to law and order—that Organization has been challenged: that Organization has begun now to function. Those nations that support the United Nations are for it. Those nations that do not support the United Nations are against it. I believe that there is no hope in this world, there is no future in this world, if the United Nations crumbles. And as a liberal I argue that we must maintain, we must make, the United Nations live.

We face, all of us in the country face, hard, critical times that will do much to dampen our spirits and lessen our vitality. But there is justice on our side; and with justice must come firmness; and with firmness, determination; and with determination will come victory. And with that victory will come all those things that we dream about.

Perhaps some people will say that the idea of world peace and eventual world law and order is a dream. Well, what's wrong with dreaming? Our early American patriots were dreamers. They dreamed of independence. They were sentimental men who fell in love with words like "liberty" and "freedom"; but they made their dreams come true. There have been other dreamers—like Jefferson, Lincoln, Wilson, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt. And dreamers outside of our Nation; dreamers like Gandhi, Simon Bolivar, Weizmann, and Masaryk. In every nation, in every age, there have been these sentimental dreamers; but they have used action to make their dreams come true. They have used their arms, their hearts, and their souls to build these dreams when other men were cynical and scornful.

In the show South Pacific today, there is a song called Happy Talk, and in this song are the beautiful words "You got to have a dream, if you don't have a dream, how you gonna have a dream come true?"

Well, I say that we Americans, all of us, Jews, Catholics, Protestants, white, brown, black—whatever we are; we've got to have a dream, and if we've got that dream, perhaps we can make that dream come true.

Thank you very much.

1950 Amendments to Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

WISCONSIN

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, one of the outstanding achievements of this Eighty-first Congress is the enactment of a law expanding and bringing up to date our social-security system. This law extends security in their old age to 10,000,000 additional Americans as a matter of their earned right, not as a matter of charity or a public dole. It raises social-security benefits to conform with higher costs of living.

I believe that our social-security system should be extended even further, so as to cover all working men and women, and I will support legislation to accomplish this. But the new law passed by the Eighty-first Congress is a great step forward, and I was proud to cast my vote for it.

In view of the widespread interest in this law I think it will be helpful to set forth the changes in our social-security system which it brings about.

MAJOR CHANGES SUMMARIZED

Summarized in a few sentences, the major changes are:

First. Larger benefits: The nearly 63,612 Wisconsinites now receiving social-security payments will find that in the checks to be mailed out October 3 their benefits will be, on the average, roughly 75 percent greater than they have been. For those who will retire after June 1952, benefits will be twice what they are now, on the average.

Second. Broader coverage: On January 1, 1951, over 200,500 people in the State of Wisconsin, who up to now have not been covered by social security, will come under the system. For the first time the nonfarm self-employed—persons in business for themselves, such as grocery store, retail store, or gas-station owners—will have the opportunity to earn security in their later life under the social-security system.

Third. Easier eligibility: In general, it will take less years of social-security coverage before you are eligible to draw benefits. Specifically, persons who are now 65 or over, and who have had six quarter-years—a year and a half—of social-security coverage can and should apply immediately for benefits. Any retired worker as well as survivors and dependents will be able to earn $50 a month—as against the present limit of $15—without losing their benefit payments.

Here, in more detail, are the answers to questions I think will be of most general interest:

HOW MUCH LARGER BENEFITS?

First. How much larger will benefits be under the new law? Benefit increases will go to two main groups of people: (a) Those who are currently receiving benefits, or who will begin receiving them before 1952; and (b) those who will reach retirement age after June 1952; these are called new starts. Let me explain more fully how the new bill affects each of these groups.

IMMEDIATE INCREASES AVERAGE 77½ PERCENT

There are nearly 68,612 people in the State of Wisconsin who are now receiving social-security benefits. In the checks which they will receive early in October, their September payments, they will find that their payments will be, on the average, 77½ percent greater than they have been up to now.

The table below shows what the increases will be for an insured wage earner without any dependents, and for a married couple.

Retired wage earner without dependents		Retired wage earner and wife
Now	New law	Now	New law
$10	$20.00	$15.00	$30.00
$11	22.00	$16.50	33.00

$45	68.50	$67.50	102.75
$46	68.50	$69.00	102.75

These same increases apply to anyone who retires before June 1952.

The following table shows the benefits that will appear in the September checks of a widow with two children who is currently receiving benefits:

WIDOW WITH TWO CHILDREN

Present benefit: $20; new benefit: $40.
Present benefit: $25; new benefit: $46.
Present benefit: $30; new benefit: $53.
Present benefit: $35; new benefit: $59.
Present benefit: $40; new benefit: $67.
Present benefit: $45; new benefit: $76.
Present benefit: $50; new benefit: $92.
Present benefit: $55; new benefit: $110.
Present benefit: $60; new benefit: $117.
Present benefit: $65; new benefit: $122.
Present benefit: $70; new benefit: $128.
Present benefit: $75; new benefit: $133.

INCREASES SENT AUTOMATICALLY

You do not have to apply for the increases; they will be sent to you automatically. If, for any reason, the increase fails to show up in your October check, it will show up very soon, in full. Recipients are asked not to start writing in for information because the more letters that have to be answered, the slower the program will be in getting under way.

BENEFITS DOUBLED IN 1952

For anyone who retires after June 1952 a new formula may be used to compute benefits, which will yield, roughly, twice the benefits now being received. You can begin to use this new formula just as soon as you have worked for six quarter-years—or a full year and a half—under the social-security system after January 1, 1951.

The following table shows, roughly, how much the benefits will be according to this new formula:

Average monthly wage	Single	Married
$50	$25	$38
$100	50	75
$150	58	86
$200	65	98
$250	72	109
$300	80	120

The minimum primary benefit has been raised from $19 to $25 in most cases, and the maximum family benefit has been raised from $85 to $150. These changes are long overdue in bringing our social-security system into line with high living costs.

WHO WILL BE COVERED NOW?

Second. What new people will be covered under the new law? On January 1, 1951, over 200,500 people in the State of Wisconsin—nearly 10,000,000 in the Nation as a whole—will come under the social-security system for the first time.

THE NONFARM SELF-EMPLOYED

The largest and most important group to come under the system are the nonfarm self-employed—numbering about 113,000 in Wisconsin. For the first time the druggist, the grocer, the gas station owner, and thousands of other persons who are in business for themselves can look forward to security in their later years as an earned right, to which they have contributed during their working lifetime.

Farmers are still not included under social security; nor are many professional people, such as doctors and lawers.

ELIGIBLE FOR BENEFITS MUCH SOONER

At this point, I should emphasize, for the benefit of these businessmen, as well as all those who will come under the social-security system now, it will be much easier for you to become eligible for benefits under the new law. If you are 62 or over on January 1, 1951, and begin your social-security coverage on that date, you will need to work only a year and a half under the system in order to be fully insured and eligible for benefit payments upon retirement. That means that you will begin to draw benefits just as soon as you reach the retirement age of 65.

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Some 29,000 agricultural workers in Wisconsin will come under the social-security program on January 1. This includes not only persons who regularly work on farms, but also the so-called borderline agricultural workers—those who work, say, in raising livestock or fur animals; or in processing or delivering crops to storage or to market; or those engaged in household work on a farm. Employees of commercial handlers of fruits and vegetables are included in this borderline group, as are employees of farmer cooperatives.

Those who regularly work on farms must work for one farm operator for 3 months before their social-security coverage even begins. After that, they must work for him for 60 full days and earn $50 in cash during each 3-month period. If they change employers, they must work regularly for 3 months before their work with the new employer begins to count for social security.

DOMESTIC WORKERS

About 18,000 Wisconsin domestic workers in nonfarm homes will join the system next January, provided they work 24 days for one employer and receive cash wages of at least $50 during each quarter-year.

VOLUNTARY COVERAGE FOR STATE AND LOCAL EMPLOYEES

With regard to the inclusion of employees of the State, and of cities, towns, or counties, this is the situation: Some time after January 1, the State of Wisconsin may, if it wishes, enter into an agreement with the Federal Government. That agreement will set forth specifically which groups of employees of the State, or of cities, towns, or counties, will be covered under social security. Any State or local employee who is covered by an existing retirement system cannot be included in such an agreement. In this way, existing retirement systems will be fully protected. If any group of State or local employees is included in the agreement, then social-security coverage for all members of the group will be automatic. There are in Wisconsin about 40,500 State and local employees who are not covered by existing retirement systems who might be included in the social-security system.

Employees of the Federal Government in Wisconsin who are not presently covered by a Federal retirement system, will be included under social security.

EMPLOYEES OF NONPROFIT INSTITUTIONS

Employees of nonprofit institutions—hospitals, churches, schools, and the like—will be covered only if the employer agrees to pay his share of the tax contribution and if two-thirds or more of the employees favor social-security coverage.

Ministers and members of religious orders will continue to be excluded.

SALESMEN AND TRUCK DRIVERS INCLUDED

The new bill will also include all full-time life-insurance salesmen, certain full-time traveling salesmen—other than house-to-house—many delivery truck drivers and home industrial workers who satisfy certain conditions.

HOW LONG TO QUALIFY?

Third. How long will you have to work under social security before you can start drawing benefits?

One of the greatest advantages of the new social-security law is that although the retirement age is still 65, in the future you will not have to work under the social-security system nearly as long before you are fully insured and eligible to draw benefits upon reaching the retirement age of 65.

The following table shows how many quarter years of coverage under social security you will have to have under the new law, as compared with the present law. Simply look at the figure next to your age on January 1, 1951:

Quarter-years of coverage required to be fully insured

Age reached in first half of 1951	Present law	New law
75 or over	6	6
75	8	6
74	10	6
73	12	6
72	14	6
71	16	6
70	18	6
69	20	6
68	22	6
67	24	6
66	26	6
65	28	6
64	30	6
63	32	6
62	34	6
61	36	8
60	38	10
59	40	12
58	40	14
57	40	16
56	40	18
55	40	20
50	40	30
45 or under	40	40

All of the time you have worked under social security up to now still counts toward meeting your coverage requirement.

This change means three main things.

MANY AGED 65 CAN GET BENEFITS IMMEDIATELY

First, any insured worked who is now 65 or over, and who has had six quarter years—or a full year and a half—of social-security coverage, can draw benefits immediately. He should apply for them at the nearest Social Security Administration field office.

In Wisconsin, these offices are located in Eau Claire, Fond du Lac, Green Bay, Janesville, Kenosha, La Crosse, Madison, Milwaukee, Oshkosh, Racine, Sheboygan, Superior, and Wausau. Your local post office should be able to tell you how to address your request.

Second, any worker who is 62 or over on January 1, 1951, even if he only starts his social-security coverage next year, will be eligible to begin drawing benefits just as soon as he reaches the retirement age of 65, if he has had six quarter years—a year and a half—of coverage.

ELIGIBILITY MUCH EASIER FOR THE NEWLY COVERED

Third, and most important to the thousands who will become eligible to join the social-security system next year, it will be possible for them to begin drawing benefits upon retirement—at age 65—with much less social-security coverage than now. The table above shows the tremendous improvements brought about by this law.

BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS AND DEPENDENTS

The fourth main question of general interest is: How much will dependents and survivors receive under the new law?

The primary benefit is the basic payment made to an insured wage earner who has no dependents. Generally speaking, dependents and survivors will receive the same part of the primary as at present. This means that their benefits will also be about 75 percent higher than at present, up until 1952, and double the present levels after that.

MAJOR CHANGES LISTED

The major changes in dependents' and survivors' benefits are:

(a) A retired worker's wife who is under 65 can receive benefits if she has a child in her care.

(b) The benefit for a dependent parent has been raised to three-quarters of the primary benefit of the wage earner—it has been one-half.

(c) Lump-sum death payments, though reduced to three times the primary benefit of the wage earner, are now payable to the family of every insured worker. Formerly, these payments were made only when no other member of the family was entitled to survivor's benefits at the time of the wage earner's death.

(d) Retired workers, survivors, or dependents may now earn $50 a month—as against $14.99 under the present law—without losing their benefit privileges.

NEW LAW A LANDMARK IN SOCIAL LEGISLATION

This new social-security law is a landmark in the field of social legislation. The improvements in our social insurance system which it brings about are long overdue. In my opinion, they do not go far enough. I believe that our insurance system should include the permanently and totally disabled, who are entitled to security as a matter of right, and not a matter of charity. I believe that the system should extend to all working men and women—for old age is a problem shared by all Americans alike. I believe that the retirement age for women should be lowered from 65 to 60. I believe that all insured workers should receive a minimum benefit of $75.

We have taken a great step forward but there is still room for progress and improvement. There is still a challenge for the future.

Harper's Magazine: One Hundredth Anniversary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments at this time to bring to your attention the eminently distinguished record of one of America's great magazines.

This week there will appear on the newsstands throughout the country the October 1950 issue of Harper's. With this issue Harper's marks the beginning of its second century of continuous publication. This in itself is a record that has been attained by few publications of any kind anywhere. But the achievements of Harper's go far beyond its record of having reached its hundredth milestone, enviable and rare as that might be. Month after month, down through the years from its beginning, the pages of Harper's have been consistently alive with the great names of literature as well as those who have carried the torch of progress and enlightenment.

However, it is to the October 1950 issue of Harper's that I particularly want to pay tribute. This centennial issue is far more than just another anniversary number. Its pages are a historical record of the achievements and progress, as well as a tribute, not only to Harper's, but to America, her people, her customs, her culture, her industries, and her times during the past century.

I commend it to the attention of our Congress and to our people.

American Shame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, one of the easiest ways for us to lose our form of government is to lose it by default. I have confidence that if every citizen would utilize the sacred right to vote which is his, we would have no fear of becoming a totalitarian state. The responsibility today of maintaining our American form of government rests on the shoulders of every citizen who is eligible to vote. It is his Government. He pays for it. Let us vote to insure that the men who represent us in our Government are men who can be trusted.

I wish to include as part of my remarks an editorial which appeared in the September 20, 1950, issue of the Alpena News, one of northern Michigan's leading dailies. I commend this editorial to all citizens.

AMERICAN SHAME

We Americans don't like to be preached to about our shortcomings. But sometimes there's no other way to stir us up. Take, for instance, this matter of voting. Apparently it doesn't do any good to talk in general terms about voting as a solemn duty or a rare privilege. Lectures along that line have been delivered for years. But in 1948, as a Presidential election year, only about half of all eligible voters actually went to the polls. If blunt language is needed to make Americans understand the shamefulness of this performance, then it ought to be used.

We think we have the greatest democracy in the world. Yet in free elections in the past few years, Britain, Australia, Italy, and even west Germany have vastly outstripped us in the basic democratic job of voting. Note that two of these countries had had long experience under dictators. Yet each found that more than 80 percent of the people voting when their first real elections were held.

We sneer at Russia and her satellites because they are limited to a single slate of candidates when they vote, and can merely record "yes" or "no." But 50 percent of our own prospective voters didn't even exercise that much choice in 1948.

Constantly we have it dinned into our ears nowadays that if we're to lick world communism we must sell democracy abroad. The uncomfortable fact is we haven't been practicing it as well as some of the people we're supposed to be selling it to; the west Germans, for example.

None of this means, of course, that we don't care about freedom and its rights and duties. It just means that we've allowed the complexity and fascination of our big-city industrial life to distract us from our responsibilities.

By now, though, we ought to have seen enough of the world's present perils to realize that our beautiful, gadget-filled existence might be wiped right off the face of the globe if we don't make the right decisions. Those decisions are fundamentally the people's job. And they can only make them at the polls.

November 7 is another voting day, the first general election since 1948. The world will be watching to see whether Americans have learned to prize their voting rights more than another rubber of bridge, or a day at the ball game, or a regular place on the washing-machine schedule.

Civil Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, the civil defense proposals of Chairman W. Stuart Symington of the National Security Resources Board, received by the House last week, make it even more urgent that this Congress do everything in its power to strengthen the Nation's medical resources. The lives of millions of Americans may be lost if we fail to face the issue: Will we have enough adequately trained medical personnel to protect men, women, and children on our home front in case of the kinds of radiological, bacteriological, or chemical attack envisioned in the civil defense proposals?

Here is the blunt warning from Mr. Symington:

> The civil defense program for this country must be in constant readiness because for the first time in 136 years an enemy has the power to attack our cities in strong forces, and for the first time in our history that attack may come suddenly, with little or no warning.

I was especially struck by this statement in the report:

> Granted a few minutes' warning, casualties could be reduced by over 50 percent through proper organization and training in civil defense.

What progress can we report? Are we heeding this warning? Are we strengthening with all possible speed our first line of security—the health of our civilian population—against enemy attack?

The bitter truth is that we are not training more doctors or moving rapidly to cope with the possible dangers our civilian population faces, although there was legislation before the House to help accomplish this end.

The bitter truth is that we cannot report our medical schools are being rescued from their grave financial crisis or enabled to extend high quality training to more qualified students. Four times in the last few months legislation to accomplish these vital goals was blocked—blocked solely at the insistence of one group—the medical lobby.

I charge that if these American Medical Association lobbyists continue their policy of obstruction, this Nation can be led into the catastrophe of a medical Pearl Harbor. God grant the day may never come that atomic bombs or radiological warfare shall be turned against our cities. But if that terrible day should come, will our people call desperately for doctors and nurses, but not find enough to care for them?

Since the AMA lobbyists seem too blind to read the handwriting on the wall, let me at least read to them this trenchant warning from the civil defense report:

> An enemy attack on American cities using new technological weapons might introduce some new medical and health problems from such effects as radiation and chemical and bacteriological contamination.

And the report continues:

> Training for professional, technical, and auxiliary lay personnel will be necessary to prepare for the new problems. Thorough organization will be necessary to provide adequate professional and technical personnel; and also the supplies, hospitals, and related facilities for the care of the many thousands of casualties which could occur among the civilian inhabitants of a large city.

The National Security Resources Board declares that, even under the best circumstances:

> This increase in casualties will require many auxiliary volunteer workers to be recruited and trained, in order to supplement the services of available professional and technical personnel.

Every word of the civil defense report that deals with health and medical services underscores the number-one requirement to meet an attack on any important city or target area—more trained personnel.

Yet, it is a fact, according to a recent study of the United States Assistant Surgeon General, that this country today has fewer physicians per 100,000 persons than 4 decades ago. And the report estimates that the shortage is growing all the time and just a few years hence this Nation will be at least 17,400 doctors below minimum level.

Increased strain on our limited medical resources is certain as this Nation stands resolved to oppose Communist aggression everywhere in the world. Yet, in the face of this clearly demonstrable need, why has Federal aid to medical education—so obviously in the national interest—been killed?

It was not killed because of lack of bipartisan approval. Aid to medical education was sponsored in the Senate by Democrats and Republicans ranging from Senator PEPPER to Senator TAFT. And it was passed unanimously. Professional organizations, including the American Dental Association and the American Hospital Association, expressed their concern and the need for action. Vigorous support came from the country's medical-school deans, individually and through their professional associations. Support came from many lay organizations, including the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

This measure was killed solely through the efforts of the AMA's multimillion-dollar lobby. Now, as it has so many times in past years, organized medicine is pursuing a course of political obstruction that may well be without parallel among the members of any fiduciary profession.

It seems to me that the AMA, which is spending $1,110,000 during October and lining up $19,000,000 in tie-in advertising to fight the bogeyman of creeping socialism, is playing right into the hands of America's enemies. While the AMA spends millions to talk anticommunism, its policies are weakening our defenses against the military forces of communism. The AMA is blocking measures which would protect the families of our fighting men from Communist military aggression.

The warning of Mr. Symington has been sounded with equal bluntness by one of America's greatest medical authorities—Brig. Gen. James S. Simmons, retired, dean of the Harvard School of Public Health. General Simmons, an authority on preventive medicine, bluntly called the action of the AMA in blocking House committee passage of Federal aid to medical education "a tragic mistake and a crippling blow to the Nation's military and civil preparedness program."

I repeat that the AMA lobbyists are leading us into a medical Pearl Harbor. Every day that we delay the work of training a larger corps of doctors and other medical personnel also delays the day when the boys on the fighting front can feel that their loved ones are being protected just as adequately and competently as this Nation's great resources can protect them. Every day that the American Medical Association blocks Federal aid to medical education makes it surer that, if we are again forced into a total war, there will not be enough doctors to go around. Only this week, the Journal of the American Medical Association reminded doctors that, during World War II, 40 percent of the medical men of the Nation were called into active military service. Next time, if there is another world war, can we successfully protect our civilian population from effects of direct attack, when 4 out of every 10 doctors are far away from home?

The American Medical Association is the only road block. If we are called back in November, I again intend to press for action on this vital piece of legislation. Perhaps, by then, the people of the country will have had a chance to study the import of the civil defense report and will insist that we act.

Democracy's New Symbol—Ball Bat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL C. MICHENER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, political campaigns preceding general elections in Michigan are always fraught with much interest. The usual pattern is amplified in the present campaign. At the moment, intraparty disagreements, controveries, and rivalries are more in evidence than interparty contests. This condition is spectacularized in an editorial in the Detroit Free Press of September 23, to which my attention has been called. If this editorial is indicative of what is to happen between now and November 7, certainly lively days are here again.

Pursuant to the permission granted by the House, I am including that editorial which reads as follows:

DEMOCRACY'S NEW SYMBOL—BALL BAT

Governor Williams, Democratic nominee for reelection, was said to have won a resounding victory in Wayne County when his cohorts, the left wingers of the Americans for Democratic Action and the CIO-PAC, captured control of the Democratic Party machinery in Wayne County congressional district conventions.

But whatever it means to the political fortunes of Governor Williams, it was no victory for democratic processes of orderly government.

In all but one district, the caucuses were marked by sluggings and the Communist techniques of beating down opposition by violence.

The ADA-PAC combination brought back to Michigan the sitdown-strike methods which have been disavowed in labor disputes, and applied them to government.

The goon squads took over, and the gavel, that traditional symbol of orderly parliamentary procedure, was discarded for the sawed-off baseball bat.

In all but one district—the sixteenth—there was near rioting as the strong-arm squads took over.

Delegates representing the old-line Democratic elements were beaten and thrown bodily out of the halls by the shock-troop goon squads.

In the fourteenth district, the ADA-PAC chairman, Nicholas Rothe, presided with a baseball bat instead of a gavel.

His tactics of intimidation caused Democratic National Committeeman George Fitzgerald and his following to walk out.

"After this," Fitzgerald declared, "the theme song of the Nation should be God Save America instead of God Bless America.

"I have just watched socialism take over the Democratic Party by communistic processes," he added.

And another Democratic leader, high in CIO circles, echoed Fitzgerald's sentiments.

"You can see," he said, "what happens to democratic government when the Socialists move in."

So outraged were many of the delegates, it was reported, that they tore off their polka-dotted bow-tie pins, the campaign emblems of Governor Williams. This was the insult direct to "Soapy."

It was 15 years ago that Michigan was stricken by the wave of sitdown strikes—an imported device of the Communists to create violence and disruption.

The power behind the sitdown strikes was the gangs of goon squads, the professional thugs, armed with their clubs and ball bats.

It was the goon squads which, in utter defiance of law and public safety, closed streets in Detroit and forbade their use by citizens while the police stood by helplessly and watched.

It was the goon squads which invaded the capitol in Lansing and took over the government of that city, closing up business, and terrorizing the people.

Only when the goon storm troopers moved into East Lansing and tried to take over Michigan State College were their ranks broken. They came up against brawny American college kids who would not be intimidated like the politicians were. These youngsters threw the hoodlums into the river. That act so stiffened the backbone of the American people all over the country that the sitdown strike no longer could effectively be used.

But if the great mass of organized labor discarded this Communist technique, the left-wing political aspirants, the fellow travelers, the bleeding hearts, and the ADA-ers did not.

For them the goon squad was a useful device, to be used any time or any place it would further their interests.

No means is unlawful to their ends, and they do not hesitate to use it, always bleating, meanwhile, about their constitutional privileges and the Bill of Rights.

Governor Williams and his ADA backers may have won a big victory by using strong-arm methods to take over control of the Democratic Party in Wayne County.

But they may find it difficult to convince the public which is not prepared to surrender its right to ball-bat-wielding goon squads who would fit better into a picture of the Kremlin than of America.

All-American Conference To Combat Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include volume I, No. 1, and volume I, No. 2, of the Analysis and Information Service of the All-American Conference To Combat Communism.

The All-American Conference To Combat Communism has established temporary headquarters in Washington, D. C., at 3147 Sixteenth Street NW. The mail address for the All-American Conference is post-office box 921, Benjamin Franklin Station, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Experts on communism are warning us that a new peace offensive can be expected from the Soviet Union. Every effort will be made by the U. S. S. R., short of getting entangled immediately itself, to drag on the Korean affair and to pin down as many American troops and as much American matériel as possible. But when the tide of battle turns and the United States-United Nations forces go on the offensive, that will be the likely signal for the Kremlin to begin its next peace offensive. It will be directed primarily at the United States.

Naturally, the purpose of that offensive will be to slow up the processes of mobilization and preparedness in this country. Stalin has a sincere respect for the United States productive capacity. He knows, once we are geared up for war, he cannot start anything without risking defeat. He doesn't want us to get geared up. He would prefer to sacrifice Red Korea if it will send us back into a stage of somnolence, or at least to cut down on the date of rearmament.

Stalin, say the experts, was surprised at the American reaction to Korea. He had thought it would be a quick trick. He thought it would not arouse this country as it did. The tactic, since the Soviet Union needs more time for its own preparations and to digest its own great gains in China and elsewhere, is to allay American alarm. Permitting us to win the war in Korea without throwing in the Chinese Communist armies by way of reinforcement, plus an all-out peace offensive, is counted on to do the trick—shift the American war machine back into low gear.

The point is: Don't get caught napping by this sudden shift in tactics. Because they are simply tactics. Stalin, himself, once declared: "It is not for nothing that the proverb says, 'An obliging bear is more dangerous than an enemy.'"

Beware the obliging bear that not only walks like a man but talks like a man of peace.

Remember that the Stockholm peace petition was being circulated by Stalin's minions even while his satellite troops invaded South Korea. It was a case of talking peace and acting war. Under the cover of the peace talk and the attempt to lull us into a sense of false security, the Soviet Union could continue to get ready for war, behind the iron curtain, without any letdown of its own. In the months ahead it could effectively reduce the disparity in atomic weapons. It could bring its stockpile of bombs nearer to the critical point. That critical point is reached when the Soviet leaders figure they could do as much damage to us with their fewer bombs as we could do to them with our larger number. The point is in our greater vulnerability through tighter concentration of people and industry.

The experts also warn against the propaganda line that we still do business with Uncle Joe.

If a person bought stock—took stock—in a firm which had gone bankrupt 28 times before, wouldn't he need to have his head examined? Well, the Soviet Union has bankrupted its international credit no less than 28 times between 1920 and 1940, by shattering into fragments the treaties it entered into with other countries, solemnly, freely and without duress. Is anyone so naive that he would continue to take stock in such a morally bankrupt regime? And yet, doubtless, there will be the outcry that we ought to make one more attempt to understand the Russians, clasp the proffered hand of Stalin, do business with Uncle Joe.

Anybody who is interested can get a list of all 28 treaties broken by Stalin before

1941, by looking in the appendix of William C. Bullitt's the Great Globe Itself. I cite a few examples:

1. Violation of the Covenant of the League of Nations by seizing Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania;

2. Violation of the same covenant by conspiring and acting with Germany to partition Poland;

3. Violation of the Treaty of Riga by incorporating southeastern Poland into the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic;

4. Violation of the treaty of nonaggression with Finland by attacking and invading Finland ir the winter war of 1939–40, and

5. Violation of its pledge to respect the sovereignty of Rumania by seizing and absorbing into the U. S. S. R. the Rumanian Provinces of Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina.

Many post-1945 violations of treaties are on record, so many that one wonders why it is considered useful, at all, to get the signature of the Soviet Union to any treaty. For instance, there was the pledge at Yalta to permit free and democratic elections in Poland and the Balkans. There was the pledge, also at Yalta, that the Soviet Union would give its support to the Nationalist Government in China and only to that government. Looking back on that one, from the hindsight of what has happened in China since, gives a true perspective of how treaties are regarded, if not observed, by the rulers of the Soviet Union.

It was rather significant that the experts, in Washington and in New York, took the view, on the whole, that a succession of Koreas is not to be expected in the next few months. To the contrary, they think the Soviet Union will avoid a direct clash with the United States for the next 2 years, at least.

And something of a corollary, they were not particularly alarmed lest Mao Tse-tung send in his own Chinese Red army to help the North Koreans. They pointed out, in the first place, that Mao was not too anxious to get involved with the United States at this juncture; and, in the second place, Russia would not want it because it would confront the United States with such an insuperable task of fighting in the great vastness of China, against millions of Asiatic troops, that our people and leaders would all the sooner reach the conclusion that it was preferable to strike at the pyromaniac who set all the fires instead of exhausting ourselves trying to put out every fire he set. This approaches the proposition voiced by Harold Stassen recently that we hold the Soviet Union strictly accountable for the actions of its satellites.

While the majority view was that war was not imminent with the Soviet Union, direct, nevertheless a respectable minority at both meetings, held that the third world war is imminent; that Korea is just one of many like incidents in a force-play which the Soviet Union is preparing. The plan they see is to force the United States to commit all its available manpower and equipment, as fast as they can be mobilized, to peripheral wars of subatomic character. Once we are engaged fully and without any surplus, then will be the time for the Soviet Union to make a move which will cause us either to have to fight the U. S. S. R. directly or abandon the world to communism.

The inevitability of a show-down was admitted by all. No one in either group took the attitude that there was still any hope of peaceful accommodation between the Soviet Union and the west. This quite hopeless situation stems from the belief that the Soviet Union is intent on world conquest either by force of arms or by internal subversion. If internal methods fail, then the Red army will be brought into play.

The United States has twice fought bloody wars against a country and an ideology which sought to rule the earth. We are formally pledged to come to the aid of various countries in Europe which suffer aggression. On top of this, there are various other countries, not members of the Atlantic Union, whose territorial integrity will be protected by this country, as a matter of policy—just as in the case of South Korea.

While there was no difference about the inevitability of the conflict, there was a sharp difference on when it would come and how. The majority view was that Stalin needed 2 years in which to stockpile his atom bombs, consolidate and digest his gains, regroup and generally make ready for world war III. They did not think that he would be greatly pushed by our rearmament program—which, at best, would take a full year to get going. If, by a successful peace offensive, this period could be stretched out to another year, then it would be all to the good for Stalin, permitting him that much more time for preparation and maneuver.

However, the success of this particular peace offensive depends on the Soviet Union not creating other Koreas in the meantime, to rouse us up anew.

The chief way in which we will be "bled," during this period, is by the rather ineffectual armament of Europe. Thirty-five divisions would be quite a job to equip and that is the absolute minimum for a holding operation. From the Communist standpoint, the rearmament could be made doubly ineffective if a propaganda of defeatism and of neutrality could be made to sweep those countries. You may be sure that the propaganda drumfire on this will be tripled in the next few months, in the effort to make our allies unreliable allies.

The minority view was that two great forces were rushing at each other like uncontrollable torrents and that they would clash much sooner than most people expected. They expressed the thought that the world would be very lucky if western Europe had not been invaded in the next 365 days. Yugoslavia and Germany would be the key targets.

The heightened tempo of events can be judged from the fact that two highly placed persons, one the Secretary of the Navy and the other a major general in the Air Force, had to be reprimanded recently for their own advocacy of a "preventive war" against Russia. This not only fits in neatly with the propaganda which Moscow has been putting out all over the world that the "imperialist" United States wants war, but it also could have the effect of speeding up war between the two countries. When a stage is reached in the preliminaries where responsible officials talk openly about "preventive war" then a hair-trigger condition exists. The Kremlin may actually come to feel menaced to the point that it would launch a "preventive war" of its own to forestall what it thought might be a "preventive war" by us. At any event, an excuse for aggression is given to Russia which is of invaluable moral assistance. Most important of all, the tempo toward war is noticeably quickened. The minority view was that many more such unforeseen events would occur to push the antagonists into early and open warfare.

Some of the most interesting discussion took place on the modes by which the Russian peace offensive might be furthered by our own allies. One idea expressed was that, within the next 4 or 5 months—before the United States-United Nations forces could reach the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea—the United Nations would pick an administrator or UN trustee for Korea. This would be done through either open or behind-the-scenes intervention by the British. The British are extremely concerned over the situation in Asia, hoping they can still save Hong Kong and the Malay peninsula. They are not on the same side with us about Formosa because of this concern, which led them to recognize the Chinese Reds. In the opinion of one member of the Analysis Board, the British wish to force a show-down over the recognition of Red China in the UN. They think there might be a chance of achieving a certain amount of appeasement on the part of other Council members on this recognition. The United States has already said it will go along with the majority. In that case, the Korean thing can be settled. And on Stalin's original terms, that is, by kicking the National Government off UN and putting the Red Korean puppet in.

Psychological warfare can be used to split off the Russian people from the Soviet regime.

There is good hope that techniques and means are at hand to penetrate the iron curtain.

If psychological warfare, through these techniques and means, were pushed effectively—repeat, effectively—the rewards could be staggering. Perhaps world war III could be avoided altogether.

In Washington and New York, our boards of experts on communism discussed this matter of psychological warfare at four meetings.

Some of the things which were brought out:

The iron curtain is not a caprice on the part of Stalin. It is sheer necessity. Once the iron curtain is effectively penetrated by ideas and truth from the outside world, then one-half of the Stalin system, the twin system of propaganda and terror, is rendered useless. Stalin pays the utmost tribute to the fact that he cannot afford to let truth in. He goes to any length to keep it out because he knows his system would fall, otherwise. The principal problem, then, is to penetrate the iron curtain with a sufficient freightage of truth.

Our main method of trying to penetrate, heretofore, has been by means of the Voice of America. It has not been very effective because few Russians have suitable receiving sets. Moreover, the programs which are not very hard-hitting, anyway, are jammed.

The written word is more effective than the spoken word. It is necessary that the Soviet people get pamphlets and leaflets, of a hard-hitting character, preparing them psychologically for revolt; organizing them in small groups, for security reasons; freeing them from their pathological fear of the MVD, the secret police; giving them missions which can be accomplished without too much danger; giving them the feeling that they are not alone, either in their own country, or abroad, in the high task of freeing their land of a greater tyranny than the czars'.

Our boards were told there was more than one underground operating either in Russia, the satellite states, the militarily occupied countries, or all three, which were attempting to do those very things.

NTS—AN UNDERGROUND

One of them is called NTS. Its initials form, in the Russian language, the twin slogans of "We bring death to tyrants" and "We bring freedom to the people."

A representative of NTS, Mr. Constantine Boldyreff, appeared at the last two meetings of the board in New York and Washington. He is a registered foreign agent with the Department of Justice, representing this Russian underground here. He is an instructor at the Institute of Foreign Languages and Linguistics, of Georgetown University.

Mr. Boldyreff, who gave permission to name both him and his organization, said the group had been in existence for about 20 years. He said it had managed to distribute 3,000,000 leaflets in 1949 alone. A large part of them were distributed by means of balloons, equipped with clockwork mechanisms, which explode the balloons over Soviet territory at points which are carefully calculated from wind directions and velocities.

Mr. Boldyreff said he thought the Russian people are very ripe for revolution. For one thing, nearly every family in Russia has friends or relatives in slave-labor camps. This is necessarily so with 15,000,000 victims of these camps.

Millions hate the regime but they are held down by fear of the MVD, by the constant propaganda, by the denial to them of information as to what is going on outside the Soviet Union or, for that matter, inside the Soviet Union. With the MVD breathing down their necks they cannot organize in large groups or procure arms.

RED ARMY IS REAL ACHILLES HEEL

But the NTS regards this as surmountable. It argues that the Achilles heel of the whole Soviet system is Russia itself, where the regime is more hated because better known than anywhere else. Further, the Achilles heel of Russia proper is the Red army.

A very large part of their propaganda is directed toward the Red army—and the Red army is organized and has weapons. Furthermore it is directed by human beings who may be like other human beings, high officers in the Red army, before them.

Take the Tukhachevsky conspiracy in 1937. Here was the case of a Soviet marshal accused of plotting against the life of Stalin and seizing the state apparatus. His conviction and death was accompanied by a wave of arrests which caught up 457 generals. Some were shot, others imprisoned, cashiered, or sent into exile. It all but decapitated the Red army. Such an operation, just 2 years before the Second World War broke out, certainly argues that the regime had cause to fear its generals and, through them, the loyalty of the Red army as a whole.

Then there was the business of the two million or more Russian soldiers who surrendered to the Germans, after token resistance, shortly after the Nazis crossed the line into Russia in 1941. About 800,000 Soviet Nationals joined the German Army and fought against Stalin, some of them organized into all-Russian divisions by General Vlassov.

This much to show by historical precept that it is not utterly absurd to speak of, and hope for, mass defections in the Soviet Army. The experts agreed that the best time to work for the internal dissolution of the Red army is before the atom bombs begin to fall. Then—unless the targets are picked most carefully and unless the whole Soviet system is quickly rocked to its foundations by the destruction of its military potential—the use of atomic bombs might boomerang and solidify the Russian people in support of the regime.

There are atomic bombs of the mind, too. For years the Soviet people have been intensively indoctrinated with the Leninist slogan: "Turn imperialist war into civil war." By that they mean for soldiers in the army of a capitalist state to turn their guns on their own officers and to fraternize with the enemy—especially if that enemy happens to be the Soviet Union. What if the officers and men of the Red army got the idea in reverse—that, after all, the Soviet Union is the "imperialist" state against which their guns should be turned?

One of the best stunts to the credit of NTS, Mr. Boldyreff recounted, was to give several Soviet divisions, on occupation duty, the opportunity to read some anti-Communist facts. The army newspaper, Soviet Army, came out on this occasion in two editions. One was the simon-pure Communist version. The other edition was a reproduction of the whole top of the page of the Communist version—headline for headline and word for word. But after reading a few sentences down the page, things began to go giddily anti-Communist. Soldiers began to read things they never dreamed would come out under the Soviet Army imprimatur. There was very little the Communist authorities could do about it except confiscate all papers—including the one they had just distributed themselves.

WORLD WAR III MIGHT BE AVERTED

The main purpose of propaganda such as this is to weaken the fighting morale of the Red army. It is largely directed at Red army officers who doubtless still have Vlassov potentials. If there could be enough of it to cause the MVD or the Politburo to question the reliability of the army, then world war III might never come to pass. The Red leaders would never send it rolling across international boundaries. Maybe Stalin, himself, feels that he made two mistakes in the last war—to let western Europe see the Red army and let the Red army see western Europe.

It was brought out at the meetings that, in cost, the carrying on of propaganda by balloon leaflets and other underground means, could be carried on for peanuts, compared to the VOA. A few thousand balloons a week, each carrying 1,000 or so leaflets, would mean 1,000,000 or more leaflets every 7 days.

REACTION OF GROUPS

The Washington group expressed itself uniformly as being impressed by Mr. Boldyreff and the NTS program. In New York, three members of the group expressed dissent. One raised questions as to actual accomplishments of NTS, saying its claims were exaggerated. Others disagreed with methods of organization and ideological perceptiveness.

All, however, agreed: 1. Theoretically, the work which NTS is doing, or claims to be doing, is highly necessary; and 2, it can best be done by private organizations, especially while this country is not in a state of declared war against the Soviet Union.

Some members of both panels expressed the view that a great opportunity existed in an almost totally neglected field. Support of the right sort of organization, in carrying on underground activities and psychological warfare in the heartland of communism, the Soviet Union itself, offers dazzling possibilities. Nothing less than the peace of the world could be involved.

And one of the great points to be remembered is that at the present time, at least, private organizations can operate in that field more effectively than certain agencies of the Government.

MUST GO ON PSYCHOLOGICAL OFFENSIVE

One of the most interesting things about the New York meetings was the keen insistence on adopting more aggressive methods of psychological warfare. This country should go on the psychological offensive, they say, and make it plain that we will settle for nothing less than the liberation of the Soviet and satellite people from Communist slavery. We must get out the message that we have not lost sight of nor lost interest in the people who have been submerged.

The primary consideration in psychological warfare is to drive a wedge between the people and the regime.

Perhaps the greatest master of propaganda of this century—Dr. Joseph Goebbels—bears witness to the effectiveness of such a course. He said in his diary in 1942: "A much more clever form of propaganda has been proposed in the United States. The idea is not to go against the German people but against nazism. I sense a certain danger. If I were on the enemy side I should have, from the first day, adopted the slogan of fighting against nazism and not against the German people."

The same thing now applies in fighting the Red totalitarianism as in fighting the brown.

Last week in New York this same attitude was expressed, coupled with a suggestion for action. It was adopted as the sense of the meeting that an organization be formed to be known as American Friends of the Russian People. News of the formation of a mass-supported organization of anti-Communists in this country would penetrate within the iron curtain and would perform the valuable functions of letting the people there know that they were not hated by the American people; that, in fact, the American people sympathized with them and wished to aid them. It would give them a certain release from the sense of aloneness and helplessness which it is one of the chief functions of the whole Soviet state apparatus to impress upon the Soviet citizen.

It would inevitably serve, also, the highly valuable purpose of driving a wedge between the Russian people and the masters in the Kremlin.

OPPORTUNITIES EXIST ALSO IN CHINA

Although the groups were concentrating on the Russian and nearby satellite scene, it was very cogently commented that there were opportunities for psychological warfare and underground work in China also.

Whereas there are not now any known revolts or uprisings going on in the Soviet Union (30 of them have occurred since 1921) the situation is different in China. There the Red Chinese Government is confronted with wide-scale insurrections. Mao Tse-tung, himself, has admitted that half a million guerrillas are harassing his regime. Peasant groups, as well as numerous secret societies, are revolting against the excessive Communist requisitioning of food, confiscatory taxation, and ruthless treatment, generally.

A rather small investment in trying to bind together some of these islands of resistance in China proper, would pay high dividends, it was thought.

SUMMARY

Means and techniques are either at hand or can be found for piercing the iron curtain. The regime is placed in danger if that curtain is pierced with regularity and with effective propaganda.

Already at least one Russian underground—the NTS—is using balloons and other means to get leaflets into Russia and the satellite states.

It is specializing on the Red army, with the idea that other Vlassovs, other Tukhachevskys can be found. While the people are disorganized and unarmed, the Red army is neither. It is the principal hope, from the historical standpoint, of resisting the regime.

If sufficient impress can be made on the Red army, if the Leninist slogan: "Turn the imperialist war into civil war" can be turned on the aggressors, there could be an uprising in the army.

Fear of this, or nonreliance in the army by the Kremlin, could cause the Politburo to change its mind about aggression. It might even prevent world war III.

Counterrevolutionary work, such as being done by NTS can be increased and carried on for "peanuts," yet promises to be more effective than Voice of America.

Private organizations can carry it on more effectively than governmental.

One of primary points to be remembered in all psychological warfare is that a wedge must be driven between the Russian people and the Soviet Government. We must make it plain we are not fighting the Russian people.

Sense of meeting was that "American Friends of Russian People" be organized and pushed.

China should not be forgotten as a locale for psychological warfare. Half a million people are already in revolt against Mao.

American Liberalism at the Crossroads

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Harold J. Gallagher, president of the American Bar Association, delivered at the seventy-third annual meeting, Washington, D. C., September 18, 1950:

AMERICAN LIBERALISM AT THE CROSSROADS

This is the seventy-third annual meeting of the American Bar Association. As one looks back over its record of almost three-quarters of a century, it will be recognized that the greatest opportunities of the legal profession are before us. This is because the problems which confront us are more numerous and complicated than ever before. The history of the American Bar Association is a record of substantial achievement in public service. In the discharge of its responsibilities it has measured well up to what the people have a right to expect from the legal profession.

Of the purposes of the American Bar Association stated in its constitution the most fundamental is to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States and to maintain representative government. Nothing is more important than this for the protection of our liberties, particularly at this time when our institutions are in such serious danger. We should take note that today we commemorate the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, which occurred on September 17, 1787. When the Federal Constitutional Convention began its deliberations, Benjamin Franklin said, "The institutions of this country are dependent upon the spirit of the legal profession." To uphold those institutions is one of the important tasks before the organized bar of the United States.

The past 20 years have witnessed substantial, we may even say revolutionary, changes in the powers and functions of our Federal Government. The Supreme Court has held that the Federal Government has powers which for more than a century no one supposed it had. In so holding, it was required to reverse many of its own previous decisions. The changes effected have threatened both our system of free enterprise and the form of our Government itself; the power of the States has been greatly reduced and the liberties of the people endangered by the breakdown of representative government and by the destruction of local self-government due to the shift of power from the States to the Federal Government. What was once a Federal Union of States has been largely superseded by a centralized National Government of unlimited power.

At the time that these changes are being made, we are faced with the conflict of ideologies raging between the Soviet Union and the United States and other western powers. The American Bar Association, long ago, registered its warning to our people of the grave danger of communism and of its serious and predatory threat to our way of living and our system of free government. No one here doubts that communism is a powerful and ruthless conspiracy to destroy democratic government and the liberties we cherish. Yet the Communists advocate their policies in the name of democracy and liberalism. With these dangers facing us from within and without, traditional American liberalism seems to be at the crossroads. It is well therefore to consider some fundamentals:

At the time of its adoption, our Constitution marked the high tide of the world's liberalism in government. It combined a fine expression of a true spiritual idealism regarding the rights of man, with provisions which secured an equitable division of the blessings of liberty among the people. To the founding fathers, it was clear that man is a creature of God and that his innate and essential dignity requires the recognition of his free individuality. Man is not to look for his rights or for his abundance to the state. He has them within himself. Long before, Milton had said, "Our liberty is not Caesar's. It is a blessing we have received from God Himself. It is what we are born to. To lay this down at Caesar's feet, which we derived not from him, which we are not beholden to him for, were an unworthy action and a degrading of our very nature." This same philosophy of government appeared near the opening words of the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights. That among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just power from the consent of the governed, * * *." Man, as the ultimate sovereign, creates and is the master of his government. He is a citizen and not a subject.

When the Constitution was drafted, this issue of the liberty of the individual as against the supremacy of the coercive state had been successfully fought out in our Revolutionary War on the battlefield and during the centuries-long struggles of the English people to establish their liberties. This history made the background and basis for the foundation of our Republic. These struggles were ideological conflicts. Their goal was to establish individual liberty as a reality. Which shall predominate—the divine right of kings, which means the divine right of the government, or the divine right of man?

Thus, the philosophy of government, expressed in our Declaration of Independence and carried into our Constitution and Bill of Rights, had a spiritual foundation and came from the very soul of the people. The dignity and integrity of the individual is a fundamental tenet of the Christian faith which has had its highest manifestation in our system of government and way of living. Our historical liberalism was something much deeper than the materialism of the modern intellectual, who lays false claim to liberalism and who is able to accept the fruits of great historic movements without having to fight for them.

The founding fathers' conception of what man is explains many of the provisions of the Constitution. Those which express the powers of the state are largely limitations upon the government's power to interfere with the citizen. Our Constitution guarantees to the people rights which constitute our basic freedoms, freedoms which no totalitarian state gives to its citizens—the right to the liberty and to the security of the individual person; to equal treatment before the law; to freedom of religion, of thought and of speech; to assemble peaceably and petition for the redress of grievances; to criticize the Government; to own property to contract about their own affairs; to manage and operate any legitimate enterprise; to buy and sell in a free market so long as this freedom does not conflict with the public interest; to be protected against unreasonable search and seizure of person and property; to be protected against double jeopardy, and from being compelled to give testimony in a criminal case against themselves, and from being deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; and to be secure against the Government taking property for public use without just compensation. These provisions, written into the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, gave recognition to the human and divine dignity of man. They were the results of the experience of the people showing the need for provisions to safeguard man's individuality against a coercive government. As Woodrow Wilson, the great liberal and historian, said: "Liberty has never come from the government. Liberty has always come from the subjects of it. The history of liberty is a history of limitations of governmental power, not the increase of it."

Our Government, with such a background, has certain plain characteristics:

First. It is not authoritarian. The Constitution established no final seat of authority in any man or position. It contains a carefully worked out system of checks and balances designed to secure the liberty of every man.

Second. It protects minorities. The drafters were familiar with past political experience and knew the dangers of majority rule, under the democratic form of government, to the freedom of those in minority groups. The abuses of pure democracies were well known and had been commented upon by students of government as early as Plato. In order, therefore, to insure liberty, a representative and republican, not a purely democratic, form of government was established.

Third. It protects local self-government. The colonists had always objected to the denial of the right of local government by the British Crown. Local government is an essential of self-government. Therefore, the functions of local government were carefully preserved excepting in those fields which are essentially national.

Fourth. It contemplates a free-enterprise system. The free-enterprise system is necessarily the natural expression of the fundamental freedom of man to express the fullness of his being. He was not to be deprived of the opportunities of his freedom and industry.

Citizens are the slaves of the state if they depend upon its will for their means of life. Consistently, the Constitution contains provisions protecting the fruits of man's labor. These were of the very heart of his freedom.

Fifth. It contemplates individual responsibility for personal economic security. Under this conception of freedom, it is intended that man look for his economic security to the abundance which is the natural product of his own untrammeled liberty, intelligence, and work. The colonists had made their choice between liberty and security. They had established a home in the wilderness of an unexplored continent where there was complete freedom from social or political limitations but little other security. The free-enterprise system, which is inherently a system of risk, thus became a fundamental which has permeated American life ever since. For man's welfare, the founding fathers relied not on the Government but on man's God-given, individual responsibility, intelligence, and industry under the stimulus of freedom. It was by no means inappropriate that the words "Liberty" and "In God we trust" were inscribed upon our coinage although it is the very symbol of material wealth.

So designed, this Nation has prospered materially. It has been a leader among nations in its high productivity of wealth and in the breadth of its distribution among its people. At the high tide of that abundance we are witnessing, however, great activity by certain groups of our people toward reversing these traditional concepts. This attack is part of a world-wide swing toward socialism. The danger to our liberty from the military and political efforts of Russia to rule the world in the name of communism has now been made entirely clear to our people. But our danger from within is more subtle, is little understood by most of our people, and is, therefore, more of a threat to our liberties. I refer to the trend away from our American liberalism indicated by the centralization of power in the Federal Government and the corresponding loss of local self-government, the breakdown of representative government of the type contemplated by the Constitution, the attempted substitution of socialization in the place of our free-enterprise system, and the growth of what is often referred to as the welfare state, but which more appropriately should be called the service state. Observe the changes:

1. Instead of self-government being insured by the maintenance of local government, we are witnessing the twilight of the State governments. In our lifetime, the Federal Government has been converted into the major power in the lives of our people. The Federal Government has taken control of the important phases of the conduct of local and intrastate business, transportation, finance, production, and distribution. An absentee centralized government has thus been substituted for local self-government. Great responsibilities have been vested in a central state which is already heavily burdened and which has a bad but clearly deserved reputation for inefficiency and extravagance. The eligible voters in the last election were so uninterested in its operations that only 50 percent of them voted.

The representatives of the States in the Congress are very willing, and we might say eager, to support what would speedily be recognized and avoided as a consistent policy of extravagant spending if made by the States, but which does not appear extravagant when done with Federal funds. But Federal funds are drawn directly from the people of the several States, largely through the income tax. This extravagance must be paid for through such taxes. The tax is on the industrious citizen, and the wage earners. It falls heaviest on the man who works with his hands, the artisan, the farmer, the skilled laborer; all of whom must be taxed, and heavily, to provide funds for these Federal disbursements. There are enough rich individuals and corporations to pay only a small part of the cost. It is the plain man who in reality pays. People lose their capacity for self-government by failing to govern. If we are to continue to enjoy self-government in these United States, the people must again resume the burden from which they have sought to escape.

2. Observe the trend away from individualism toward socialization. Although the founding fathers certainly never intended to create a government designed to engage in private enterprise, it is plain that our Government is turning from a system based upon the energies of individual men to a system based on his socialized efforts. As an illustration, the Federal Government proposes to duplicate the existing capacity of the private electric generating plants. The discouraging effect of this program on private enterprise is plain, particularly when it is projected against a background of other socialization projects, including the Tennessee Valley and Columbia River developments, the socialization of medicine, the declared intention to secure authority from Congress to build Government steel mills, and such comprehensive planned-economy programs as the Brannan agricultural plan. Necessarily, such systems of planning require central control to the exclusion of the right and initiative of the individual. Necessarily, they involve the denial of free markets, free enterprise, and economic freedom.

3. We have moved rapidly in the direction of the service state. In Britain, the service state was used as a prelude to the more serious forms of socialization. In this country, we are now engaged in an exploitation of the idea of the service state, designed to give material good to certain restricted groups of our people which have great voting power—the veterans, labor, the farmers and those groups of voters who will benefit specially by socialized medicine, the Federal subsidization of education, old-age pensions, housing legislation, employment insurance and so on. Many of these things are good in and of themselves. But man is induced to look for his material good to the socialized action of the state, whereas it should be found in an economy which preserves the individuality of man, and encourages him to rely upon the exercise of his own skill, energy, and talent for his personal advancement and individual prosperity.

Edmund Burke said "People never give up their liberties but under some delusion." Therefore, they resort to delusion who seek to take away the liberties of the people. It is important to observe that generally the changes, which put emphasis on the socialized, not the individual, efforts of man, are proposed and defended on the ground that they are an expression of what is said to be a true "democracy." This conception, however, was repudiated by the drafters of the Constitution. These changes are also declared to be an expression of a modern "liberalism." But this so-called liberalism is not only a denial of the liberalism under which the Constitution was drafted but a denial of true and fundamental liberalism.

The word "democracy" has more than one meaning. In a political sense, it signifies a government designed to depend fully on the rule of the majority. In the social or economic sense, it means equality of social or economic status. It was not discussed in either sense in the historic documents defining the nature of our own Republic.

As I have said, the Government of the United States was set up not as a democracy, using the word in the political sense, but as a republic. The founders of the Government knew the danger to minorities from majority action in a fully democratic government. It is always the minorities which are prejudiced. In their care to protect the freedom of man from his government, the founders intended to safeguard against this danger. No one would question that the New England town-meeting type of pure democracy is ill adapted to our governmental needs, but that we must depend upon representatives duly elected by the eligible voters.

The Constitution did not attempt to create economic equality by a democracy. It is true that the Declaration of Independence declares that all men are created equal. But it was a standard of political, social, and economic opportunity that the Declaration stated. It did not purport to command that the wealth be shared equally. Individuals necessarily reflect different ancestry, environments and training, and these differences produce inequalities in capacities and skills. Under a system of political equality, by which the free play of man's individual intelligence and industry was fully protected, it contemplated that the natural products of man's capacity and energy would be his. Its heart was individual liberty, not a socialized status. The Constitution fully protected property rights and intended to safeguard every man in his right to retain the fruits of his own individual effort.

The modern so-called liberals, however, have adopted a materialistic concept of liberalism and a concept of democracy in the economic sense. They say that social justice requires action by the government to create economic equality. They customarily place what they call human rights above property rights, even though the right to own and hold property is one of the most precious of human rights. The service state is a natural implement of the materialistic liberalism. Social legislation to provide services at government expense to certain classes of the population has a common and very strong appeal because of its material beneficence. On the surface it promises material good. Nevertheless, the dangers of the service state as in instrument of materialistic liberalism should be obvious.

The proposal to equalize men from a material standpoint involves the limitation of the liberty of other men, where it is accomplished by taking wealth from those who have and giving it to those who have not. Legislation designed for such purposes is essentially discriminatory when it confers benefits or privileges upon certain favored groups at the expense, directly or indirectly, of other groups. Such legislation violates in spirit the provisions of the Bill of Rights which guarantees to all persons equality before the law. If this kind of legislation is to meet that test, it should not coerce or discriminate between the different groups of citizens.

I do not suggest that the government, as well as private enterprise, has no functions to perform in matters broadly categorized as welfare. Society should protect the unfortunate persons who are unable to rely upon themselves through the accident of physical or mental disability or personal disaster. But this does not require that where such welfare measures are justified they shall be undertaken by the Federal Government rather than by the States or within the framework of the free-enterprise system. Government bounty should not be spread among persons well able to stand on their own feet and to be the masters of their own destinies. The people can be broken morally by such schemes, which substitute subservience for self-reliance. A healthy man needs no crutches. Through their use his limbs will wither. Where private enterprise can provide the security called for, it will embrace the opportunity.

Of course, individual liberty may not remain absolutely unrestrained. No one today would say that the old doctrine of laissez faire should be tolerated. We are all aware of the corruptive influence of power on persons and organizations. We have seen abuses flow from large aggregations of corporate power. When such corporations refused to use self-restraint, Congress has properly enacted antitrust laws or other regulatory legislation employing restrictive power. And paradoxically we have seen that restrictive power itself grows hugely until in some instances it is a choking threat to free enterprise. As a people, we are not mature enough to eliminate all restrains upon individual freedom. But again there is a vast difference in restraint and control. Here the function of the Government in limitation and not in the complete regulation which essentially is control. Control is but a few paces short of pure socialism and is a far cry from our heritage of true liberalism.

I do not propose any limitation on the abundance of the product of industry which is to be distributed to our people. The great volume of that abundance is one of the wonders of the world. I am considering here not ends but means. The question is not whether the distribution of abundance shall be reduced. The question rather is how it shall be provided—by the state through socialism or within the framework of the free-enterprise system? Where shall the emphasis be—on the freedom of individualism or on the limitations upon individualism which are the heart of socialization? The free-enterprise system in America, in point of its productivity and the distribution of the bounties of that abundance to the public, is without parallel in human experience. All experience indicates that a governmental system of production will not equal it in productivity. Within the framework of the free-enterprise system and without striking down human liberty, free enterprise is capable of producing a greater measure of bounties than a service state can provide.

It is significant that the basic philosophy of our Government with its emphasis on spiritual values has manifested itself in such a measure of material prosperity. Our country's use of the free enterprise system is a way to attain a goal. The goal is not the free enterprise system. This goal is not really materialistic. The purpose is the full development of man. The spiritual aspects of free enterprise may not be recognized by all businessmen. But whether recognized or not, it is clear that the fundamental of the American system is, and always has been, this spiritual freedom of man. The effort of today's materialistic liberals is to make material welfare the purpose of our Nation's being at the expense of freedom. This is a perversion of the American ideal.

People naturally love liberty. They will surrender liberty only through misunderstanding. I do not believe that the departures from our traditional position, which the lawmakers have made, represent an understanding choice by the people. The people have not understood. The departures have been made under the impact of the severe depression of the 1930's and of the World War, when the stress was upon haste and upon temporary and emergency conditions. In some instances they reflect, furthermore, the selfishness of individuals and organized pressure groups. The prime purpose of too many people has been to get something out of the State in subsidies, bonuses, and Government aid of one sort or another for special groups. Too few have been trying to protect the Nation against such selfish demands.

Under an absolute government, it is not necessary for the people to understand; but the preservation of liberty requires the light of understanding. Consequently, it is vital that every citizen of our Republic fully understands the fundamentals of our representative form of government and the principles necessary to the retention of the freedom of the individual. Without such knowledge, the citizen cannot intelligently determine whether or not the policies which are pursued by his representatives in the government will lead to the destruction of our form of government and the loss of basic freedom.

Our fundamental liberties today are accepted as commonplace. This is because many people do not know how those liberties were won. To retain our freedom, we must understand it. We must want to retain it and be willing to make all sacrifices necessary to that end. We must not take freedom as something that is free; that is, guaranteed to us forever without our own continuous effort. Such complacency can lead only to our own destruction. Lawyers should be the last to forget that not only the eternal vigilance but eternal effort is essential for the preservation of liberty. As Woodrow Wilson said, "No more vital truth was ever uttered than that freedom and free institutions cannot be long maintained by any people who do not understand the nature of their own government."

There is no present danger of a sudden collapse of our country as a free country. Freedom is not lost by a sudden breaking of the governmental structure. It is destroyed by an imperceptible nibbling away of one essential liberty after another, each nibble seemingly, at the time, innocuous. It is a gradual process and extends over a long period of time. It is like the fall of a great oak. In outward appearance, the tree has great strength, and when it falls, in what seems to be a moment of great stress, it is actually the culmination of the slow and imperceptible deterioration of the years.

On every possible occasion, we lawyers, therefore, should expound fearlessly the principles of the true American liberalism writen into our Constitution. This requires courage, perseverance, and a strong faith in that liberalism. Some lawyers feel that the political stream is running too strongly toward some form of collectivism to be halted. Many think that the problem is so big that their individual efforts are futile. These are mere counsels of despair. They are unworthy of our profession and of our American heritage. The Nation was born in a battle of ideas. Today we face a new battle of ideas. The cause is not hopeless unless we will it so.

There is an old Chinese proverb which says "It is better to light one candle than to curse the darkness." The lawyer's candle should burn far brighter than any other citizen's. He is trained in law and advocacy; his opinions on public questions gain special attention because of his profession; he has many opportunities to speak and to advise. Frequently, he is a man of prestige in his community and often he holds political office or is active and influential in a political party. In any battle of ideas, he should be—he is—the best equipped and the most effective soldier in the field. The battle to retain our free American society and to defend it against further inroads must not be lost by the default of lawyers. There are many positive actions which lawyers may perform:

We can advise the managers of private enterprise, with some of whom every lawyer has contacts, to study and to deal constructively, in their own organizations and trade associations, with the problems which, unless handled effectively and promptly by the private enterprise system itself, ripen into legislative proposals of governmental action. In this respect, the managers of the system have an important duty. The public will demand that the system fully measure up to its responsibility to serve the public good. It is in competition with the forms of socialistic endeavor and must bear the full brunt of ministering best to the public needs, if the public is not to turn elsewhere.

We can resist the permanent fastening upon the Nation of authoritative measures, proper and necessary in times of war but which are not natural to nor a part of the peactime economy. We are today confronted with the threat of another world-wide conflict. We are faced with the all-out mobilization of industry and manpower Steps have necessarily been taken within the past week to set in motion wartime controls for the emergency. But after the real emergency has passed, we should stand stoutly in defense of freedom and be quick to insist that emergency measures, designed to meet war needs, shall be given no more than temporary life and shall be permitted to make no permanent inroad upon our liberal institutions.

We can convince our fellow citizens that Government cannot furnish the solution of every economic ailment and that history shows that the increased assumption of the functions of private enterprise by the Government not only destroys individual freedom but brings economic decline and insecurity.

We can challenge every measure which would transfer to the Federal Government additional functions that have been and can be performed by private organization and enterprise. There is no such challenge from any political party. It must come to the political parties from the people.

Serious questions may be involved in formulating social legislation, which meets the needs of a modern industrial state and does not at the same time destroy the individual rights of the citizen. What we have done in recent years to break down the sovereignty of the States, and to impair local self-government, and the action we have taken in all fields of social and economic legislation, should be carefully reexamined. Congress should without delay authorize and direct to be made an authoritative study by a commission of distinguished and impartial experts.

The Commission should be directed to report what steps should be taken by recommended constitutional amendments, legislation or otherwise:

1. To restore local self-government and return to the States the responsibility of handling such affairs as can best be dealt with on a State or local level rather than by the Federal Government;

2. To give to the States exclusive power to collect certain types of taxes so that the States themselves may be in a position financially to resume their proper functions of government;

3. To withdraw from the Federal Government and transfer to local governments or private enterprise control over matters involving social welfare to the greatest extent deemed possible;

4. To reexamine generally all legislation now in effect which has a tendency to involve or promote the socialization of business and to hamper individual initiative and the continued development of the free-enterprise system.

The examination should be divorced from considerations of an emergency, selfish or political nature. Only the best interests of all the people, and the protection of their freedom and the preservation of our form of government, should be considered. In this study, the issue should be considered with the same high measure of intelligence that guided the founders of our Republic when the original Constitution was drafted. Let the same wisdom and light in which our Nation was born show forth to save it in this critical hour.

All Americans, who are sincerely devoted to the future welfare of their country, stand today at the crossroads. Many of their fellows have already been misguided in the name of a false liberalism down the road that leads toward autocratic materialism. The other road follows the true spiritual liberalism which is the basic constitutional principle of the Republic. Before it is too late, it is the duty of the bar and of all others whose training and abilities enable them to recognize where these two roads lead to devote every talent vouchsafed them by their Creator to guide their fellow men along the path of liberty.

Where Do We Go From Here?—A Report on Events That Led Up to the Korean War

---

OF

HON. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, technically speaking, we are coming to the close of the Eighty-first Democratic controlled Congress, and I would like to make a few observations on some of the important events that led up to the Korean war.

There are many vital domestic problems that still require the attention of the people and Congress. These will be taken up when Congress reconvenes on November 27, and in the Eighty-second Congress which convenes on January 3, 1951. We have passed legislation directing the President to protect our domestic economy from the ravages of a disastrous inflation. I trust that he will show wisdom in exercising his powers in this respect.

Our first obligation is to back our country's war effort to the fullest extent. During the present session, Congress has appropriated more than $30,000,000,000 for financing the Korean war and for increasing our military strength. This legislation received my support. I have urged and still insist upon the utmost haste on the part of the President and the military authorities in Washington to supply our fighting forces in Korea and elsewhere, with an abundance of the right kind of weapons and war materials so that they can win speedy victory and save American lives.

Extraordinary war powers have been conferred upon the President of the United States. Such authority should be used by him to win the war and not for the purpose of initiating reforms in our Government structure and domestic economy. There are too many people in high places who would like to use war powers to create a socialistic state in this country.

As in the past 16 years, I will continue to vigorously oppose communism and socialism in any form or by any other name. The war against communism in Korea will be fought and won by Americans who believe in freedom and a peaceful world, and the American people will make every sacrifice to back our fighting men for victory. When the war is won, we want our armed men and boys to come back home to the kind of a free country which they fought to save.

Our fighting forces in Korea are making excellent progress, and we pray that an early victory will be theirs. They are engaged in a full-scale war. It is no longer the police action ordered by President Truman on June 27, to stop the Russian directed and armed Communist invasion of South Korea. The situation in Korea is still serious, and we must therefore mobilize our resources and strength against communistic aggression. Whether we like it or not, our country has again become involved in a tragic war, and I hope and pray that the war in Korea is not the beginning of world war III.

THE PEOPLE WANT THE TRUTH

Perhaps no real benefit can be expected from a resurvey of the historical past. Merely to locate the blame for the mess in which we now find ourselves may not serve immediately a useful purpose. Nevertheless, an indirect byproduct might conceivably be the realization by President Truman and Secretary Acheson that we fight best when we are kept informed of the reasons for our fighting. And if this induces greater frankness on the part of the administration, if it brings better teamwork between Government and public, then something will have been accomplished through public realization of the background of this war.

Give the people the truth and they will make the right decision. That the full truth was not given us about Yalta and subsequent diplomatic events should not be a precedent for future mistakes of a similar nature.

We are in for a hard war and it can and will be won. But we must know exactly why we are fighting and for what we are fighting. That kind of partnership between those in authority and those who take their orders is absolutely essential.

HOW DID IT HAPPEN?

Under the Constitution, the President of the United States has full control in shaping our country's foreign policy. For the past 17 years under two Democratic Presidents, the foreign policy has been to appease Communists at home and abroad. As a result of such a policy, our American boys are giving their lives and making tremendous sacrifices in the Korean war.

On June 27, 1950, President Truman suddenly discovered that he could not trust or take the word of Joe Stalin or the leaders in Communist countries dominated by Russia. He found out that the Russian objective was to take over control of the world and to destroy freedom and religion for all people. The President thereupon reversed his appeasement policy in Asia and ordered American troops into Korea to stop Communist aggression by force. This action was taken in the name of the United Nations.

WHY WERE WE CAUGHT SHORT IN KOREA?

It is the right of the American people to secure an honest answer to this question from President Truman and Secretary of State Acheson.

The people were told that the Communist attack on South Korea was a surprise. But what are the facts? For the past 2 years, our military intelligence reported the concentration of heavily armed Communist troops north of the thirty-eighth parallel. By June 30, 1949, the last of the 50,000 American troops were withdrawn from South Korea to appease the Russian Communists, which actually turned out to be an invitation for a Russian-directed Communist drive to take over South Korea. On June 12, 1950, Secretary of State Acheson wrote off South Korea and Formosa as not being vital to our national security, which constituted another invitation for the northern Communists to wage war on South Korea. On May 10, 1950, the following Associated Press dispatch appeared in the Washington Star which gave additional notice to President Truman and the Secretary of State of the impending attack upon South Korea. I quote from the Star:

INVASION IS IMMINENT, SOUTH KOREANS WARNED

(By the Associated Press)

SEOUL, May 10.—Defense Minister Sihn Sung Mo warned South Korea today that invasion by Communist North Korea is imminent.

Sinn said intelligence reports indicated the North Koreans were moving in force toward the border.

He asserted the North Korean Army totals 183,000 trained men; has 173 planes, 173 tanks, and 32 naval vessels, and is supported by 9,000 guerrillas, plus constabulatory and youth corp units.

With all of this information in the hands of the President and the State Department, the attack on South Korea should not have been a surprise. However, on June 27, 1950, the President reversed his Communist-appeasement policy in Asia to one of fighting Communist aggression. Overnight young Americans of 18 and 19 years were thrown into battle, ill-prepared and ill-equipped and outnumbered, into what the President called a police action, which later turned out to be a full-scale war against hordes of crack Russian trained and armed Communist troops. Hundreds of our men have lost their lives because of the woeful weakness of our military forces and our almost total lack of preparedness.

A majority of the American people are bitterly opposed to communism. They approve the President's change in foreign policy from appeasing Communists to opposing Communist aggression. However, they do not excuse the lack of preparation to meet the new war crisis, as they know that Congress had appropriated $95,000,000,000 since the termination of World War II and prior to the Korean war for the Defense Establishment. The Congress and the people felt that our country was fully prepared to meet any attack because Defense Secretary Johnson said that if we were attacked at 4 in the afternoon our forces would be fully equipped and ready to fight at 5 o'clock the same afternoon, and only 27 days before ordering American troops into Korea, President Truman stated that—

We are closer to permanent peace than at any time in the last 5 years.

THE FOURTEEN QUESTIONS

The American people have a right to learn the truth about our preparedness and the President's foreign policy, as well as to secure honest facts on foreign commitments made by the executive branch of the Government. They want truthful answers to the following questions:

First. What happened to the $95,000,000,000 spent on national defense since World War II?

Second. Why did only one dollar out of every seven defense dollars go for combat equipment between 1946 and 1950?

Third. Why did President Truman limit the Air Force to 48 groups when the Republican Eightieth Congress ordered the Air Force expanded to 70 groups?

Fourth. Why, if communism was a menace in Asia, were there only 6 General Pershing tanks, only 30 propellate—tactical—combat planes, only 1 aircraft carrier, and not a single combat marine in the Japanese area when we entered the Korean conflict?

Fifth. Why did President Truman on December 15, 1945, officially announce that unless our ally, China, admitted Communists to its government, China would get no more American aid?

Sixth. Who was best serving America—the administrations which for 50 years defended the open door in China, or the Truman administration which abandoned China to Soviet exploitation?

Seventh. Why when Congress had voted $10,500,000 military aid for South Korea 8 months earlier, had South Korea received only $200 worth of Signal Corps wire when the Communists struck, June 25?

Eighth. Whose advice was the administration following when it asked last year for $150,000,000 in economic aid for South Korea—that of its long-time adviser, Owen Lattimore, who said in July 1949 that "The thing to do is let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it"—hence, the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000?

Ninth. Why did Secretary of State Acheson virtually invite the Communists to take Korea, Formosa, and the balance of China by announcing January 12, 1950, that they were beyond our defense perimeter?

Tenth. On what basis did President Truman declare—only 27 days before ordering American troops into Korea—that we were closer to a permanent peace than any time in the last 5 years?

Eleventh. Which was wiser, the administration's appeasement policy that enabled Russia, in the 5 years after World War II, to extend its domination from 170,000,000 people to 800,000,000 people, or Republican insistence on a firm anti-Communist policy?

Twelfth. After the Korean Communists are pushed back to the thirty-eighth parallel, then what?

Thirteenth. What will the administration do in Asia in the future, return to appeasement?

Fourteenth. What hope can there be for peace under any Democratic administration?

WE NEED A FIRM AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Within the past 35 years our country has been involved in two devastating World Wars under two Democratic Presidents, and we are now on the brink of world war III. A strong American foreign policy may have prevented these conflicts. Diplomats make war, but the rank and file of the people fight and pay for them in blood and material resources.

What we need in this country is a strong American foreign policy that our enemies will understand, backed up by a strong domestic economy under our American system, and military strength to demonstrate that we mean business if some dictator attempts to start trouble. Such a program will be our best insurance to secure a lasting peace in the world. One does not need to be an expert in foreign affairs to figure out that Democratic foreign policies have materially contributed to our involvement in three major conflicts.

WE LOST THE PEACE IN WORLD WAR II AT YALTA

We lost the peace in World War II in 1945 at Yalta when the United States teamed up with Russia to launch the Reds' conquest in Asia by secret agreement, giving Russia control of Manchuria, Outer Mongolia, Port Arthur, Dairen, the Sakhalins, and Kuriles. It was at Yalta that our Government cut the heart out of China and handed it to Stalin, because good "Old Joe," as President Truman calls him, wanted it. It was at Yalta that President Roosevelt with Hopkins, Harriman, and Hiss and the whole crowd of appeasers at his side, secretly gave Manchuria to Russia, thus breaking our solemn promise to faithful China. It is no wonder that William C. Bullitt, Democratic United States Ambassador to Russia, has said this about the Yalta agreement:

No more unnecessary, disgraceful, and potentially disastrous document has ever been signed by a President of the United States.

I could continue at great length to tell about how Russia was permitted to take over the Balkan countries and eastern Germany and Austria. This vast area is behind the iron curtain and under control of the Communists. They are all trouble spots threatening the security and peace of the United States and the world. I want the people of the United States to have the full truth about our foreign policies which have again involved our country and the world in another war. As a result of these policies, I ask President Truman and his Secretary of State to honestly answer the question that everyone is asking, Where do we go from here?

FIFTY-FOUR THOUSAND AMERICAN COMMUNISTS

J. Edgar Hoover, of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, reports that there are at least 54,000 American Communists and 500,000 fellow travelers who work with these agents of Moscow, running at large in the United States. He reports 727 Communists in Minnesota and more than 7,000 fellow travelers. These American Communists receive their orders from Stalin. They are prepared to sabotage our war effort and to destroy our freedom and religion.

I have vigorously fought Communists since they infiltrated into key positions in our Government in 1933. There should be no place for them in our Government or in the United States. I will not be satisfied until they are confined or sent to Russia where they properly belong.

To illustrate how the Truman administration has coddled communism, we need only turn to the sickening case of Alger Hiss. When Hiss was caught in red-handed betrayal of his country, President Truman called the case a red herring. Secretary of State Acheson proudly refused to turn his back on the polished Mr. Hiss. Supreme Court Justices Frankfurter and Reed went to New York to testify for him.

No wonder the Hisses, the Wadleighs, the Pressmans, the Abts, the Witts, the Coplons, the Marzanis and all the other Communists and fellow travelers were welcomed with open arms in the Government.

President Truman's veto of the anti-Communist bill, which was approved by Congress over the veto, clearly demonstrates the desire of the President to continue his Communist appeasement policy toward Communists in the United States. Who is the power behind the President that dictates such a policy? The people would like to have an answer to this question. I voted to override the President's veto as my choice could only be to stand by Americans who are fighting Communists at home and abroad.

SOCIALISM

I am as much opposed to socialism as I am to communism. Both seek to destroy our American form of government and way of life. Socialism is a twin brother of communism. Socialism creates a vast government bureaucracy to regiment and direct the lives of the people. It seeks to nationalize every profession and vital industry on the promise of giving the people something for nothing. Such promises can never be carried out, because someone must pay the bill. I am bitterly opposed to socialized medicine or any other scheme, by whatever name it is called, that seeks to impose the socialistic system on the American people.

Socialism has been unable to deliver on its promises in Britain, even with the United States Marshall plan billions backing it, for the same reason it has been unable to deliver whenever and wherever it has come to power. It cannot deliver because it is a system of government that represses and suppresses the best instincts of the human race. It is a system that undertakes to make everybody to share the poverty of the moment, rather than to inspire everybody to create wealth in greater abundance through personal enterprise.

DEMOCRATIC HIGH COMMAND STOOPS TO NEW LOW IN AMERICAN POLITICS

In the desperate attempt of the Truman administration and certain left-wing CIO labor leaders to elect a left-wing majority in the coming Eighty-second Congress, the Democratic high command has stooped to a new low in American politics. The most insidious and false propaganda publicized by the Democratic Fair Deal committee, with the blessings of President Truman, is the charge that the Republican minority in the Eighty-first Congress is responsible for the war in Korea because the Republican Members of the House did not vote for economic aid to Korea on January 19, 1950. This propaganda is being broadcast in every district represented by a Republican Congressman. What are the facts?

The vote was taken on January 19, 1950. The economic aid proposed in the legislation authorized funds to build cement, fertilizer, and electric plants in South Korea. I, and most Republicans, as well as many Democrats, fought against this type of economic aid to Korea because President Truman and Secretary Acheson had abandoned South Korea to the Communists prior to January 12, 1950, and we did not want to use the American taxpayers' money to build cement, electric, and fertilizer plants for the North Korean Communists to take over.

Another insidious statement used by Labor's League for Political Action was a vote on August 18, 1949, to reduce military aid assistance to Korea by $50,000,000. Ten million, five hundred thousand dollars was finally agreed upon for military aid for Korea, and up to June 27, 1950, when the war began in South Korea, the President and Secretary of State had only used $200 of the appropriated money for signal wire to arm the Korean soldiers. The facts are that American soldiers had been withdrawn from Korea by June 30, 1949, under orders of the President. The President and the Secretary of State had written off Korea and they had no intention whatsoever to arm the South Korean Army out of any funds appropriated by Congress. Do you not remember what Owen Lattimore, the long-time adviser to the State Department said in July 1949, that—

The thing to do is let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it.

And the Truman administration followed the recommendations of Mr. Lattimore.

The Democratic committee has issued a new scandal sheet, which will be used in every State falsely charging that I and other "GOP Congressmen follow Red Party line," for voting against the above proposals. The facts are that I and other Republicans have been fighting Communists at every turn of the road, both at home and abroad. And the Democratic high command and left-wing CIO labor leaders are the officials and individuals with their organizations who have been consorting and appeasing Communists everywhere. The left-wing Democratic Congressmen who are completely controlled by the Democratic high command and the CIO, are the representatives who voted for the above measures following the Red party line in order to secure the Communist vote in national elections. The people will not be fooled with this sort of false and clever trickery.

The American people will not be deceived by this kind of last-minute distorted propaganda which will flood the country during the next 6 weeks.

THE HIGH COST OF GOVERNMENT AND TAXES

The high cost of Government is primarily responsible for the high cost of living. The consumers of the country pay for the cost of Government in hidden and direct taxes. Under the new tax law signed by the President on September 23, 1950, the average person in the United States will work between 3 and 4 months each year to pay for the cost of Government. Reduce the cost of Government and the cost of living will be lowered.

Corporations and persons engaged in business pay taxes out of profits realized from the sale of their products or services to consumers. If there are no profits, they pay no taxes. Unfortunately, persons living on fixed incomes such as frozen salaries, wages, annuities, and pensions are not able to pass their hidden and other taxes on to other persons. Most farmers are in this category. These groups bear the greatest burden from the high cost of Government and inflation. In many instances, persons living on fixed incomes do not have sufficient means to secure the bare necessities of life. Their only remedy is to reduce the cost of Government and eliminate the causes for inflationary spirals.

Deficit Government spending in a peacetime economy should not be permitted. The budget should be balanced and taxes lowered. In the past 20 years, the Federal budget has only been balanced in one Congress, and that was in the Eightieth Republican Congress. This Republican controlled Eightieth Congress cut the cost of Government, reduced individual income taxes, balanced the budget, and left a large surplus in the Treasury to apply on the national debt which now exceeds $257,000,000,000.

With our country engaged in another war, it will not be possible to balance the budget on account of tremendous war expenditures. But I insist that all other Government expenditures should be reduced as far as possible, and when the war comes to an end, the budget must be balanced and taxes lowered to save our country from bankruptcy.

I have been a member of the economy bloc in Congress for the past 16 years. I favor that the Government should run on the same principle as you run your household. That is one reason why I have voted against many highly publicized administration programs that will cost the taxpayers and consumers billions of dollars in direct and hidden taxes to pay the bill. As long as I remain a Member of Congress, I will continue my effort to eliminate duplication, waste, and unnecessary spending in our Federal Government. The Hoover Commission recommendations to cut the cost of Government by eliminating waste and duplication is a step in the right direction to reduce taxes and the cost of living.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Congress from a fine congressional district in Minnesota, I regard my position as a sacred trust to the people I have the honor of representing in this body. I have endeavored to be a representative of all of the people in my district and to work for the welfare and security of our country.

I have vigorously fought proposals which I believed would injure my constituents or in any manner attempt to destroy our American form of government and way of life. I will continue to advocate and support proposals that seek to strengthen our security and afford greater opportunities for every American citizen in accordance with the ideals that have made our country great. Equality of opportunity for every segment of our economy is vital for the future progress and unity of the Nation.

I firmly believe in the principle that the Government should be the servant of the people and not its master. Those who advocate that the Government must do everything for everybody are only leading the American people down the road to socialism, loss of freedom, and bankruptcy.

Our country is engaged in a war against Communist aggression. With the help of our allies in the United Nations, we hope and pray for an early victory. We must and will win this struggle against the forces that seek to destroy our freedom and the peace of the world. I have dedicated my efforts to backing our fighting forces for victory in order to save American freedom and to secure a lasting world peace.

Vursell's Labor Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few remarks today which will give the laboring men the facts as to my support of legislation favorable to labor in Congress.

Having come up the hard way as a laboring man myself, starting in by working on the section and later becoming a locomotive fireman in Centralia, Ill., I have never lost interest in seeing that the laboring men are fully protected so far as I can have it done as a Member of Congress.

I do not believe there is a more sincere friend of labor in the Congress than I have constantly been. I have considered the best interests of the laboring men and tried to be helpful to them in all such legislation coming before the Congress during my service here.

Since my record has been falsely publicized by some of the labor publications, I would like to point out some of the measures I have supported, and start with legislation affecting the railroad men.

Due to the fact that the railroad men have settled most of their problems through negotiation under the Railway Labor Act, only a few of their legislative problems have come before the Congress. In practically every instance I have supported legislation in favor of them, asked for by their legislative representatives here in Washington.

For instance, several years ago when the railroad men in the maintenance department were asking for an 8-cents-an-hour raise, and the matter was before the Railway Mediation Board, I spoke on the floor of the House urging that the Railway Labor Board should grant their request. I pointed out that the lowest-paid workers at that time were getting as little as 36 cents an hour. I did all I could in an effort to help them get a raise.

Mr. Speaker, in the Eightieth Congress when the Crosser bill came before us, in a hard fight on the floor of the House, I supported amendments to increase their retirement fund by 20 percent, and voted for the bill giving them additional benefits.

When a bill came before the House seeking to prevent railroad men from suing in the district courts in the larger cities where they could get higher jury verdicts for injuries sustained in their work, I helped to defeat that bill, reserving their present rights under the law.

I introduced a bill in this session seeking to increase railroad retirement for all railway men and their widows by 33⅓ percent or more, which bill should come up as legislation in the next Congress. I will continue to support this bill to increase these benefits in the next Congress if I am reelected.

At the suggestion of W. D. Johnson, legislative representative of the Order of Railway Conductors in Washington, who has always contacted me when legislation came before the Congress in which your national officers are interested, I have not only voted for the legislation requested by them, but have been active in helping to secure the votes of other Members of Congress favorable to legislation sought by the railroad employees.

Mr. Speaker, at Mr. Johnson's suggestion, and that of other labor officers, I appeared before the Appeal Board of Rivers and Harbors of the United States Army engineers and spoke against the building of the Hennipen Canal from Peoria to the Mississippi River, which would have carried a vast volume of freight, and would have thrown hundreds of railroad men out of work who were hauling the coal by rail in that northern section of the State.

I was congratulated by the attorney representing the railroad men in Washington for the strong fight I made against the building of such canal. My efforts were successful in defeating the proposition, saving the jobs of hundreds of railroad men.

Mr. Speaker, again, at the suggestion of W. D. Johnson, of the ORC, as a member of the Committee on Public Works and Flood Control, I helped to prevent the consideration and possible passing out of our committee a bill providing for the expense of $700,000,000 by the Government to build the St. Lawrence waterway, which again would throw thousands of railroad men out of work.

On the same committee I helped to prevent the spending of many millions of dollars to build waterway transportation on the Big Sandy River in Kentucky which would have thrown hundreds of railroad men out of work.

These are just a few of the things I have done as your Representative in Washington to protect the interest of the railway workers.

POSTAL WORKERS

During the past 8 years I have been in Congress, I have voted to increase the salaries of the 450,000 postal workers, all of whom are members of organized labor, but do not have the right to strike against the Government.

In one session I voted to give them a $400-a-year increase; in a later session another $400-a-year increase; and in the Eightieth Republican Congress a $450-a-year increase. In that same session of Congress we greatly increased the retirement benefits for all postal workers.

OTHER LABOR LEGISLATION

When the war was on, I led the fight to kill the work-or-fight bill that would have cost the Government and the laboring men billions of dollars in taxes.

This bill would have caused every worker up to 65 years of age to register and be sent anywhere in the Nation to work wherever the Government desired. It was a most drastic and unnecessary piece of legislation. We defeated the bill which prevented all workingmen from being regimented as never before and saved them as taxpayers a great deal of money.

In the Eightieth Republican Congress I helped to pass the tax bill that exempted 7,500,000 men and women in the lowest income bracket from paying any taxes. This bill reduced the taxes of practically all workers by about 20 percent, giving them the benefit of lower taxation from 1947 to the present time.

I spoke for and voted for the raise of the minimum wage from 40 cents an hour to 75 cents an hour.

I voted for and spoke for increasing the benefits of social security for all workers passed in this Congress which gives them a raise of 75 percent, or more in some cases.

THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

Mr. Speaker, in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, I voted for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law by supporting the Wood bill, which, when written, removed 20 objections complained of by labor embodied in the Taft-Hartley Act.

If this new bill had been approved by the Congress, it would have been accepted almost unanimously by the rank and file of labor. After this bill was passed by the Committee of the Whole House by 14 votes, it required yet another vote with the Speaker in the chair before it could be approved in the House of Representatives. Congressman MARCANTONIO objected to the final vote being taken at once, and under the rules of the House, the vote had to be delayed from Friday until the next Tuesday.

The President and the national democratic chairman, Mr. Boyle, and the big labor bosses in Washington, joined in a tremendous effort to line up enough votes to have the bill recommitted to the committee for further study. When the final vote was taken, the bill was recommitted by five votes. The administration and the labor leaders in Washington blocked our efforts to have the bill brought back to the floor of the House in that session, or the session just closed. They kept the Taft-Hartley law from being repealed. They refused to let it be repealed.

Mr. Speaker, the administration and the big labor leaders in Washington took this action, preventing labor from having a better bill to work under, in order to hold it over for a campaign issue in this campaign. They are clearly using labor as a political football. They knew if we were able to pass this better bill which would be fully acceptable to labor, that they would not be able to make a campaign among the laboring men to raise money for this election.

They knew that the labor vote in large numbers would swing back to the Republican Party because the Wood bill would have settled the labor question satisfactorily to the rank and file of labor.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the rank and file of labor has lived under the Taft-Hartley law for the past 3 years, and have become aware of the fact that even though it needs some changes, it has not been anything like as bad a bill as the labor bosses have tried to make them believe it was. The facts are that many provisions of this bill have protected the rank and file of labor from the labor bosses themselves. It has taken some power away from the top men in labor and given it to the little locals of the country.

Mr. Speaker, the proof of this is in the fact that labor has continued to write the best contracts under the Taft-Hartley law year after year they have ever written. Labor is employed at the highest wages in the history of the Nation and you can hardly pick up a newspaper unless you read of better contracts being signed with higher wages up to this very day. That is proof in itself that labor can see in any direction it looks, that labor has done better under the Taft-Hartley bill than ever before.

There are still some sections of the Taft-Hartley bill that should be taken out of the act and would have been taken out if the President and the big labor leaders in Washington would have supported the Wood bill as they should have done when we made that effort.

They will be taken out of the act when enough Members are elected to Congress who have the courage to do what they know should be done, and quit using the great rank and file of labor as a political football in order to gain political ends.

The General Motors contract, hailed by Walter Reuther as the finest contract ever written, was negotiated without hardly a threat of a strike, section by section, under the Taft-Hartley law.

The Ford Motors contract, the Chrysler contract, and various other contracts written within the past few months were all negotiated by genuine collective bargaining under the present law, and they are the best contracts ever written to date for the laboring men.

The rank and file of labor are beginning to wake up to the fact that they have been "kidded" and deceived by the big labor bosses in Washington solely in an effort to gain political advantage.

Mr. Speaker, the majority of the Members of Congress who want to do the right thing by business, labor, and agriculture, of which I am proud to be a Member, will continue to treat labor fairly and justly in the future, and in fact that is all that the rank and file of labor want.

We realize that labor is 50 percent of free enterprise, management and the public are the other 50 percent. We realize that labor has made a great contribution to the upbuilding of this country and the high standard of living we enjoy.

We want labor steadily employed at good wages under the best possible working conditions, and I shall continue as one who will insist that labor must have equal justice in legislation at all times.

Address of Hon. Oscar R. Ewing, Federal Security Administrator

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, let me bring to the earnest attention of my colleagues the full address on America's place in a progressively free world, presented by the Honorable Oscar R. Ewing, Federal Security Administrator, before the sixty-ninth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in Houston, Tex., on September 22, 1950:

I am proud to stand before the members of the American Federation of Labor at this great convention, and beside your beloved statesman, William Green. I am proud to report to you—as I did last year—that the fight for American progress goes on amidst the tensions of international crisis and the confusions of reactionary obstructionism.

In this midcentury year, as we look back to the advances we have made since 1900 and as we look forward to the future, we rededicate ourselves to the primitive principle that life itself means progress. Neither Korea, nor the Kremlin, nor the National Association of Manufacturers, nor the American Medical Association, nor anyone else is going to stop the people of this country in their efforts to maintain their liberty and promote their security and happiness.

As we tighten our belts for the struggle against communism, as we mobilize the home front to cope with emergency, as we send our men into battle against the Communist aggressors in Korea, we do so for the sake of the liberty, the security, and the human happiness which are the American promise. We have no designs on the rest of the world. We have only the grand design of a progressive America in a free world, and we are prepared to make whatever sacrifices are needed to fulfill this grand design—because we know that the only alternative is stagnation, slavery, and death.

We do not indulge in wishful thinking. There are sacrifices for all of us to make in the difficult times ahead—sacrifices that some of us are already making. The men risking their lives in Korea today do not need to be reminded of this. The young people now going into our Armed Forces do not need to be reminded of this. And the rest of us—the working people, the businessmen, the farmers, the housewives, the Government officials—all of us willingly accept our new and heavy responsibilities. Already the President has been armed by Congress with the power to tighten up our domestic economy, and he has acted with his accustomed speed and firmness. We are proud of the wisdom, the courage, and the common humanity that Harry Truman has demonstrated once again in this time of crisis.

Now, there are some stupid people who want to use the international situation as an excuse to throw away every gain this country has made since Franklin D. Roosevelt became President 17 years ago. These people are not only stupid; they are dangerous. They tell us that we must fight the totalitarians by throwing democracy out the window. They tell us that America can protect itself only if it stops being the America we know and love. This they tell us in the sacred name of patriotism.

Well, we aren't having any of it. It is true that, whereas in 1933 the greatest single threat to the American people was the poverty and misery caused by the depression at home, today in 1950 the greatest threat comes from abroad. It is true that we must give top priority to the challenge of the slave world. It is true that the conduct of our foreign policy is the overriding concern of our people and our Government.

But these stupid, dangerous people do not understand that, in our time, domestic affairs are the bulwark of our foreign policy. How strong would our foreign policy be if our country were weak, if our people were hungry, if our workers were dissatisfied, if we had millions of unemployed roaming our streets? How could we stop aggression if our people were diseased, and discontented? How far could we get if our factories were idle, and our industrial plant stagnating? How could we gird ourselves for action if there were no production for the new National Production Authority to supervise, and no economy for the new Economic Stabilization Agency to stabilize? And how many friends would we have in the world if we confronted the Communists with a way of life that was no freer than theirs, no more promising than theirs, no more respectful of human dignity then theirs?

Yes, we must lead the way in the international situation, and we must do it with courage and determination. We can do so only if our own country increases in strength, only if our own house is in order, only if our own people are dedicated to the principles of American freedom, security, and happiness. That is part of the home-front mobilization today, and no amount of reactionary stupidity can remove it.

I remind you of President Truman's own words when he addressed the Nation a few days ago:

"All of us—whether we are farmers, or wage earners, or businessmen—must give up some of the things we would ordinarily expect to have for ourselves and our families. The danger the free world faces is so great that we cannot be satisfied with less than an all-out effort by everyone. We have not given up our goal of a better life for every citizen in this great country of ours. But, for the time being, we must be absolutely sure that our economy turns out the guns and planes and tanks and other supplies which are needed to protect the world from the threat of Communist domination."

As Federal Security Administrator, I am responsible to the President, to the Congress, and above all to you and all other members of the American public, for the Government's activities in health, education, and family security. These responsibilities have for years been among the most controversial in our domestic affairs. There have been running arguments about social security—many of them now happily resolved by the new amendments which expand coverage and increase the benefits to bring them more closely in line with present-day living costs. Despite the inclusion of the Knowland amendment, the American Federation of Labor can pride itself on the steam it put into this great advance in the social-security program. There has been even greater argument about ways of making American education bigger and better for more of our children. And there has been something worse than argument about the simple mathematical problem of helping the average American family pay for the high costs of medical care.

I think the time has come, as we find ourselves in the midst of crisis, to look at these controversies in their true light—in the light of their total significance and value to our national welfare.

Let us look, for a moment, at one of these proposals—the proposal to establish a program of Federal aid to education. Think, for a moment, of the children who recently started to school for the first time this year. Perhaps your child is among them. Remember that some of them are going into classrooms crowded to bursting, into double sessions, even into firetraps—and some children are not even able to go to school at all—because we have not yet agreed to bring our educational system up to par in all parts of the country.

What does this have to do with our role in the international situation? A very great deal. Nearly everybody in this country is the product, to a controlling degree, of what he got out of our public educational system. The extent to which he can judge the ideological questions in the world rests in large measure on what contribution our public schools made to him. The business, industrial, and professional caliber of our country is directly related to what the people in these occupations gained through our public schools. And, most important, the American fighting man of today is just about as good as the public education he got.

Let us look at the picture of the Nation's health today. Let us consider the people who too often live in fear of sudden, serious illness because they fear the costs of medical and hospital care; people who have put off going to the doctor because of their financial worries; people who have died needlessly, not because science could not cure them but because our society is not yet set up to allow science to cure them.

Some of the unions in your great organization have tackled this problem head-on through union health programs. But they know from experience that there are limits to their gains in this direction through collective bargaining—that a universal system is needed to accomplish the national job. Today the overwhelming majority of the people in this country are not financially able to cope with serious or chronic disease—in this very country where medical research and medical practice have pushed further than anywhere else to the outer limits of good health.

Can we afford to ignore this problem—in its individual human terms or in the national interest? Of course not.

Is anything more important to the role of America in the international picture than the health of our people? Is anything in actual warfare more important than a healthy, energetic labor force at home turning out the weapons and equipment for healthy, robust American fighting men at the front? The decision in international conflict could well turn on the physical well-being of the workers in war plants and of the fighting men using their products.

We can debate, perhaps, the timing and the priorities which we may give to our solutions of this problem. But we must recognize—and proclaim—that good health of the American people—a social necessity in peacetime—is a critical weapon in wartime.

We cannot afford to surrender now to apostles of reaction who have formed an unholy alliance to destroy the very principles of American humanity and national security. Today we are confronted by such an alliance, spearheaded by one profession, but joined in by every misanthropic force in America and by a large number of well-meaning people who are allowing themselves to be roped into something they cannot really believe in.

The American Medical Association has allocated the sum of $1,110,000—a sum amassed by a compulsory levy on the doctors of this country—for a concentrated advertising campaign in the week of October 8 that will reach into the daily newspapers, the national magazines, and the radio stations of the United States. On the advice of its public-relations counselors, this campaign will be supplemented by a so-called tie-in advertising—to an amount reported to run as high as $19,000,000—chipped in by business firms, manufacturers, patent-medicine companies, insurance companies, railroads, and power companies.

That adds up to a very large sum of money—$20,000,000—to be spent on a single concentrated week of hammering at the minds of the American people. It would make a cigarette company lick its chops with advertising jealousy.

Since the AMA alone is putting up, in one single gesture, so large a sum as $1,110,000, we could perhaps assume that its aim is to improve the quality of medical care in America. What, for instance, would this money buy in the interest of better health?

It could pay for a brand-new general hospital.

It could pay for 11 completely equipped health centers.

It could finance research in a disease like multiple sclerosis, which is considered incurable today for the simple reason that we do not know enough about its cause, prevention, or cure. Since 1946, only $500,000 have been raised for research in this disease—which afflicts between 75,000 and 100,000 people each year. A million dollars from the AMA might very possibly help cure thousands of these sufferers.

Or it might pay for training hundreds of heart specialists, at a time when we have in this country only one such specialist for every 2,600 heart cases—and when 600,000 people die every year from this disease alone.

A million dollars from the American Medical Association could put some 2,000 young scientists through 2-year fellowships in universities or hospitals for advanced medical research.

Possibly it would help solve the problem of synthesizing and using cortisone, or it could push forward research in cerebral palsy or polio, or, in these times of tension, it could help develop blood substitutes and improve our defenses against biological warfare.

At a time when we are confronted with a dreadful shortage of medical personnel, it could put 500 additional medical students through 4 years of medical school—or it could be invested at 4 percent, and the interest would pay the tuition for 75 new medical students each year.

Yes; $1,110,000 could do many useful things. It is a pretty big piece of cash, and the AMA must have a truly inspiring—a truly essential—advertising message if it has, after due consideration, decided to spend that much money on a single project. What, then, is the message of all these advertisements? I will tell you that message, but, first, I ask that every one of you—and every thinking American—study the advertisements when they appear, for the doctors' trade association has given much thought to them, and it has determined on them as the best way to spend its millions during this time of crisis.

I have seen the copy of some of these advertisements. They are a tribute to the shrewd skill of the professional propagandist. These professional propagandists set up the imaginary target of socialized medicine—which nobody in this country wants—and sail into the target with fists flying. You and I, perhaps, marvel at the extravagance of this campaign in a period when we are supposed to be tightening our belts—the extravagance and waste of spending as much as $20,000,000 to fight something that nobody is for.

It's ridiculous—or is it? Not if the real reason for this campaign is to vilify every progressive idea in this country. These professional propagandists haul out the old and exploded labels of welfare state and socialism and Government control. These professional propagandists seek to undermine the whole social program that the American people have approved for the past 17 years. These professional propagandists serve the medical profession poorly, but they serve the reactionary forces in American politics very well, indeed, and they make us wonder: Is there a doctor in the lobby?

It is time we dragged these facts out in the open. When so many millions of dollars are being spent to achieve such a purpose, there is no reason for us to be dainty and delicate about it. There is something significant about the fact that this campaign is concentrated on the week of October 8, just before the crucial elections in November. There is something significant about the way in which every reactionary special interest in the country has rallied round the AMA at this particular moment, waving their checkbooks as though they were the new banners of freedom.

The plain fact is that the powerful men who run the American Medical Association are using their organization to promote the political ends of reaction. They have created the 1950 war chest of reaction.

Here is what the president of the AMA, Dr. Elmer L. Henderson, told the house of delegates in San Francisco last June: "We doctors are proud of the work we have done, and there has been no attempt at concealment of either our objectives or the methods we have used to achieve these objectives. Out of medicine's campaign has come a great public crusade, not only to save the freedom in medical practice, but to protect all the basic freedoms of the American people and to stop the march of state socialism in this country." (As you very well know, the Communists are not the only ones who use a double-talking Aesopian language; the reactionaries have their own Aesopian language, too, and when they say "state socialism," they do not mean socialism at all, but rather every progressive social idea that has been accepted by honest-to-God Americans since 1933.)

All over the Nation, Dr. Henderson continued, doctors are campaigning actively for candidates whose convictions (and I quote) "square with sound American principles, and are just as actively opposing those men in public life who are espoused to the alien philosophy of socialization." Translated from the Aesopian language of the reactionaries, this simply means that the AMA has tried to mobilize doctors in a drive to defeat every liberal-minded candidate for office this year, and to elect reactionary, backward-looking, labor-hating candidates in their place.

Who in this country has been more active than the AMA in distributing copies of that notorious primer of reaction, John T. Flynn's book The Road Ahead? They have passed out a million copies so far, with the blessing and cooperation of the even more notorious Committee for Constitutional Government—an organization that I suggest our doctors learn at least as much about as did the congressional committee which has been investigating its malodorous behavior.

Yes, I repeat my invitation to every American who thinks for himself to read these ads and study every word of them. Let him see for himself what the American Medical Association—at a time when we are committed by blood in Korea and by determination throughout the world to fight for human freedom—let him see what the AMA thinks is truly important.

With apologies—very deep apologies—to James Whitcomb Riley, I have an adaptation of one of his poems that I think fits this case well. I call it The Song of the AMA, and it is dedicated to the public relations team of Whitaker & Baxter, an old labor-hating couple who handle the AMA account at $100,000 a year. Here it is:

"Whitaker & Baxter's come to our house to stay,
An' write the ads and copy up, an' brush the truth away,
An' shoo the Fair Deal off the porch, an' scare the folks, an' weep,
An' write a speech, an' hate the Reds, an' earn their board an' keep;
An' all us other people, when the daily work is done,
We set around the kitchen fire an' has the mostest fun
A-list'nin' to the witch-tales 'at doctors tell about,
An' the welfare state 'at gits you
Ef you don't watch out!

"An' Whitaker & Baxter say, when the blaze is blue,
An' the lampwick sputters, an' the wind goes woo-oo!
An' you hear the crickets quit, an' the moon is gray,
An' the lightnin'-bugs in dew is all squenched away—
You better mind yer doctors, when they enter politics,
An' churish them 'at bill you, an' let them git their licks,
An' trust their propaganda stuff 'at clusters all about,
Er the welfare state'll git you
Ef you don't watch out!"

This would normally have been a time when, in all decency, the doctors' trade association might have been concerning itself with the dreadful shortage of medical personnel. During the past few weeks, the entire public has been revolted by the awful significance of that shortage. We have had to resort to a draft law in order to make sure that we will have medical personnel in sufficient quantities for the needs of our Armed Forces. This is no new shortage. I myself have warned about it for years. So have many, many others. We have tried to find a solution to this shortage, which is in large part caused by the bottleneck in medical education—caused by the fact that our medical schools are financially unable to expand their student bodies. We have proposed Federal aid to medical education, which would make it possible for medical schools to produce hundreds and perhaps thousands of new doctors. Four times this proposal has come up in congressional committees, and four times has been voted down.

Who is against this program? The people? No. The soldiers and sailors and airmen and marines of our Armed Forces? No. Labor? No. The medical schools themselves? No; their deans came to Congress and pleaded for it. The 17,000 young men and women who this year applied to three or four medical schools each, but could not get in because there was no room for them? No. Does the American Hospital Association oppose it? No. The American Dental Association? No. Any Member of the United States Senate? No; it was passed by the Senate unanimously last year. Only one pressure group in America opposes Federal aid to medical education—and that group is the American Medical Association, which has been powerful enough so far to kill the plan in the House of Representatives.

Why are they against Federal aid to medical education? Well, they claim, it will mean Federal control of medical education. Is that true? Of course not. Do the deans of the medical schools believe it? Ask them: their answer is no. Do you believe it? Of course not. Does the AMA itself believe it? I doubt it.

But they say they believe it, because they do not want to admit that the only conceivable reason for their opposition is that it would give the American people the number of doctors we ought to have. I will tell you what the newly awakened apostles of free enterprise are afraid of. They are afraid of free enterprise. They are afraid of competition. They are afraid of having the proportion of doctors which this country, in God's name, ought to have.

I cannot believe that the average doctor really understands what is being done in his name—that he honestly wants his professional organization to follow in the footsteps of the know-nothings of the last century—of the American Liberty League, of the Committee for Constitutional Government, of Merwin K. Hart and his prejudiced, labor-baiting subscribers—of the whole bund of bewildered bigots who would sell the country's stake in human progress and security for the sake of their own pocketbooks.

I cannot believe that the average doctor—whatever he may think about national health insurance—wants to be sold down the river to the most reactionary forces in this country. I cannot believe that he wants to promote suspicion and division in our land at the very time when national unity is our crying need.

I believe that, in the field of health, we must now give high priority to increasing our output of doctors. That is what the AMA ought to be thinking about on October 8—instead of wasting its efforts on a futile attempt to turn back the clock.

Yes, the fight for progress goes on. We will wage this fight together, and we will win it together. Just as we shall in the end restore peace and freedom to the people of Korea, just as we shall in the end achieve a world where men feel free and safe and hopeful, so here at home we shall keep on building a progressive America dedicated to freedom, security, and happiness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I cannot let this session close without a tribute to our majority leader, the senior Senator from Illinois. Under the severe handicap of a strenuous campaign for reelection, Senator LUCAS has done an excellent job in getting enacted all the necessary legislation. Not only has the usual peacetime program been enacted but he has also pushed through extremely important and complicated legislation essential to the prosecution of the Korean war and the strengthening of our Armed Forces.

Senator LUCAS, better than anyone I know, is well suited by temperament and ability to reconcile the diverse elements in the Democratic Party and bring about by wise adjustments legislative results which are sound and absolutely necessary to the welfare of our country.

Mr. President, we all owe a great debt to SCOTT LUCAS for the fine leadership he has given us, and I, for one, sincerely wish him success in his battle for reelection.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me over the American Broadcasting Co. network on September 21, 1950:

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow citizens, let me explain at the outset that William M. Boyle, Jr., chairman of the Democratic National Committee, has asked me to speak to you tonight. Chairman Boyle himself had planned to talk to you about the issues of the campaign which is now underway, but the sudden pressure of duties in Washington prevents him from coming into your homes to visit with you. I think he's doing a great job for the Democrats, and I'm glad to do a small one for him.

As chairman of the Democratic senatorial campaign committee, I am grateful to the American Broadcasting Co. for making available this 15-minute period tonight so that we may discuss the political situation together. As free Americans, citizens in the world's greatest democracy, we have no more important subject to consider than the workings of our democratic processes and the stand of parties and candidates on public issues.

Each of us has an obligation to himself or herself, to our country, and to the world, to study carefully the questions of policy and the positions of responsibility that are at stake in the election on November 7 and to participate fully in the decisions that will be made at the polls. Those decisions will affect the daily lives and welfare of every one of us.

The Democratic Party is conducting this campaign on the record of its past achievements and the constructive program to which it is now committed.

After almost 18 years under which the Democratic Party has had the responsibility of government, this country is enjoying the greatest and most widespread prosperity in the entire history of the world. Our people have the highest standard of living that any people have ever experienced anywhere at any time in the history of the world. Doesn't that tell quite a story in itself?

But we are living in an unsettled and dangerous world and in a critical time in the history of mankind. Our future, which can be brighter than any we have yet known or dreamed of, is still for us to win. And each of us must play his full part if we are to achieve it.

I can tell you that President Truman's one thought, one hope, one prayer is that we can find and lead the way to a just and lasting peace in the world. Under his guidance and with the overwhelming support of the people, our country has chosen the only road to eventual peace. It is the route of firm resistance to determined Communist aggression and of mutual cooperation with the free nations of the world.

President Truman's prompt and courageous attack and denunciation of those who would disturb the peace of the world, his condemnation of Reds for leading the Communists against the Republic of Korea, has united the free nations and inspired the people with new hope. Our boys who are fighting in Korea under the banner of the United Nations are doing more than again writing a glorious chapter in military annals. History may yet record that their sacrifices have saved humanity from a new and terrible world war by serving notice that we, with other peace-loving peoples in the United Nations, are determined that there must be no more easy conquests of Manchuria, such as the world saw in the early thirties, no more invasions of Ethiopia at a dictator's whim, that armed aggression against world peace will be met by armed resistance whenever and wherever it occurs. If our goal of a just and secure peace can be achieved, the way will be open for a new and enriching er.. of progress and prosperity in America.

But if we are to realize fully the bright promise of the future, we must continue to have a Government which believes in progress and which is devoted to the welfare of our people. We should never forget that one of the three purposes for which this Union was formed—as set forth explicitly in the Constitution—is to promote the common welfare. This is an objective that too frequently has been lost sight of during the past 80 or 90 years. Some of our opponents even sneer at the word "welfare" and at one time they attempted to use it as a term of reproach against the Democratic administration. They cried out against the welfare state. They have some new slogans now, but they are not much better.

Our Democratic Party is, and always has been, the party of progress—the party of the people. President Truman has well described it as the party of the main stream of American life.

We are proud of our stewardship.

Since March 4, 1933, our party has enacted the greatest program of progressive and constructive legislation this country has ever known. Let me mention only some of the high spots in that record of achievement for the people.

There is the social-security system, created by Congress over bitter Republican opposition. This law has been improved by the present Eighty-first Congress to cover millions of additional men and women and to provide greatly increased benefits.

There is rural electrification, which has lightened the work and enriched the lives of hundreds of thousands of farm families. We established the Tennessee Valley Authority, which has benefited those it serves and gives guidance to public-power developments all over the entire country. TVA power made possible our great expanded production of aluminum for airplanes during the World War and, as well, contributed enormously to the production of the atom bomb.

The Democratic Party was responsible for the enactment of a farm-price-support program to assure to our millions of farm families a fair share of the national income.

We adopted the Wagner Labor Relations Act to protect workers and their rights to organize for collective bargaining. The Democrats are now fighting for new and better labor legislation to replace the Taft-Hartley Act and return some of the more just provisions of the Wagner Act. We established a minimum-wage scale, and the Eighty-first Congress has raised the floor under wages to 75 cents an hour.

We have instituted, pressed, and seen blossom into being great reclamation projects to develop the resources of the West.

We launched a housing program which saved more than a million homes from mortgage foreclosure, enabled millions of others to own their own homes through the assistance of Federal home-loan organizations, and provide as well in other neighborhoods low-rent homes in place of slum tenements for low-income families.

Every segment of our society—farmers, workers, consumers, and businessmen—have shared in the national prosperity which has been promoted by these and other progressive policies of Government.

The work of the Senate in the Eighty-first Congress typifies the manner in which the Democratic administration has fought to serve all segments of our national life. In every field, from foreign relations to farm policy, the Senate thought and actions have been dedicated to bringing about an enduring strength that will enable us to meet our national and international responsibilities.

Senate accomplishments toward strengthening our farm structure were notable. We gave Commodity Credit the right to help the farmer buy, build, or rent storage for his crops. We raised the minimum levels at which basic farm commodities would be supported. We approved the principle of giving the Secretary of Agriculture added discretion to support other nonbasic items. We put crop insurance on a sound business basis and permitted production disaster loans. On the long-range front, we made provisions for restoring depleted grazing lands and for reforestation of old forest areas. This Democratic Party of ours really believes in looking and moving ahead.

Another critical problem—housing—came under serious consideration in the Senate. The result was approval of far-seeing legislation, designed to improve both urban and rural living conditions. Extension of rent control was approved, with provisions for fair treatment to both tenants and landlords.

The Senate—and the whole Congress—moved to meet growing problems in our educational system. It authorized supplements to aid State governments in expanding and modernizing facilities, on the principle of giving the most money to areas where there was the most need.

A National Science Foundation was approved to insure that our national position will not be undermined by lack of new developments in any field.

In line with the Democratic position that we must take all possible steps to keep our economy both flexible and expanding, the Senate authorized $100,000,000 to aid local and State governments in undertaking and planning public works, and recommended that they maintain a backlog of projects ready for immediate inauguration if economic developments made it desirable.

In the field of international affairs, the Congress approved the Marshall plan and I am proud of the part the Democrats played in beating down all efforts to cripple it with amendments. It agreed to the North Atlantic Pact, binding 12 free nations into a defensive alliance, and to military assistance of those nations dedicated to the purpose of the United Nations Charter by creating a system of collective self-defense among free countries. The record of how the Democrats in the Senate and House stood by the President in these notable efforts to strengthen the free world is inspiring. I think it is likely to be the factor on which the November elections may swing—and, of course, swing in our direction. Conditions in the House of Representatives races are not familiar to me, but I expect the Democrats to hold their present Senate membership and add from two to four seats.

At the outbreak of the fighting in Korea, necessity caused the Congress to revise its legislative program. Recognizing the need for quick but wise action, it wrote the Defense Production Act of 1950, designed to absorb the shock of a strongly increased defense machine without disrupting the internal economy. Earlier, it had approved unification of the services and the establishment of a radar fence around the Nation.

There were many other accomplishments by the Senate and Eighty-first Congress completing a proud record of intelligent service to the immediate welfare and for the security of the entire Nation.

We must all redouble our efforts now to make sure that we have a Congress that will support the President and will press forward along constructive lines.

Democracy does not begin at the top. Democracy begins with the people and it can function only if the people make known their opinion and their wishes.

We urge every one of you—every man and woman—to register and to vote in November. Now, more than at any time in our history, we should exercise this basic right of citizenship. We should vote in November, not only to strengthen our own Government, but in order to show all of the peoples of the world—yes, even those behind the iron curtain—that our system of democracy is strong and virile.

The Republicans seem anxious to make Korea the issue. We will meet them on that ground. Back of the events in Korea stretches the long history of world leadership by American Presidents—who happened to be Democrats—as they sought world peace.

On that page is written the name of Woodrow Wilson and his struggle with a little handful of willful men over the League of Nations.

On that page is written the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt who had seen the failure of Wilson's dream and set himself to achieve a better outcome. He took the leadership for the United Nations and he lived almost long enough to see it take form.

But until the name of Harry S. Truman was written on that page, the United Nations had form, but little else. Was it to die? Was it to lie crumbled in the dust where other attempts toward world federation had fallen?

President Truman said, "No." He breathed life into that inert form. He saw that world-wide aggression must be stopped if civilization itself was to survive the perils of an atomic age. He saw—more clearly than any man I know—that if aggression was to be stopped, it could only be stopped by many nations acting together. He laid his cause before the United Nations.

His action was consistent with his whole foreign policy. By the Truman doctrine, he had brought strength to those who resisted communism in Greece and Turkey. By the Marshall plan, he had encouraged the free peoples of western Europe. By the Berlin airlift, he had lifted up the morale of those Germans who did not want their land overrun by the hordes of Communist Russia. By the North Atlantic Pact, the military-assistance program, and the point-4 plan, he had continued to lay stone on stone in the structure of strength for a free world.

I say to you tonight that the Democratic Party is ready to meet the Republican Party on any battleground that its leaders can agree upon. They are divided on social security, divided on isolationism, divided on the virtues of slander, divided on the path to peace.

We, at least, know where we are going at home and abroad.

But we will need the help of forward-looking voters in every city and crossroads of our Nation. We plead that you hold fast to the gains already achieved and stand beside President Truman as he leads us onward to a peaceful world.

Scare Buying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. DAVIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the American people are aware of the disastrous results which will follow if hoarding and scare buying occur on a large scale in this country. On August 14, 1950, the Lithonia Exchange Club, of Lithonia, Ga., adopted a resolution urging that in this period of crisis everyone assist in keeping down inflation and preventing scarcities by refusing to purchase on a hoarding or scare-buying basis.

This resolution is in keeping with the prevailing sentiment in the Fifth Congressional District of Georgia. The Lithonia Exchange Club is to be commended for its action in adopting this resolution.

Under leave previously granted, I insert this resolution herewith as a part of my remarks:

This organization urges that all citizens be level-headed Americans: Freedom is everybody's job. Hoarding and scare buying is unnecessary. It causes the sort of damage to our economy which the enemies of our way of life want.

We are unpatriotic if we hoard. A rush to buy any item forces prices up. This causes excessive spending for living commodities. It produces scarcities and inflation. It is costly and dangerous.

There is no basis for hoarding and panic buying. Such action is stupid and foolish. We deeply regret there exists those in our community, our State who will aid the enemy of America by stocking up on items they believe may be in short supply if we go to war. Therefore this organization respectfully requests that those leaders in top positions in city, State, and National Government take what necessary steps are necessary to curtail hoarding, profiteering, and inflation.

We ask that everyone think clearly and do all he can to aid our fighting forces now involved in battle in Korea.

We also urge that our leaders take any necessary steps to again place into action the various set-ups to safeguard our home front. Civilian defense is important. Much can be accomplished by an organized, disciplined group of men and women striving for protection of our friends, neighbors, and homes.

That the leaders might know that the good people of Lithonia, Ga., are pledged to aid the war effort in every manner possible, to buy only what they need, and to be available in time of emergency, we, the Exchange Club of Lithonia, accept these resolutions and vote their immediate adoption.

Speech of Hon. Aaron Jacoby, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Nominating Hon. Walter A. Lynch for Governor, at the Convention of the Democratic Party in Rochester, N. Y, September 7, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, one of our colleagues, the Honorable WALTER A. LYNCH, has become the Democratic nominee for the governorship of the great State of New York. He is well known by everyone in the House and deeply revered and admired by the Members on both sides of the aisle.

Personally, I have never met any individual whose every thought, word, and deed was more deeply colored than his by the spirit of human love in all its highest manifestations. He is a tender husband, a devoted father, and a true and steadfast friend. His nature is too generous and tolerant to countenance sectional prejudice, partisan rancor, or sectarian bigotry. One of the happiest moments of his life was when he, a practicing Christian, was presented with the good-citizen award by the American Jewish Congress in recognition of his patriotism and zeal in sponsoring legislation to maintain and protect the blessings of democracy in the spirit of American liberalism.

Good nature, humility, and benevolence radiate from him as light and warmth radiate from the sun. I want to personally testify to that fact. When I first arrived a stranger in Washington in the cold and bleak February of 1949, I found in WALTER LYNCH a mentor and a guide to the practical know-how of getting things done in Washington. His sage advice, his homely wisdom, and his expert knowledge of Washington techniques have been freely extended to and eagerly sought after by his colleagues. It was with extreme pleasure that I supported the nomination in the Democratic convention of WALTER A. LYNCH as Governor of New York State.

I request that the speech of Mr. Aaron L. Jacoby nominating Congressman LYNCH be inserted in the RECORD:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the convention, by the favor of my colleagues I speak for the united and militant democracy of Kings County. Brooklyn, the impregnable citadel of democracy has given to Democratic standard bearers of yesteryear majorities ranging from 250,000 to upward of 500,000. Brooklyn assures to the nominees of this convention that it will do all that within its power lies to match the latter figure.

We foregather in this delightful presence in response to a mandate of the enrolled Democrats of our great State. The tasks that devolve upon this convention are serious and sacred. Here we shall select not only the Democratic candidate for governor, but indeed the next Governor of New York.

On November 7 next the electorate will ratify overwhelmingly the action of this convention. They will do so cheerfully because they trust the Democratic Party and approve its candidates. They will do so eagerly because they believe in our party's philosophy and the political program which we have evolved to give that philosophy force and effect.

The government of the State of New York must be restored to the people.

The people know that during the 20 years of uninterrupted Democratic leadership in Albany our State was in the vanguard of the forward march of social progress and political reform. Under the leadership of the three greatest governors in the history of any commonwealth, the great Empire State acquired a heart and a soul. Under their leadership the State succored the distressed and aided the needy. It provided for the mentally ill and physically ill, the orphan and the widow, the unemployed, and the aged. The record offers undisputed and eloquent testimony of our party's devotion to the public weal.

Almost all major achievements in labor, social, liberal, and progressive legislation have issued from Democratic leadership. The old-age pension law, the Widow's Pension Act, the social-security law, the unemployment insurance law, State Labor Relations Act, Antilabor Injunction Act, State Mediation Act, the State housing and slum clearance law, the savings bank-life insurance law, the public utility regulation law. These are but a few from the endless catalog. They recite only some of the goals attained by the Democratic governors, beginning with the "Happy Warrior," Alfred E. Smith. He blazed a trail for others to follow. Unfailingly devoted to his State and those who dwell within its borders, he gave unstintedly of himself. He was followed by the greatest exponent of social reform in political annals, Franklin D. Roosevelt. The governorship of the State of New York was but a proving ground for him. His unsurpassed record as President of these United States will serve as a shining example worthy of emulation to any who may one day occupy the White House.

During one of the most critical periods of our national life, while the world was engaged in bitter conflict, HERBERT H. LEHMAN, as Governor of the State of New York, labored with unflinching courage and unflagging zeal to give New York a humane and business administration. His term of office was marked by a reduction in the cost of government by $100,000,000 and upon his departure from the governorship there was a surplus of $54,000,000 in the treasury of the State.

We must follow in this tradition—Smith, Roosevelt, and Lehman—an American epic—America at work.

Smith, Roosevelt, and Lehman—what a wealth of rich connotation. Each of a different religious persuasion. Americans all three in pursuit of American ideals.

Today the burden placed upon this convention is to select one worthy of their honored names.

When we reflect upon conditions as they exist today, more particularly in benighted lands lashed by distant seas, our duty becomes increasingly clear. Half the world is engulfed in a night of ignorance and fear. Official crime flourishes. The authority of brute force is supreme. Right is crushed beneath the iron chariots of power. Parts of the world are peopled by slaves and masters. War clouds are gathering. The ideals and principles of American democracy are to these Communist-victimized countries are as a star of indescribable glory shining through the clouds of storm-rent skies upon a sea of blood. The Communist enslaved cry out to us in unmistakable syllables to bring to them some measure of relief. These cries are a warning to us to beware. There is danger, too, that our own liberties may be threatened; that our own way of life may be destroyed.

The immortal spirits whose hands guided the infant steps of this Republic, whose blood consecrated and made our liberty's dearest shrine and religious freedom's most sacred altar, cry out to us in whose hands the further destinies of this Republic have been lodged to keep the faith, to carry on, to hold high the banners of democracy.

Our National Government is meeting the challenge boldly.

The times demand that our own State government be in complete harmony and accord with our national administration. It is essential to the proper prosecution of our country's day-to-day responsibilities that a sympathetic State government be restored to Albany.

The times require rare qualities of leadership.

We know one who meets the test.

We urge upon this convention the selection of one who through the years, in season and out of season, in storm and in fair weather has given of himself wholeheartedly to the service of his State and country. Neither the baubles of wealth, nor the prestige of power and position have any allurements for him. Modest, self-effacing, he moves with a quiet dignity and acts most effectively. Diligent, resourceful, conscientious, and painstaking, he has made incalculable contributions toward the betterment of our society.

The product of our teeming city, his formal education was completed at Fordham University School of Law. Such were his achievements at the bar, that early in his professional career he was appointed a New York City magistrate. In 1938 his exceptional talents served him and the State of New York most fruitfully as a delegate to the New York State Constitutional Convention. His abilities and contributions as a member of the convention whose labors were directed toward a revision of our State constitution, attracted wide attention. As a consequence he was urged to stand for election as a candidate for Congress.

As a member of the Banking and Currency Committee in the early days of his congressional career, he labored tirelessly in the preparation of legislation to curtail inflation and was a most effective advocate of price and rent controls. Perhaps he was persuaded by causes and reasons other than those that occur to one as obvious. Could it be that he was aware of the sacrifice that the flower of our youth were called upon to make in those bitter, trying, uncertain years? Could it be that as the husband of a woman who gave her only two sons to the service of their country—one as a captain in the Air Force and another as an ensign in the United States Navy, that he was unwittingly or subconsciously activated toward this end?

Later he won high praise for his labors as a member of the Special Commitee on Postwar Economic Policy and Planning and served as chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Works and Construction. He was unanimously selected by the House Democrats to serve on the important Ways and Means Committee in 1943 and has been a most useful member since then.

He has won the lasting gratitude of myriads who ask little legislative aid in the conflict of life because of his generous and intelligent consideration of their well-being, as revealed by his leadership in preparing legislation for broader coverage under social security and unemployment insurance. He was responsible for the inclusion of the maritime workers in the unemployment-insurance program. Due to his incessant labors 11,000,000 more of our citizens were added to the rolls of those who are to enjoy the benefits of social security. One and one-half million people in our own State will be the direct beneficiaries of his unceasing efforts on their behalf.

Almost single-handed he fought against the inclusion of the antilabor Knowland amendment to the Social Security Act. He alone of the 12 conferees refused to sign the conference report on the social-security bill because it excluded total and permanent disability insurance. He was chairman of the subcommittee which considered a measure for the taxation of life-insurance companies which since 1947 have paid no income taxes. As a result of a formula devised by him, the coffers of the Federal Treasury would be enriched by some $163,000,000.

His greatness lies in the deep strength of his humanities. His deep religiosity and the catholicity of his nature move him to broad, generous humanitarian impulses. He was presented with the good citizen award by the American Jewish Congress "in recognition of his patriotism and zeal in sponsoring legislation to maintain and protect the blessings of democracy in the spirit of American liberalism; his devotion to the well-being of his fellow citizens, without regard to race, creed, or position, in his endeavors for the social, philanthropic, and spiritual advancement of the community."

Brooklyn commends to the favorable consideration of this convention one who will lead the forces of democracy into battle unafraid, for the achievement of those goals, to which we have directed our talents and energies and engaged our hearts and minds.

Confident that he will so acquit himself as to earn the favor and deserve the approval and approbation of a grateful and discriminating citizenry, Brooklyn is honored to nominate for governor, a brilliant lawyer, able judge, distinguished legislator, stalwart Democrat, sterling American—Congressman WALTER A. LYNCH.

One of America's Worst Security Risks

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement in regard to what I consider one of America's worst security risks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

American industry is being forced to produce vital war material, including some of our top-secret military and naval weapons, in plants under the complete domination of the Communists.

Some of the largest industrial concerns in this country, as well as hundreds of smaller ones, are compelled by law to bargain collectively with a union whose leaders have been officially declared enemies of the United States.

These industrial establishments produce weapons, instruments, and materials which are vital to the defense of the United States.

The Communist-led union with which they are compelled to bargain collectively is the United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America, hereinafter referred to simply as the UE.

Seven UE officials were recently cited for contempt of Congress for refusing to say, under oath, whether or not they are Communists. Among the seven were the two top undisputed bosses of the UE, James Matles, who holds the position of UE director of organization, and Julius Emspak, who is UE general secretary-treasurer. Despite this UE record of defiance of the Congress of the United States, industrial concerns—large and small—are compelled by the procedures of the National Labor Relations Board to bargain with these UE leaders.

Almost a year ago, the UE was expelled from the CIO on the ground that it is a Communist-dominated organization. The resolution of expulsion, adopted on November 2, 1949, declared: "We can no longer tolerate within the family of CIO the Communist Party masquerading as a labor union." Stronger language has never been used to indict the UE. The representatives of this union, which has been declared by a responsible labor union federation to be nothing more than a mask for the Communist Party, are supported by the United States Government in their right to sit at the bargaining table with the representatives of responsible American industries.

In urging the expulsion of the UE from the CIO, Philip Murray who did an excellent job in this respect, declared: "They—the UE Communist leaders—dare not stand upon their dirty feet and give any expression of opposition to anything that the Soviets are doing. They are inbred with a feeling of hatred against democratic institutions and democratic countries. * * * They would spread their doctrine of fear and hatred among the people of the United States. * * * If our country were engulfed in another war—and God forbid that it ever should be—they would go underground and undermine the people of the United States of America and this Government of ours. * * * Their allegiances are pledged to a foreign government." These words were not spoken by any "labor-baiting, union-busting Wall Street reactionary." They were the measured words of an outraged leader of organized labor. This CIO action is encouraging proof that responsible labor leaders are exerting Samsonian efforts to destroy Communist influence in labor unions.

Nevertheless, the representatives of Westinghouse, General Electric, and Sylvania are called upon by law-enforcement agencies to sit at the bargaining table with traitors of the stripe depicted in the colorful, but wholly accurate, language of Philip Murray.

Letting loose a final blast against the UE leaders, Philip Murray declared: "This is not a fight over trade-unionism, and these hypocrites who pretend to tell you that it is a fight over trade-union policies are lying—they are lying out of their mouths, and they are lying out of the pits of their dirty bellies, and they know it."

If Philip Murray was right in declaring that the issue was not one of trade-unionism or trade-union policies, and if the CIO convention was correct in describing the UE as "the Communist Party masquerading as a labor union," why must the NLRB treat the UE as a bona fide labor union? Why must industrialists negotiate collective-bargaining contracts with traitors under the fiction that they are negotiating with honest labor-union representatives?

This country is now engaged in a war, a war that may any day assume global proportions. Our entire national policy is, presumably, in the process of being geared to the possibility that world war III is not far off. At the heart of our American hopes and confidence lies the belief in our ability to outproduce any power or combination of powers which may decide to make war against us. Short in manpower though we may be, we believe that we are long in industrial resources.

We shall be negligent beyond belief if we continue to permit traitors to hold the leadership of hundreds of thousands of men and women who are employed in industries which are vital to our defense and even to our continued existence as a free people.

To illustrate the strategic importance of the electrical industry in which the UE is recognized as a collective-bargaining agency, let us take the billion-dollar corporation, the General Electric Co.

During World War II General Electric produced more war materials, including electronic devices and instruments which are beyond the comprehension of the layman, than any other industrial establishment in this country. A mere listing of these materials, devices, and instruments would contain words which are unintelligible to the average American. Not only is the highest scientific skill and efficiency required for their production—to say nothing of the miracles of industrial management—but the unqualified loyalty of all those engaged in their manufacture is an absolute prerequisite. Any sabotage which produces a "dud" may mean loss of life among our fighting men at the battle front. Traitors and those who follow the leadership of traitors should be as far removed from the manufacture of these essential instruments of our national security as it is possible for government and management to remove them, whether this means to remove them from the assembly lines, the research laboratories, or the "collective-bargaining" table. One Klaus Fuchs is one traitor too many. One Julius Emspak or one James Matles is one tool of Moscow too many. One anonymous saboteur on the assembly line is one risk too many.

A few days ago, General Electric signed a collective-bargaining contract with the UE which covered some 45 of its plants and 37,000 of its employees. Although this contract was negotiated and concluded in compliance with the procedures of the NLRB, it was an agreement in which one of the contracting parties represented the interests of the Kremlin. To assume that a Communist-dominated union, such as the UE, represents the interests of the employees, management, the stockholders, or the United States is an inexcusable perversion of plain facts. If "the Communist Party masquerading as a labor union" cannot be tolerated in the family of CIO, why should it be tolerated inside the plants of General Electric, Sylvania, General Motors, Westinghouse, or the Radio Corp. of America?

The recently signed collective bargaining contract between the UE and General Electric covered the latter's giant plants at Schenectady, N. Y., and Erie, Pa., where the company is at present manufacturing such vital defense products as turbines, motors, ordnance, and electronics equipment.

In the General Electric plant at Lynn, Mass., not covered in this recent labor contract, there is a UE local with some 6,000 members. (The GE establishment at Lynn is now engaged in the manufacture of jet engines and radar equipment.) These 6,000 employees of General Electric follow the long-exposed leadership of the Communist Party masquerading under the guise of the UE. Contract or no contract, this UE local at Lynn, Mass., is a danger spot in national security.

Altogether, the UE today has from 200,000 to 250,000 members at work in the electrical industry of the United States.

Last spring, the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation warned a Senate subcommittee that the Communists have stepped up their activity in our basic industries, and he pointed specifically to the electrical industry as one of the places where this has occurred, remarking that "48 percent of the party membership is in the basic industry of this country, as in this manner they would be able to sabotage essential industry in vital defense areas in the event of a national emergency."

For a long time, it has been fashionable to condemn the Communist leadership of a union in one breath, and to flatter the rank and file of the same union in another breath by declaring that the latter are, of course, good and loyal Americans.

Today, however, the employees in the electrical industry have an alternative to the UE. It is no longer necessary for any reason whatsoever for them to follow and support the Communist leadership of the UE. The International Union of Electrical Workers, CIO, known as the IUE, is one of the employees' alternatives, wherever and whenever they wish to repudiate the UE agents of the Kremlin. The IUE is anti-Communist.

When 200,000 to 250,000 members continue to support the Matles-Emspak Communist machine of the UE, it is time to take another look at the alleged "solid Americanism" of the rank and file. It is no longer a matter of any serious dispute that the leadership of all the unions which have been expelled from the CIO owes its first and only allegiance to the masters of a foreign power which is bent on the destruction of the United States. The rank and file, in the UE or any other union, which supports such a treasonable leadership, must share the criminal responsibility adhering thereto, regardless of the alleged patriotism or ignorance of the rank and file.

There are no mitigating circumstances in the present state of world affairs. Innocence can no longer be claimed on grounds of ignorance.

The exposure of the UE as a Communist-dominated organization has been too complete to leave room for any doubts.

The most recently published volume of hearings of the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities, released the end of September 1950, contains overwhelming and conclusive proof of the Communist character of the UE.

One of the key witnesses in this latest exposure of the UE was Victor Decavitch. For almost 10 years, Decavitch was a member of the UE, rising eventually to the position of one of the UE international vice presidents by virtue of his position as president of UE district 7, which embraces Ohio and Kentucky.

As a member of the UE international executive board, Victor Decavitch had first-hand acquaintance with all the top leaders of the UE. As president of UE district 7, he knew all the Ohio and Kentucky field organizers and international representatives personally. He himself had signed up as member of the Communist Party. He was, therefore, in a position to testify of his own first-hand knowledge concerning the Communist leadership of the UE. In his sworn testimony, he said: "Within the UE—I am speaking of paid people working in UE today—they are 99.9 percent Communists. That is no exaggeration. That is basically the God's truth as far as the UE is concerned."

Earlier this year, Matt Cvetic also testified before the congressional Committee on Un-American Activities with respect to the Communist Party membership of the UE leaders in Pennsylvania. Cvetic was for many years an undercover agent of the FBI in Pittsburgh and, like Decavitch, was able to testify of his own first-hand knowledge that the UE leaders in his area were members of the Communist Party.

In previous congressional hearings such former UE officials as James Conroy, of New York, and S. M. Vottis, of Schenectady (both of whom were one-time members of the Communist Party), have helped to swell the immense volume of irrefutable evidence that the present UE leaders are traitors to their country.

The following paragraphs which give an account of the fraudulent beginning of UE Local 301 in Schenectady, N. Y., are based upon the sworn testimony of S. M. Vottis, who was speaking from first-hand knowledge.

UE Local 301 is among the most important in the entire union. Its membership, during World War II, reached the figure of some 27,000. Today there are about 13,000 employees of General Electric at Schenectady who are covered by the recently signed contract with the UE.

Julius Emspak, identified by Louis Budenz as the "Comrade Juniper" of the Communist Party, got his start in UE Local 301. Communist Leo Jandreau has been the big shot in the local's affairs for many years.

The fraud by which the Communists took over control of the union in the GE plant at Schenectady is illustrative of some of their unscrupulous tactics.

In May 1935 Israel Amter, then New York State chairman of the Communist Party, went to Schenectady, where he gathered a small group of GE employees and local Communists together to confer on strategy.

At this meeting Amter appointed Sadie Doran, local Communist Party organizer, to direct the strategy of taking over the union in the GE plant. She was in Schenectady until late in 1936 when the party sent Dorothy Loeb and Joseph Klein to replace her. In recent years, Dorothy Loeb has written the labor news column of the Daily Worker.

Later on the Schenectady Communists were told that they would receive their instructions on union matters from James Matles. In 1936, the Communist Party strength in Schenectady was a half-dozen active members, and the union had enrolled between 250 and 300 members in the GE plant. With this negligible strength, a half-dozen obscure employees set about to pit their force against a billion-dollar corporation.

After learning that approximately 3,500 dues-paying union members would be required, before the NLRB in Washington would authorize a collective bargaining election, the half-dozen Communist zealots sat down night after night to make out that many fraudulent union cards and dues receipts. They simply copied names and addresses from the telephone directories of the vicinity.

The NLRB then sent its representative, one John Moore, from Washington. Mr. Moore took a casual glance at the fraudulent cards and ordered an election. The Communists won the election, and from that time to the present day they have dominated the union local at the GE plant.

UE Local No. 301 at Schenectady is looked upon as something of the "mother local" throughout the UERMWA. Reliable witnesses report that the Communist Party has pursued a course of relentless determination to retain control of the local regardless of cost, having sent in scores of organizers and spent thousands of dollars whenever its grip seemed threatened. Probably no other industrial plant in the United States is more important to the national defense than the GE plant at Schenectady.

UE COMMUNISTS JAILED FOR DESECRATING AMERICAN FLAG

This country has penal statutes which forbid the desecration of the American flag by using it as a receptacle for the placing or depositing of money.

On many occasions, UE Communist leaders have shown their contempt for both the American flag and the penal statutes of the United States. This is not at all surprising in view of the fact that all Communists have only one loyalty, the Soviet Union.

Eight members of UE Local No. 441, Elizabeth, N. J., were found guilty of violating the statute which expressly forbids the use of the American flag as a receptacle for depositing money. Charles MacLaren, president of local No. 441, was among those found guilty of this offense. The others were Charles Pecukaities, Elmer Stafford, Wesley Mitchell, Walter Pidgeon, Bert Eckstein, Hadley Daggett, and William Karp.

In finding them guilty, Presiding Justice Henry H. Curran of Special Sessions in New York said: "This is a shocking and disgraceful way to use the American flag."

These UE leaders of local 441 were marching in the Communist May Day parade in New York City at the time of their violation of the statute respecting the American flag. (That fact alone is evidence enough of their Communist sympathies.) The eight of them carried a large American flag and shouted to spectators along the line of the Communist march to toss coins into it.

By the time they reached the end of the march in Union Square, the flag contained only $58.38 in coins, but these eight able-bodied men were allowing the center of the flag to drag in the dirt of the streets. They were promptly arrested by Patrolman Edward Cooley.

The penalty for this desecration of the flag ranges as high as 1 year in prison and a fine of $500.

Although he found all of the men guilty, Special Sessions Judge Curran sentenced only three of the ringleaders—MacLaren, Stafford, and Mitchell—to jail terms. The others received suspended sentences.

In pronouncing sentence, Judge Curran said: "Our flag is not merely a piece of cloth. Old Glory cannot be dragged in the dirt of the streets. Ordinary decency and respect would have prevented such an occurrence."

It is significant that most of these eight leaders of local 441 have had other affiliations with Communist enterprises than their marching in the Communist May Day parade. MacLaren, Stafford, Mitchell, Pidgeon, and Eckstein have sent greetings to the Communist Party's newspaper, the Daily Worker. Mitchell has also been affiliated with the Civil Rights Congress, a Communist-front organization which has been listed as subversive by the Attorney General of the United States.

UE LEADERS IN COMMUNIST PARTY CONVENTION

UE Local 601 (Westinghouse in East Pittsburgh) has made the charge that the following UE leaders were delegates to the national convention of the Communist Party in 1948:

John T. Bernard, legislative director of UE district 6, former Member of the House of Representatives and prominent in scores of Communist-front organizations.

William Bonafide, organizer of the Communist Party shop unit in local 409, Newark, N. J.

Neil Brandt, vice president of New Jersey Industrial Union Council and international representative of UE district 4.

Nat Cohen, executive board member of UE local 475 and former member of the national committee of the Communist Party.

David Davis, business agent of UE Local 155, Philadelphia, and member of the national committee of the Communist Party.

Julius Emspak, secretary-treasurer of the UERMWA and identified as "Comrade Juniper" by Louis Budenz.

William W. Hill, president of UE Local 130, Baltimore, Md.

John Leto, president of UE Local 103, Camden, N. J.

Robert Logsdon, international representative of UE district 8, St. Louis.

James Lustig, representative of UE district 4.

William E. Mauseth, organizer of UE district 12, Minnesota.

James McLeish, president of UE district 4.

William Sentner, president of UE district 8.

Ted Smorodin, representative of UE Local 103.

Edward Wiggan, representative of UE district 12, Minnesota.

Josephine Willard, executive board member of UE Local 203, Bridgeport, Conn.

Ruth Young, secretary-treasurer of UE district 4.

UE Local 601 challenged these 17 UE leaders to deny that they were delegates to the national convention of the Communist Party.

The charges of local 601 mean that more than 6 percent of the delegates to the last national convention of the Communist Party (1948) were leaders of the UERMWA. Out of a total of 275 delegates from all parts of the United States, 17 were UE leaders.

Aside from the salaried functionaries of the Communist Party (organizers, editors, secretaries, etc.) who naturally constituted the largest group of delegates, the UERMWA was the most largely represented organization in the 1948 national convention of the Communist Party.

It has been known for a long time that there are scores of officers and organizers on the UE payroll who are little or nothing more than Communist Party organizers masquerading as labor union functionaries. This disproportionate number of UE leaders who were delegates to the national convention of the Communist Party is striking confirmation of this knowledge. It must be borne in mind that only top Communist Party figures are delegates to the party's biennial convention.

The 1948 national convention of the Communist Party was the fourteenth in the history of the Communist Party in the United States. It was convened in the ballroom of the Riverside Plaza Hotel, West Seventy-third Street off Broadway, New York City, on the morning of August 3, 1948.

Every precaution was taken by the Communist Party to keep secret the identities of the 275 delegates to this biennial convention. Even well-known Communist Party figures were compelled to produce their credentials. The credentials committee was composed of Steve Nelson, Albert Lannon (real name Viteri), and Joseph Dougher. This credentials committee worked under the close supervision of Sidney Stein and Claudia Jones. At the close of each session, all records of attending delegates were impounded for the night and taken to the national headquarters of the Communist Party. During the night, they were watched over by special agents of the Russian MVD.

Despite these elaborate precautions, the identities of all the delegates are known to Government agencies and others.

UE SUPPORT OF CONVICTED COMMUNISTS

For the time being, the Communist Party has concentrated most of its attention upon the defense of its 11 convicted leaders. During and after the trial, the party has organized fronts, protests, and demonstrations to agitate for its leaders' release.

On June 3, Judge Medina sent three of the Communist defendants to jail for their contumacious conduct in court. The behavior of the defendants (and their counsel, too) was not a matter of hasty, ill-considered action. It was carefully planned and coolly calculated in an unsuccessful attempt to force Judge Medina to commit trial error. From the inception of the Communist movement, there has been a deliberate practice of bad courtroom behavior on the part of Communist defendants who are brought before the bar of "bourgeois" justice.

Henry A. Wallace was not such a complete and utter fool that he was wholly unaware of these Communist tactics, and his rush to denounce the court, therefore, meant only one thing, i. e., that Wallace has been made captive to the purposes of the Communist Party.

It becomes increasingly unlikely, with every passing week, that innocent "liberals" can be drawn into the mesh of Communist Party trickery. Consequently, those who are now letting out loud shrieks of indignation and anguish over the conviction of the 11 defendants may be catalogued as Communist Party members or the most willing of Communist Party tools. Period!

The following leaders of the UERMWA put the finger on themselves by their vehement attacks upon Judge Medina for his action in jailing the three Communist defendants in June:

Clarence Bingham, president of UE Local 810, St. Louis, Mo.

Fred Blycher, department chairman of UE Local 203, Bridgeport, Conn.

Ethel Carpenter, field organizer of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

David Davis, business representative of UE Local 155, Philadelphia, Pa.

Ernest DeMaio, president of UE district 11 and international vice president, Chicago, Ill.

John Dillon, chief steward of UE Local 448, Jersey City, N. J.

Charles Frank, delegate from UE Local 475, New York.

James Garry, business manager of UE Local 1227, New York.

Fred Haug, field organizer of UE district 7, Cleveland, Ohio.

Herbert Hirschberg, international representative of UE district 7, Cleveland, Ohio.

Sam Kanter, business agent of UE Local 475, New York.

Harry Kelner, field organizer of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

Koorken Koortbojian, business agent of UE Local 448, Jersey City, N. J.

Joseph Kres, business agent of Local 735, Cleveland, Ohio.

James Lustig, representative of UE district 4, New York.

Lucille Margolin, secretary of UE Local 209, Bridgeport, Conn.

Lem Markland, president of UE district 7, Cleveland, Ohio, and international vice president.

Dave Mates, representative of UE district 9, Detroit, Mich.

James McLeish, president of UE district 4 and international vice president.

Tom Neill, field organizer of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

Ernest Pollock, business agent of UE Local 437, Newark, N. J.

Talmadge Raley, representative of UE Local 766, Cleveland, Ohio.

Marie J. Reed, business agent of UE Local 735, Cleveland, Ohio.

Henry Rhine, international representative of UE district 1.

Tony Rodriguez, field organizer of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

Marcel Scherer, educational director of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

David Scribner, UE general counsel, New York, N. Y.

Joe Sheetz, president of UE Local 758, Cleveland, Ohio.

Joe Squires, secretary of the fair-practices committee of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

Al Stearn, business manager of UE Local 430, New York.

John Thomas, representative of UE Local 776, Cleveland, Ohio.

Sam Verano, field organizer of UE district 4, Newark, N. J.

Josephine Willard, member of executive board of UE Local 203, Bridgeport, Conn.

Jack Zucker, organizer of UE district 1.

A total of 34 leaders of this union who have publicly recorded themselves as Communist Party stooges in attacking Judge Medina, showing conclusively that it is a political organization subservient to the Communist Party.

The political character of the UERMWA is revealed further by the violence and abusiveness of the statements which its leaders have prepared for the Daily Worker, Communist Party newspaper. The National Non-Partisan Committee to Defend the Rights of the 12 Communist Leaders is the most important of the Communist fronts charged with agitating on behalf of the convicted Communist leaders. The members of this committee include the following prominent UE leaders: David Davis, Ernest DeMaio, Leo Jandreau, and Ruth Young.

Paul Robeson and Judge Norval K. Harris are cochairmen of the National Non-Partisan Committee to Defend the Rights of the 12 Communist Leaders. Robeson is known well enough for his pro-Soviet activities. Judge Norval K. Harris is a newcomer to the Communist-front fold. This judge, incidentally, served a prison sentence for stealing veterans' checks after World War I.

The secretary of the committee is Harold Christoffel, Communist leader of the Allis-Chalmers strike in the period of Communist sabotage strikes during the days of the Stalin-Hitler pact. Other well-known Communists and party liners on the committee include Hugh Bryson, Albert Maltz, Grant W. Oakes, Sam Burt, W. E. B. DuBois, James H. Durkin, Ben Gold, Uta Hagen, Vito Marcantonio, William Howard Melish, William L. Patterson, Gene Weltfish, and Donald Henderson.

It requires no intimate nor profound knowledge to realize that as long as these representatives of Moscow continue to dictate the labor policies of a quarter of a million workers in strategic American plants we face a dangerous and possibly a tragic situation. It should be changed immediately.

In this connection I call attention to the fact that the Taft-Hartley law provides that unless the union heads file a non-Communist affidavit, the union shall not be recognized as the bargaining agent. It also provides heavy penalties for those who file false affidavits—penalties in the form of fines and jail sentences.

The question which the American people are entitled to have answered at this time is: "Why has not the Justice Department started prosecution on these false affidavits?"

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has furnished the complete and detailed evidence to the Justice Department, but Mr. Peyton Ford, the Assistant to the Attorney General, who received all of this proof, has under administration direction turned a deaf ear and buried the information in the files.

This is extremely dangerous playing with our national security for the purpose of getting some additional left-wing votes. It is in the same pattern as the shameful and dangerous Tydings-McMahon-Lucas whitewashing of Communists in Government.

Inflation—Will It Lead to Repudiation or the Return to a Sound Currency Redeemable in Gold and Silver

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COMPTON I. WHITE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, there is submitted herewith for the consideration of the Members of Congress an editorial on inflation taken from the September 22, 1950, Spokesman-Review, of Spokane, Wash., and a timely response of Frank Lilly, research analyst, also of Spokane:

WAR'S BIG OBJECTIVE IS THE UNITED STATES DOLLAR

The most dangerous threat to America's security today may not be Russia's military might. It is inflation here at home.

Communism's long-range plan is to force the democracies to exhaust their energies and resources in a long series of little wars and military preparations until they go down in economic collapse. This strategy holds out far more hope for Russian domination of the world than would any plan for military conquest.

Our most sensible defense is to protect the American economy against inflation, especially during the time we are building our military strength. It is not an easy way, but the only way to check communism and at the same time prevent world war III.

Camille Gutt, manager of the International Monetary Fund, has warned that "neglect of the inflationary danger can destroy all progress made in the last 4 years toward economic recovery from World War II." Mr. Gutt pointed the way, for America as well as Europe: Credit must be limited, and while taxes go up it is even more vital to limit unnecessary expenditures by governments.

Secretary of Labor Maurice Tobin repeated the warning that inflation is the greatest danger facing American labor. He urged that no general wage rise be sought at this time, adding that "wage increases would again be reflected in increased prices and we would be in another inflationary spiral that would benefit nobody, labor least of all."

While Congress hurries to adjourn without enacting adequate anti-inflation measures and the President is trying to postpone use of his anti-inflationary powers until after election, the danger is not being combated. Higher taxes, even price ceilings, are not enough. We need most of all to stop nonessential Government spending.

The situation calls for determined, intelligent, bipartisan effort in our Federal Government if we are to avoid the economic anarchy that Russia has planned for us.

SEPTEMBER 22, 1950.

JAMES BRACKEN,
Editor, Spokesman Review,
Spokane, Wash.

DEAR JIM: The statement in your editorial of September 22 to the effect that "the most dangerous threat to American security today * * * is inflation here at home, is timely and should be repeated and emphasized over and over again.

I wish, however, that the real reason for inflation had been given. As matters stand, inflation is something that everybody talks about and warns against but which almost nobody seems to realize is a result and not a cause. In other words, inflation is the fever and not the disease; or, to say it another way, the gas and not the overeating of the wrong food that creates the gas.

Our real concern, therefore, is with the cause of inflation, for only by correcting the cause can we eliminate inflation itself. To merely alleviate the fever, or get rid of the gas is not going to do very much good in the long run.

The cause of inflation, briefly stated, lies in the fact that our currency is debt-based, and it therefore increases in about the same proportion as our debt increases. Incidentally, according to no less an authority than Thomas B. McCabe, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, debts on homes and commodities, including automobiles, now total over $60,000,000,000, an increase of over $10,000,000,000 during the past year. Many people do not understand that under our present monetary system most of these debts are discounted by the Federal Reserve banks, who issue the Federal Reserve notes that constitute most of our currency.

It is not too much to say that the "debt bomb" is more dangerous to American security than the A-bomb or even the H-bomb. Incidentally, Lenin and the other Russian leaders have never made a secret of the fact that the Communists' plan is to debauch our currency by inducing the United States to spend itself into bankruptcy, which is what we are now well on our way toward doing.

If all our currency were convertible into gold and/or silver, there could not be any appreciable inflation or deflation because convertibility acts as a brake which is useful when, for any reason we are stopping going uphill or when we are going downhill. When gold backing was taken out of our monetary system, it was equivalent to taking the brakes out of an automobile. Brakes are just as necessary to the proper functioning of an automobile as is the engine. You can, after a fashion, run an automobile on level ground with nothing but the motor, but the brakes are needed for the safety of both the driver and others.

Increasing taxes and arbitrary Government controls are at best palliatives, like spirits of sweet niter for fever and soda mints for gas. Neither course, nor both, will correct the cause of inflation. The only cure is a sound, honest currency, backed by, and freely convertible into gold and/or silver. Unless this cure is applied, our country must inevitably resort to repudiation, which would be fatal to the American way of life.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK I[illegible]Y.

Undesirables in Government Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me together with newspaper articles in reference thereto.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SCHOEPPEL

Mr. President, in a speech on the Senate floor on September 5, 1950, I referred to the activities of a number of individuals, some of whom are in the Department of Interior.

I referred to records and data and findings which resulted from hearings in the Congress of the United States, more particularly, before the Un-American Activities Committee of the House of Representatives. In that speech I referred to the activities of certain individuals within the Territory of Alaska as appeared of record, and as set forth in my statement.

There were matters referred to in my speech of September 5, which, in my judgment, offered a fertile field for proper inquiry by a committee of the Senate of the United States, and which I thought should be brought to the attention of the American people.

I offered suggestions for the consideration of the committee as to witnesses who should be called, records, and data that should be obtained, all to the end that a complete basis for investigation would be provided. I felt that this committee had the authority to do this, and the facilities for the handling of this important type of inquiry.

These things I urge you to keep in mind for it is my intention to say more about them in the future.

We can easily recall the loud cries of anguish from the uninformed and the misinformed which arose when I first called attention on September 5 to many of these conditions and situations existing in the Interior Department, and the conduct of other individuals referred to. In my opinion, these matters needed to be investigated, thoroughly and completely, and that need still exists today.

I have been accused of not knowing whereof I spoke. These accusations do not disturb me. There were even, at the time of the drum beatings of denial and in the anxiety to protect many of these individuals named in my speech, statements that as a Republican I was motivated in my utterances by reason of politics. Let's look at the record with reference to this.

Let me remind the Senate and the people of this country that in May of this year 1950 a Member of Congress, a Democrat from the State of Virginia, in a public speech in his State, not only raised many of the same questions I raised in the Senate, concerning Mr. Chapman, but, my friends, a good many more. Here I want to refer to photostats of three newspapers:

1. Chicago Daily Tribune, May 17, 1950.
2. The Staunton News-Leader, May 12, 1950.
3. The Times-Herald, May 17, 1950.

Congressman BURR P. HARRISON, of Virginia, who is a member of the House of Representatives and a member of the Un-American Activities Committee of that body, spoke boldly, forthrightly, and courageously. I urge you to read and refer to what he had to say. Photostatic copies of newspaper reports of his remarks I am offering for the record at this point:

"[From the Chicago Daily Tribune of May 17, 1950]

"DEMOCRAT HITS APATHY TO REDS IN GOVERNMENT—CHAPMAN BLIND TO PERIL, HE SAYS

"(By Willard Edwards)

"WASHINGTON, May 16—A Democratic Congressman today ripped into the Truman administration's indefensible apathy concerning Communists in the Government and named Interior Secretary Chapman as unfit for office because of Communist front associations.

"Capitol Hill buzzed over a speech made by Representative HARRISON, Democrat, Virginia, a former circuit judge at Staunton, Va., last Thursday, the main features of which he repeated in an interview. The speech was reported only by Virginia newspapers at the time.

"The Harrison speech betrayed the secret alarms of many prominent Democrats over the administration's complacency in dealing with charges made by Senator MCCARTHY, Republican, Wisconsin, and other Republicans about Communist influences in the State Department and elsewhere.

"CHARGES UNFITNESS

"HARRISON, a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, said he was not accusing Chapman of being either a Communist or disloyal but he read the record of the Cabinet officer's front affiliations as indicating his unfitness to detect security risks in his own department.

" 'I am convinced there are many persons with unsavory and dangerous connections still employed by the Government despite the assurances by President Truman and other top officials that the loyalty program cleaned them out,' he declared. 'Statements to the effect that there are no "known Communists" in the Government are not reassuring.

" 'The unknown Communists are the effective ones. Disclosures made by our committee do not give me a feeling of security. Obviously, the Communists are intensifying rather than diminishing their efforts to infiltrate our Federal establishment.'

"INDEFENSIBLE APATHY

" 'But for a reason wholly inexplicable to me, there has been no intensification of the efforts on the part of our Federal officials to weed out undesirables. On the contrary, there is an indefensible apathy, a continued effort to convince the public that hunting for Communists and fellow travelers in the Government merely hurts the morale of the employees and damages public confidence in public officials.

" 'This is a senseless attitude. Attorney General Clark [now Supreme Court Justice] was telling a CIO convention there were no Communists in the Government at the very moment Judith Coplon was busy stealing confidential information from the files of his own Department.'

"FRONTS LISTED

" 'State Secretary Acheson stood by Alger Hiss even after Hiss had been convicted by a jury as a common liar. There are a number of officials who should not be working for the Government. Among them is the Secretary of the Interior, Oscar Chapman, who seems inclined to join Communist-front groups without investigation as to their true character.'

"Chapman's former affiliations, as listed in the files of the House committee, Harrison said, include the American League Against War and Fascism, cited as subversive by the Justice Department; Congress of American-Soviet Friendship, similarly cited; and Descendants of the American Revolution, labeled 'a Communist imitation of the Daughters of the American Revolution' by the House committee; and others."

"[From the Staunton (Va.) News-Leader of May 12, 1950]

"UNDESIRABLES SAID ON FEDERAL LISTS

"Representative BURR P. HARRISON declared last night that he is convinced many persons with unsavory and dangerous connections still are employed by the Federal Government, despite assurances from President Truman and other top officials that the loyalty check program has proved an adequate safeguard.

"Mr. HARRISON, a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, spoke at a public meeting of the Beverly Manor Ruritan Club.

"He was introduced by Gilbert R. Kinzie. A dinner, presided over by Roscoe Masincupp, president of the group, was served by the ladies of the Hebron Church. The Reverend W. W. Trimble gave the invocation, and Boyd Shaner was accepted as a new member at the monthly meeting.

"It was announced that at the next meeting the boys and girls of the FFA will be honored as guests of the Ruritans.

"Statements to the effect that 'there are no known Communists in the Government' are not reassuring, in the light of the shocking facts which have come to light in recent years—and still are being revealed," he said.

" 'We must go beyond the matter of "known Communists." The unknown Communists are the effective ones. The disclosures which have been made in the proceedings of the Committee on Un-American Activities do not give me a feeling of security. Obviously, Communists are intensifying, rather than diminishing, their efforts to infiltrate our Federal establishment. But, for a reason wholly inexplicable to me, there has been no intensification of the efforts on the part of our Federal officials to weed out undesirables.'

"SCORES APATHY

" 'On the contrary, there has been an indefensible apathy—a continuous effort to convince the public that hunting for Communists and fellow travelers in the Government merely hurts morale of the employees and damages public confidence in public officials.'

"Mr. HARRISON called this 'a senseless attitude.' He pointed out that Attorney General Tom Clark (now a Supreme Court Justice) was telling a CIO convention that there were no Communists in the Government, insofar as was known, at the very moment Judith Coplon, now under a Federal penitentiary sentence, was busy stealing confidential information from the files of his own department, where she was working.

"He also recalled that Secretary of State Dean Acheson insisted on standing by Alger Hiss, a former trusted official of his Department, even after Hiss had been convicted 'as a common liar' in denying he passed confidential information to a Communist courier.

"Mr. HARRISON warned that adequate security controls in the Federal Government must go beyond the theory of loyalty risk and embrace the idea of security risk.

"There are many persons working for the Government who have no right to be there,' he said. 'As a matter of fact, no one has a right to a Federal job. It should be regarded as a high privilege. The people of the United States have the right to be choosy about who works for them—and their officials in Washington should keep that in mind. A worker who is loyal to the Nation still may be unfit to serve as a Federal employee because of his habit of joining Communist-front organizations or keeping the company of Communists and fellow travelers,' he pointed out.

"NAMES INDIVIDUALS

"Mr. HARRISON said he had selected at random the names of several individuals he believed should not be working for the Government. One of these was that of Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman. He read from files of the Committee on Un-American Activities the names and descriptions of several organizations with which the files showed Mr. Chapman to have been affiliated in the past. The organizations subsequently were cited by the Committee on Un-American Activities as Communist front. Mr. HARRISON emphasized he was not calling Mr. Chapman a Communist, or accusing him of being disloyal, but merely mentioned him as one of those public officials who seemed inclined to join Communist-front groups without investigating their true character.

"The Seventh District Representative also reported on his recent service in Hawaii as a member of a special subcommittee investigating Communist activities there.

"He revealed that public hearings conducted in Honolulu established the existence of a well-organized and effective plan to seize control of the economy of the Territory and of the administration of its affairs generally.

"Mr. HARRISON said testimony presented to the subcommittee under the direction of Committee Counsel Frank S. Tavenner, Jr., of Woodstock, showed the extent to which the Communists had been successful in achieving domination of the dock workers' union organization, thereby controlling the islands' trade. It also established the startling fact that a small group of Communists had been able to take command of the Democratic Party in Hawaii, Mr. HARRISON added.

"One of the most appalling incidents to be uncovered in the hearings, he told the Ruritans, involved a veteran who was sent to the mainland, the taxpayers paying his way, in order that he could take instruction under the GI bill of rights.

" 'And where do you suppose he studied?' Mr. HARRISON asked. 'At a reputable college or trade school? Not at all. He was enrolled, at public expense, in the California Labor School. This institution was a notorious Communist front, well known to the FBI as a training ground for Communists and would-be Communists, where Marxist philosophy was taught and students were shown how to further the objective of subversion.' "

"Mr. HARRISON said the Hawaiian trip gave him "a startling picture of how a small group of experienced Communists—perhaps no more than 200—had neared the objective of control of an entire Territory, under the noses of patriotic and anti-Communist citizens."

"SECRETARY CHAPMAN ASSAILED BY VIRGINIA DEMOCRAT FOR RED LINKS

"(By Willard Edwards)

"A Democratic congressman yesterday ripped into the Truman administration's 'indefensible apathy' concerning Communists in the Government and named Interior Secretary Chapman as unfit for office because of Communist front associations.

"Capitol Hill buzzed over a sensational speech made by Representative HARRISON (Democrat, Virginia) at Staunton, Va., last Thursday, the main features of which he repeated in an interview.

"MANY DEMOCRATS ALARMED

"The Harrison speech betrayed the secret alarms of many prominent Democrats over the administration's complacency over charges made by Senator MCCARTHY (Republican) of Wisconsin and other Republicans about Communist influences in the State Department and elsewhere.

"HARRISON, a member of the House Un-American Activities Committee, said he was not accusing Chapman of being either a Communist or disloyal, but he read the record of the Cabinet officer's front affiliations as indicating his unfitness to detect security risks in his own Department.

" 'I am convinced there are many persons with unsavory and dangerous connections still employed by the Government despite the assurances by President Truman and other top officials that the loyalty program cleaned them out,' he declared. 'Statements to the effect that there are no known Communists in the Government are not reassuring.

" 'The unknown Communists are the effective ones. * * *'

"INDEFENSIBLE APATHY

" 'But for a reason wholly inexplicable to me, there has been no intensification of the efforts on the part of our Federal officials to weed out undesirables. On the contrary, there is an indefensible apathy, a continued effort to convince the public that hunting for Communists and fellow travelers in the Government merely hurts the morale of the employes and damages public confidence in public officials.

" 'This is a senseless attitude. Attorney General Clark (now Supreme Court Justice) was telling a CIO convention there were no Communists in the Government at the very moment Judith Coplon was busy stealing confidential information from the files of his own Department.

" 'State Secretary Acheson stood by Alger Hiss even after Hiss had been convicted by a jury as a common liar. There are a number of officials who should not be working for the Government.'

"Chapman's former affiliations, as listed in the files of the House Committee, HARRISON said, include the American League Against War and Fascism, cited as subversive by the Justice Department; Congress of American-Soviet Friendship, similarly cited, and Descendants of the American Revolution, labeled 'A Communist imitation of the Daughters of the American Revolution by the House committee, and others."

Surely, Mr. Chapman and his fellow Democrats had Mr. Harrison's remarks called to their attention. But strangely enough, there were no drum beatings—no wails of denial—no calls for investigation—no shouting of "politics" or "foul play."

Mr. Chapman and his friends certainly should have known or had the oportunity to know that these charges were made by a member of his own Democrat Party, elected by the people of his State and renominated for election to his responsible office in the House of Representatives of this Nation.

In this instance there was a great silence with reference to the charges which were made by this courageous Congressman who spoke out of the fullness of his heart and from a knowledge of what had transpired while he was a member of the committee of Congress.

There was, for me, denunciation, some charges of petty politics, accusations of using smear tactics and a degree of vilification that reeks of the type of pressure which should be exposed and held up for exactly what it is to the eyes and ears of the people of this country.

Mr. Chapman has used the prestige of his office as a platform for ringing denials and very little more. He has referred to me as a "little man in a high place." I accept Mr. Chapman's estimate, but the senior Senator from Kansas wishes at this time to remind him to trim his vision down to my size.

Some of us are little people concerned with other little people. None of them to my knowledge, has ever repeatedly joined organizations supported by the Communists, attended dinners honoring Communists, or defaced a sacred oath of office, even for ceremonial purposes, or refused to reaffirm at any time the phrases printed in that oath.

Perhaps, as Mr. Chapman says, such procedures are commonplace in the Department of Interior. I am informed that they are not commonplace in the Department of Justice, the Department of State, and the Department of Commerce. They are not even tolerated there.

Many questions were raised in my Senate speech regarding the Department of Interior. Many of these questions are still unanswered.

How many other oaths of office in the Interior Department are defaced, and when were they defaced?

What do the people of Alaska have to say about the thousands of dollars spent to pay the exorbitant lobby fee of a man who apparently did little more than submit expense accounts?

Who has heard the likes of the vilification of a Senator's assistant, such as Mr. Frank Bow endured?

Mr. Bow is a good American, deeply concerned with the facts as he found them to exist in the Department of Interior. Facts that stand the test, despite abuse, of vilification and confusion.

We have a way in America of being patient for the truth. The people will be patient now. They were patient through the heavy rains of red herrings that fell upon them in other days.

They were patient through the so-called investigations of strange influences in other Federal Departments. The people look upon this body to supply them with the facts. To them, we in the Senate have the obligation of forceful inquiry, of deliberate, thorough investigation. If the citizens of our country do not get that from us, they have a way of making their voices and demands heard. Not in the discord of confusion that greets us now, but in the manner of little men, exhausted from hearing double talk and demanding the truth.

All-Out Mobilization and All-Out Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, Congress should immediately enact legislation requiring all-out mobilization and all-out controls.

It is not fair to pass the buck to the President. Congress should bear the responsibility.

Billions of dollars can be saved if we have all-out mobilization and all-out controls pegged at a certain date, preferably May 15, 1950, beyond which prices and wages could not climb and cause a spiral of inflation. Likewise our action would prevent the greedy from making millions unnecessarily out of the war.

Russia has had all-out mobilization of men and materials for some time. They are operating around the clock.

We must prevent inflation which would bring disastrous effects to our economy; we must act quickly to prevent extreme hardships on our aged, small businesses, large families, laboring people, municipalities, and to prevent excessive war costs.

We should allow the aged to work without regard to any old-age assistance now being received by them.

We should draft wealth as well as men, enact an excess-profits tax, make use of the services of all persons of all ages to the best advantage possible in an effort to win the war without delay.

When we win the Korean conflict we must not relax, but must redouble our efforts in order to be fully prepared at all times.

We should greatly expand the ROTC training program in high schools and colleges, and prepare our young men in a manner similar to the training given them in the United States Military Academy at West Point and the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, thus preserving their high moral standards.

Increased Social Security Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to finally have the opportunity of voting for a bill to improve our social-security law. For years it has been evident to me that the act should be improved, particularly by extending its coverage and increasing the amount to be paid to those entitled to benefits under the act. The number of persons to come within the provisions has been increased by approximately 11,000,000.

The fear of insecurity in old age is one that is ever present in the life of most persons. To remove that fear will add years and happiness to the life of everyone as they grow older. Time and again, innumerable times, I receive letters of the most pathetic character from old people fearful of what the future holds in store for them. These old people do not want to be a burden to the members of their families. They do not want to be dependent. They want to be independent. Those that are able are willing to work, but in this fast-moving industrial life of today, the demand is for young persons. Thus, the old and aged are placed upon the shelf, and, therefore, the need by appropriate laws to enable the aged to live a self-respecting old age. I am now, and always have been, strongly in favor of all legislation to provide security in old age.

As I have previously said, I am gratified that additional persons to the number of 11,000,000 are brought within the terms of the act by the amendments proposed. There are other classes of our citizenship that should likewise have been brought within the act. It is disappointing that they are not. However, I look forward to the time, and I hope it is not distant, when all such will be brought within our social-security coverage.

Another amendment to the Social Security Act that is long overdue, but is being corrected or improved by the legislation before us relates to the amount of benefits received. The amounts being paid under the present law are so meager that they might well be considered an insult to the aged. In no instance are they sufficient to meet the high cost of living that now exists. The only defense that might be offered would be that the cost of living when the original act was adopted was not as high as it is now, and, furthermore, that the law was new and lessons had to be gained by experience. Whatever justification there may be for such in the past the fact remains that for a long time it has been apparent that justice to the aged requires that payments to them should be greatly increased.

The legislation, now before us offers considerable improvement over present conditions by liberalization of benefits to be received under the act.

About 2,600,000 persons currently receiving old-age and survivors insurance benefits would have their monthly benefits increased on the average about 77 percent for highest benefit groups to as much as 150 percent for lowest benefit groups. The average primary benefit is now approximately $26 per month for a retired insured worker and under the bill it would be approximately $44. Illustrative figures for individual cases are shown in the table below:

Present primary insurance benefit:	New primary insurance amount
$10	$25
$15	31
$20	36
$25	44
$30	51
$35	55
$40	60
$45	64

Furthermore, a very important matter, the bill will increase the amount that can be earned by a beneficiary without losing the monthly benefits to which he is entitled. Under the present law the amount a beneficiary is permitted to earn per month, after retirement and in addition to the monthly payment received is only $14.99. The amount is so trifling that in practice it is no real help at all. Under the bill now before us this situation is corrected. The amount a beneficiary may earn in covered employment without loss of benefits would be increased from $14.99 to $50 per month. After age 75, benefits would be payable regardless of amount of earnings from employment.

There are many other worth-while improvements and additions to the existing law that will prove highly beneficial to many thousands of people. For instance—

Old-age and survivors' insurance benefits to World War II veterans.

World War II veterans will be given wage credits under the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program of $160 per month for the time spent in military service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE AND WELFARE SERVICES

Under extension of State-Federal public-assistance programs aid will be extended to persons not now eligible for assistance, as follows:

The mother, or other adult relative with whom an eligible dependent child is living, would become eligible as a recipient under the aid-to-dependent-children program, and the Federal Government would share in the costs of the aid furnished such mother or relative.

Increase in Federal share of public-assistance costs: The bill will strengthen financing of public assistance in all States, and, particularly, will enable States with low-average payments to raise the level of payments to needy recipients under the State-Federal program. Federal funds will be made available to the States under the following matching formula:

(a) For old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the totally and permanently disabled, Federal funds will equal four-fifths of the first $25 for recipient plus one-half of the next $10 plus one-third of the next $15 with a maximum of $50 on individual assistance payments.

(b) For aid to dependent children, Federal funds will equal four-fifths of the first $15 per recipient, including one adult in each family, plus one-half of the next $6, plus one-third of the remainder, with maximums on individual assistance payments of $27 for the adult plus $27 for the first child plus $18 for each additional child in the family.

Public medical institutions: The Federal Government will share in the payments made by the States and localities to the needy, aged, blind, and permanently and totally disabled recipients residing in public medical institutions, instead of limiting Federal participation to payments made to recipients residing in private institutions as provided in present law.

Direct payment for medical care: States will be authorized to make direct payments to medical practitioners or institutions furnishing medical care to recipients of State-Federal public assistance. Under existing law the Federal Government does not participate in the cost of medical care for recipients unless payment for such is made directly to the recipient.

Child-welfare services in rural areas or areas of special need will be increased from $3,500,000 per year to $7,000,000. The use of child-welfare funds would be authorized for purposes of returning interstate runaway children to their homes. Notwithstanding the good that is in the bill there are some changes and additions that should have been made, but, unfortunately a gag rule prevented any amendments being offered. I think it was wrong to bring the bill before the House with such restriction on amendments.

The amendments to the Social Security Act which this bill seeks to make effective are necessary and worth while. While they may not cover every situation or condition that needs to be ratified, yet they do go a long way in making improvements to our social-security structure. I am pleased to give my support to the bill, and I hope that it will have the approval of the House.

Social Security Past 15-Year Mark

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article entitled "Social Security Past 15-Year Mark" which appeared in the Sheet Metal Workers Journal, September 1950 issue:

SOCIAL SECURITY PAST 15-YEAR MARK

More than $24,000,000,000 have been paid out in the last 15 years under the various programs authorized by the Social Security Act, according to a report made marking the anniversary of the signing of the bill. The late President Frankin D. Roosevelt signed the measure making the bill a law on August 14, 1935.

The Social Security Administration released a summary of benefit payments on the fifteenth anniversary of the passage of the act. The report was issued on the eve of final passage by Congress of the 1950 amendments which will add 10,000,000 persons to the retirements rolls.

TWO MILLION EIGHT HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND BENEFICIARIES

Best known of all the programs, perhaps, is the old age and survivors insurance phase. Under the law, before the 1950 amendments, approximately 2,100,000 aged beneficiaries and 750,000 younger mothers and children were receiving payments. The average monthly benefit for a retired worker is $26. Cumulative benefits under this program have exceeded $3,375,500,000.

Under the old-age-assistance program some 2,900,000 are being aided with an average monthly payment of $44. This program is operated by the States with the Federal Government and the States sharing the costs. Payments under this program have totaled $9,985,000,000 as of June 1950.

Aid to dependent children has been stepped up sharply under social security. In 1934 an estimated 280,000 children were being aided under State and county programs. Great variation and inconsistency prevailed, however. Today all States except Nevada have jointly financed programs with an average monthly payment being made of $47 for each of more than 1,600,000 children. The pre-social-security payments averaged $11 a month. Cumulative payments since social security began 15 years ago total $2,756,000,000.

Before the Social Security Act was passed 27 States had some sort of statutes providing for aid to the blind. While complete reports are not available it is estimated that the total being helped was less than 34,000 and the average payment was $20 per month per person. Today 77,000 are receiving monthly payments with an average of $47 per person. Cumulate payments under this program total $287,000,000.

Grants are made to States by the Federal Government to finance child health and welfare programs. These grants take the form of services provided rather than of payments made directly to individual. Since August 1935 total grants to States for programs of this sort have totaled nearly $190,000,000.

Another phase of social security which has attracted considerable attention and is often in the news is the authorization for unemployment insurance. In 1935 only one State, Wisconsin, had provision for unemployment compensation. Now all States, Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia have such provisions. Federal standards prevail and the Federal Government pays the States for costs of administration, but by and large the program is a State-operated procedure.

The social-security programs are financed by revenues from both Federal and State sources. Unemployment benefits are financed by State payroll taxes. Old-age and survivors insurance is financed entirely by a Federal payroll tax. The programs to aid dependent children and the blind is financed jointly.

1950 AMENDMENTS HELPED

The Social Security Administration pointed out in its report that the payments under the 1950 amendments would greatly increase the annual sum of money reaching eligible citizens. With some 10,000,000 added to the retirement rolls and retirement benefits hiked by an average of 77 percent, payments in the next 15 years are likely to exceed by a wide margin the payments since 1935.

While the new amendments recently enacted by Congress represent real progress in the long road of recent social welfare goals, labor is apprehensive about one amendment. This amendment, known as the "Knowland amendment," would restrict the power of the Secretary of Labor in the matter of unemployment compensation payments and could conceivably lead to the forcing of union workers to scab, say some observers.

Are You Going To Lose the Strongest Safeguard of Democracy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important provisions of the United States Constitution guarantees to every citizen the right to vote. It is more than a right; it is a privilege which carries with it the positive duty to use it.

There is no other country on the face of the earth where periodically, on fixed dates, known well in advance, every citizen can go to the polls and freely exercise his choice as to who shall be his legislators to make the laws of the land; who shall be the judges to interpret those laws; and who shall be the heads of government to enforce those laws.

Yet, nowhere is this privilege valued so little and ignored so much.

In the City and State of New York this year, we will elect Members of Congress, members of the State legislature, a mayor, and a governor, as well as many judges. Thousands upon thousands of our citizens will lose their right to participate in these important elections solely because they fail to register.

In New York City, unless you personally register each year you lose your right to vote. This year you must register on any one of 6 days, October 9 to October 14, inclusive. It matters not whom you intend to vote for, it is important that you should vote. In order to vote, you must register.

Are you going to lose the strongest safeguard of democracy?

Crusade for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly encouraged by the reports coming to me of the rapid organization in New England for the crusade for freedom drive.

The State chairman of Massachusetts, a personal friend of mine, Nathan Tufts, of Greenfield, has developed an amazingly complete program which has received immediate response throughout Massachusetts.

As is well known this crusade will be conducted until October 24, United Nations Day, when the signatures of Americans who have enlisted in the crusade will be placed in the base of the freedom bell and the bell itself will be installed and dedicated in Berlin as a permanent shrine to freedom and a tribute to those who today are fighting for freedom and against the malicious and false Stockholm peace petition. It is a healthy development.

The Communist sheet, the Daily Worker, of Sunday, September 3, reported that over 2,000,000 Americans had signed this Communist peace petition. On September 4, that official organ of the Communist Party stated that in the world there had been 273,470,566 signatures attached to the fake peace petition. It is significant that 115,275,000 were reported under the U. S. S. R., 18,000,000 under Poland, 17,046,000 under the Soviet-dominated portion of Germany and 44,000,000 from China. Surely it is not too much to expect that those who are now circulating the American Crusade for Freedom petitions will be assisted by all of our organizations and groups in making certain that just as many loyal Americans as possible will have the opportunity to sign this sincere and responsible petition.

I want to include an excellent editorial from the Times Picayune, of New Orleans, in its September 4 issue. That issue also contained a most effective cartoon entitled "A Real Peal To Answer the Phony 'Stockholm Appeal,'" showing an American ringing the freedom bell before a microphone called Radio Free Europe. The bell carries the inscription, "That This World, Under God, Shall Have a New Birth of Freedom." The editorial is as follows:

CRUSADE FOR FREEDOM

I believe in the sacredness and the dignity of the individual.

I believe that all men derive the right to freedom equally from God.

I pledge to resist aggression and tyranny wherever they appear on earth.

This declaration and pledge begin to go today, in the name of individual Americans, on scrolls throughout the United States, for deposit on United Nations Day, October 24, in the base of a freedom bell in Berlin.

Signatures are being collected by local committees of the Crusade for Freedom, a program of the National Committee for a Free Europe, which was organized last year by private citizens. Contributions also will be accepted, in whatever small amounts, to defray expenses of this project and of Radio Free Europe broadcasts from Germany into iron-curtain land.

This expression of American purposes and steadfastness is counted upon to strengthen the hopes of those isolated and enslaved individuals who have been bound in the net of Russian and local communism. The freedom bell itself will be a memorial to all who have given and who may give their lives in the struggle for human freedom.

This is a spontaneous movement, apart from government and statecraft, which nevertheless has demanded intense organization. It is one of the answers that will be made to the "big lies" of communism. The crusade itself is headed by Gen. Lucius D. Clay.

We believe every person subscribing to this credo, with or without a financial contribution, will help in some measure in the struggle the Kremlin has forced upon the free world. Means have been provided, in display advertisements, for response by persons who may not be contacted.

The declaration stands also as a rebuking rejoinder to the fallacious premises and falsities of the so-called Stockholm declaration—a rejoinder and, at the same time, a positive affirmation, along lines the Red sponsors of the phony peace petition did not dare introduce. On that basis, we hope that in due time the committee will extend the circulation of this scroll to western Europe and elsewhere.

I also want to include a very interesting report from Los Angeles in the Christian Science Monitor of September 13, by Kimmis Hendrick, chief of the Pacific news bureau of that paper. It is entitled "Freedom Crusade Stirs Action in West." The article is as follows:

FREEDOM CRUSADE STIRS ACTION IN WEST

(By Kimmis Hendrick)

LOS ANGELES.—Westerners are awakening to the spiritual potential of the Crusade for Freedom and throughout the region volunteer committees are forming ranks to make the drive successful.

Early editorial response to Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's Denver radio address which opened the crusade officially shows how much eagerness there is to offer the world a positive alternate to communism.

As workers start out to get signers for the freedom scrolls and contributions to Radio Free Europe, they have the backing of newspaper publicity and comment more than ordinarily tuned to spiritual idealism.

GROWING AWARENESS

There seems to be a growing awareness throughout the West that the plan of private American citizens to support a chain of free radio stations in western Europe offers a gripping opportunity. It is sensed, obviously, that the time has come for Americans themselves to realize how much more than material achievement they have to share with mankind.

California's Governor, Earl Warren, proclaiming a Crusade for Freedom Week, referred to this bigger sharing as freedom of thought and action. The declaration of freedom which signers will put their names to includes the statement, "I believe that all men derive the right to freedom equally from God."

FREEDOM BELL TO RING

On October 24, when a 10-ton freedom bell will ring out in Berlin, to be heard by radio here, everywhere else in the free world, and doubtless behind the iron curtain, its essential message will echo the words of Lincoln inscribed in parsphrase on its rim: "That this world, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom."

In an editorial headed "Freedom is individual," the Hollywood Citizen-News hailed the freedom crusade, to make possible this bell and an enlarged free radio plan for Europe, as a new affirmation of faith in God.

The writers of the American Constitution, the Citizen-News said, believed that a good society could be established only with God as its foundation. This foundation, it continued, Marxism ignores, Marxism overlooks mankind's divine diversity which has lifted man above all the rest of God's creatures.

As the crusade for freedom was launched here, Walter Wanger, motion-picture executive, told press and radio representatives that what the world wants of us is assurance that freedom is a spiritual possibility. It does not merely want the things we produce.

AWAKENING URGED

"We must wake up to the fact," he said, "that we are not the only people in the world who can produce some things. We know that the slave system of Russia can never produce our most valuable products of freedom and human decency and individual dignity."

In San Francisco, in Portland, Oreg., in Vallejo, in small cities like San Jose and Santa Monica, as in Los Angeles, newspapers are greeting enthusiastically our chance to fight for freedom, as the Coos Bay (Oreg.) Times calls the crusade editorially. "This is in reality a world war struggling for men's minds," that paper says, repeating a phrase frequently heard as the nature of today's basic problem becomes apparent.

The Los Angeles Times says the need for championing mental freedom is so great that it needs not schoolmasters, but evangelists, to tell the story. It quotes Dr. Charles Malik, UN representative from the tiny Republic of Lebanon, whose view differs decidedly from that of the chief Russian delegate of similar name.

"Communism cannot be met by a mere nay," Dr. Malik has said; "it requires a mighty yea which will do full justice to man's material needs but will at the same time place them in their subordinate position in the scale of values."

For the Pacific coast's share in the crusade for freedom, L. M. Giannini is serving as regional chairman. Governor Warren is honorary State chairman for California. The drive to get every loyal American of Boy or Girl Scout age and upward to sign the freedom scrolls and contribute up to $1 must be completed by October 16.

Wisconsin Farmers Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a letter I wrote to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] regarding the Wisconsin Farmers Union.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPTEMBER 8, 1950.

Senator STYLES BRIDGES,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BRIDGES: I understand that yesterday on the Senate floor you discussed at some length the alleged Communist infiltration of the Farmers Union. I am sorry I was not present on the floor to hear the discussion, but hope to read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

While I have never had extremely close contact with the Farmers Union in Wisconsin, I do know the president, Kenneth W. Hones, very well by reputation. He has the reputation of being militantly and intelligently anti-Communist. I feel in fairness to Mr. Hones this should be made very clear. I have, therefore, instructed my office to have this letter inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I am not well acquainted with many of the officers of the Wisconsin Farmers Union.

However, I have no information to indicate that any of them are communistically inclined, nor do any of them, to my knowledge, have such a reputation.

Very sincerely yours,

JOE MCCARTHY.

Expediency in Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter to the editor of the New York Times of September 5, by William S. Reisman, which I believe to be of special interest at this time:

EXPEDIENCY IN FOREIGN POLICY—RECORD OF ALLIANCES CITED WITH ANTI-DEMOCRATIC POWERS

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The necessity from a political and military point of view for an alliance with the Spain of Franco is open to honest difference of opinion. It is up to men more experienced in this field than myself or Fritz Moses, whose letter you recently published.

Mr. Moses' argument against expediency contrary to ethical conduct in the affairs of nations disregards historical instances of "immoral" expediency on the part of our great leaders throughout the years.

A superficial glance at our own past should suffice to show how often we have been forced to resort to expedient alliances with governments and philosophies inimical to ourselves.

Consider, for example, our close military and economic ties with the absolute monarchy of Louis XVI of France in our first struggle with England. Actually the England of George III was a veritable new-deal paradise compared to the autocratic government of Lafayette, Rochambeau, and DeGrasse. An alliance was contracted with this despotic nation, but for whose aid our independence could never have been achieved.

Andrew Jackson, faced in 1815 with the flower of England's Peninsular Army before New Orleans, allowed no moral qualms to disturb him when he accepted a pirate's offer to fill the gap at the Rodriquez Canal, Jean Lafitte and his felons were welcomed for the help they could give. Expediency, fortunately had won again over "ethics."

CIVIL WAR ALLY

Abraham Lincoln courted the friendship and aid of Czar Alexander II of Russia when England was about to side with the Southern Confederacy. This was the same England that had successfully quelled her own slave trade years before the partial emancipation of our Negroes in 1863. The Russian men-of-war anchored reassuringly in northern harbors had sailed from a land whose serfs, although nominally freed, labored as literal slaves in a feudal society. Lincoln knew that Russia had no love for a democratic America but gladly took advantage of the Muscovite hatred of England and Napoleon III.

The United States under Woodrow Wilson fought against German imperialism with armies from practically every other imperialist nation in the world.

In our own time we have seen America allied after 1941 with a Soviet Russia whose philosophy differed not one whit from that of our Nazi foe.

It is not my intention to support Señor del Castillo's claim for recognition of Spanish claims to alliance on moral grounds. But I submit for the benefit of confused liberals that refusal to accept reality on "moral" grounds is equally indefensible.

Republicans Are Poor, Pure, and Honest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Republicans are poor, pure, and honest, and there is no reason why they should be otherwise. The party, at least nationally, has neither enough money nor influence to tempt any crooked individuals. Second-story workers never hang around a poorhouse. Crooks and racketeers are smart. Those who are after the "big money" know that only the party in power has lucrative jobs, opportunities for grafting, juicy contracts, protection for syndicate gambling or any other form of vice, to allocate or sell.

DEMOCRATS WELCOME

Republicans seek to welcome those Democrats who have been ousted from their traditional political home.

There is in Congress no formal coalition between Democrats and Republicans nor have the battle lines there been consistently drawn between Democrats and Republicans. For more than 15 years, the alinement has been between so-called liberals, progressives, humanitarians, "share the wealth," "the Government owes me a living" advocates and so-called "horse-and-buggy" conservative Democrats and Republicans who believe in constitutional government, the right of the individual to equality of opportunity, but who also believe that—except as adequate aid should always be given to the unfortunate who are unable to care for themselves—every man when able should be required to earn his own livelihood—that is, that no part of the population should be required to support another group in idleness.

The Democratic Party—pardon me, the Fair Deal Party—has been in control since 1932, and quite naturally the big-time gamblers, the racketeers, and the extortionists have muscled their way into it just as they would into any other party where loot was to be found.

But that is not the whole story. Sincere, serious-minded extremists, with what they term new but which are really old, fallacious schemes and policies proven unworkable centuries ago, accompanied by over-book-educated "do-gooders," pinks, and Reds, have taken over the National Democratic Party organization.

THE RECORD IS CLEAR

That there is a Nation-wide crime syndicate collecting millions of dollars each year because of protection given them by those in power is a matter of common knowledge, and court records substantiate the charge that the present administration, as well as the last, has not only tolerated, but encouraged, Communists in policy-making Government positions.

The recent expulsion of a number of Communist-dominated CIO union affiliates by the CIO proves the charge frequently made that Communists had infiltrated into labor as well as educational organizations and the executive department of the Government.

That the CIO has taken over the Democratic Party of Michigan is shown by an editorial captioned "Democracy's new symbol," from the Detroit Free Press of September 23. Permit me to quote:

The left-wingers of the Americans for Democratic Action and the CIO-PAC captured control of the Democratic Party machinery in Wayne County congressional district conventions. * * *

In all but one district, the caucuses were marked by slugging and the Communist techniques of beating down opposition by violence.

The ADA-PAC combination brought back to Michigan the sitdown-strike methods which have been disavowed in labor disputes, and applied them to government.

The goon squads took over, and the gavel, that traditional symbol of orderly parliamentary procedure, was discarded for the sawed-off baseball bat.

Here in the Nation, President Truman has long had as his advisers known pinks, left-wingers like Frankfurter, Niles, and Rosenman; and in the executive department, such known Communists as Lee Pressman, Nathan Witt, Hiss, Coplon, and many others.

As his political pals and advisers, Mr. Truman has called to the White House CIO President Phil Murray, who, overlong, retained many a Communist in his organization; AFL President William Green, the head of the railway unions, and the Communists who have wormed their way into the State and other executive departments of the Federal Government, notwithstanding the opposition of long-time Democratic leaders, now shape the Democratic Presidential policy.

The people should now, regardless of party affiliation, elect to Congress individuals who believe in this country, in its institutions, and who will make a vigorous effort to oust the crooks, the racketeers, the extortionists, and the Communists.

Elect then, a Congress—and in 1952 a President—who will think first of your welfare and of the security of the Republic.

Tuesday, November 7, is the day.

St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN D. DINGELL
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, my voice has been raised in this Chamber, before committees, and elsewhere at every opportunity in behalf of the St. Lawrence deep-water development. The most recent bill which was introduced by me to accomplish this purpose was considered by the Committee on Public Works and extensive hearings were held, but because of the tremendous organized opposition to this measure—House Joint Resolution 271—from a combination of selfish interests, and because of an insufficient amount of support from interested parties to counterbalance, the bill was not reported.

In many ways, in fact in every way, I have striven to bring about the project's completion, but the half-hearted support given to those who have so consistently and unselfishly given of their time and energies has not been encouraging. For the most part it is only lip-service or fanning the wind. The effort is as poorly directed as it is financed. Only the fervor and the sense of righteousness keeps alive the little band of visionary zealots who refuse to give up, who always spearhead the movement. Like crusaders they are far away from home, in enemy territory, unsupported and harassed by a wicked combination of selfish and rapacious interests who live only for today and for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I warn the people of the Great Lakes region, of Michigan and of Detroit in particular, that unless the waterway is completed soon that steel production will shift to the East or wherever else the highest grade of iron ore is delivered at the lowest price per ton. The steel and other heavy industries dependent upon cheap water transportation and steel, like the automobile industry and a thousand others in the Great Lakes and inland areas, will shift in the same direction and in close proximity to their basic steel supply. Corporations do not have a heart; they are created for profit, for advantage. When either is endangered there is no sentiment to guide or deter; expediency governs the course. It is cheaper to abandon a plant than to abandon the business for lack of raw material—iron ore in this instance—which can be had by competitors in new locations in a higher grade, in greater supply, delivered at a cheaper cost.

It is inevitable, therefore, that Michigan's industry, the center of which is in the Detroit metropolitan area, with the greatest production in the world, must without basic materials shrivel and die. Our businesses and homes, our real estate, schools, and churches, too, will shrivel and die. Without the St. Lawrence deep waterway Detroit, the arsenal of democracy, the industrial Klondike, "where (today) life is worth living," tomorrow will become the world's biggest ghost town. A sad distinction; earned while the State and its great cities were asleep. And it is later than you think. Wake up and spend more than just your time. Become aggressive people of Michigan, control the blind and selfish railroad and Lakes shipping interests and anyone else who stands in the way of the earliest possible completion of the tidewater program, involving the mighty St. Lawrence River.

This great development will make of every Great Lakes port a deep-sea port carrying on direct business with the whole world. To do such business we must preserve our industries dependent upon the basic steel which in turn is dependent upon the basic element, iron ore. Michigan alone should spend a million dollars per year for an educational program for as many years as is necessary to accomplish the purpose. Every other Great Lakes State should do likewise. To date the combined annual expenditures have been inadequate and hardly sufficient to pay the postage costs of a real effective campaign. The St. Lawrence development has been the dream and the inspiration of a pitifully small group, zealous and determined, but they cannot succeed in time unless a real, aggressive, and well-financed program is outlined and backed by the unified action of the interested States. Money should be available to whatever extent is necessary to combat the entrenched opposition. This should be a crusade, a war to protect our industries and in defense of our homes, our business institutions, and our churches. We should give no quarter and ask for none. Tomorrow may be too late.

The high grade or competitive iron ore of the Mesabi Range nears exhaustion. At the present accelerated rate of consumption it will be gone in 20 years. It may take 6 to 10 years to fully develop the St. Lawrence locks and deepen the channels of the Great Lakes to accommodate deep-sea shipping and make available the rich ore of Labrador, Quebec, and Venezuela. Wake up, Michigan. Rouse yourself, Detroit. Get busy today, your life is at stake, tomorrow may be too late. The St. Lawrence undertaking will never be completed after the Mesabi ore is exhausted and industrial erosion follows the production shift to the eastern seaboard. There will be no further need for it and the cost of the development would not be justified. Either you demand of your States and cities their effective cooperation in the solution of the matters now or plan for a shift to follow your lost industries.

Mr. Speaker, the attached article entitled "Cerro Bolivar—Mesabi of the Future," by John L. Beckley, taken from Dun's Review of September 1950, indicates clearly what the future holds for the entire Great Lakes area:

CERRO BOLÍVAR—MESABI OF THE FUTURE

(By John L. Beckley)

Conspicuously alone on the savanna, the flat, grassy plain which sweeps down across eastern Venezuela, is a great mountain, a dark-green, jungle-covered hump, 11 miles long and 2,100 feet high. No one suspected the solitary mountain was anything but useless rock.

Natives whose scattered farms and ranches extended to its base regarded the place with almost superstitious dread. There were tales of ancient rock slides and of a farmer and two sons who had gone there to hunt and never returned. Its Spanish name, La Parida, bordered on the vulgar.

On their way to the diamond and gold fields 100 miles to the south, prospectors used to detour around the great hogback. They were bypassing riches far surpassing anything they could hope to find beyond, for the mountain, renamed Cerro Bolivar, has been found to contain at least 500,000,000 tons of almost pure iron ore—probably much more—perhaps the greatest deposit ever discovered. It was found by a geological survey party sent out by the U. S. Steel Corp., after a search that had lasted 2 years.

Centuries-old Ciudad Bolivar, 60 miles away, has seen gold, diamond, cattle, and lumber booms; oil, chicle, and wild-rubber hunters. Now its bars and shaded paseo buzz with talk of the iron boom to come. For to get the ore from Cerro Bolivar to United States blast furnaces, U. S. Steel must invest $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 in the area of which Ciudad Bolivar is the hub. And there is no doubting U. S. Steel's desire to get the ore moving rapidly.

For American steelmakers the discovery comes in the nick of time. It is no secret that the high-grade iron-ore reserves of Minnesota's Mesabi range are running low. And Mesabi has been supplying about 60 percent of United States iron-ore requirements.

There is no shortage of iron ore, of sorts, in this country. Taconite, low-grade ore containing 25 to 35 percent iron, is plentiful. But to shift to low-grade ore will require the investment of billions of dollars. High-grade Mesabi ore can be scooped up in huge shovels, crushed, and used directly in blast furnaces. Taconite must be blasted out, ground fine, then processed to remove waste materials. Low-grade ore makes high-cost steel inevitable, and higher steel prices would be reflected in the cost of everything from carpet tacks to automobiles; it is difficult to think of any development that would have such profound effects on the American economy.

United States Steel Corp. still holds enough high-grade Mesabi ore for about 20 years, almost twice as much as the average steel company. But even for Big Steel, representing about 30 percent of the country's steel capacity, the ore crisis is uncomfortably close.

In 1945 big John Munson, United States Steel's vice president in charge of raw materials, went to the company's president, Ben Fairless. "If we pour hundreds of millions of dollars into a taconite program," said Munson, "and then some competitor discovers a cheap new source of high-grade ore, we'll be in a bad spot. I'd like to make one last check of all possible foreign ore deposits. It will cost three or four million dollars, but, at the very least, we might find an ore supply for an eastern steel mill."

"Go ahead," said Fairless.

When the war ended, United States Steel searchers and mining engineers went out to Sweden, Labrador, Mexico, Honduras, Guatemala, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Venezuela, Brazil, and Liberia.

From the first Venezuela offered interesting possibilities. The presence of iron ore there had been known for centuries. In 1595 the Spaniards built a fort on top of a low-grade iron-ore deposit on the banks of the Orinoco and repulsed Sir Walter Raleigh when he tried to sail up the river. Most important, Venezuela's known iron-ore formations were close to the Atlantic in a range of low, jungle-covered mountains which crowded the south bank of the Orinoco.

In this dense, poorly explored area—about the size of New Jersey—Bethlehem Steel was preparing to mine a 60,000,000-ton deposit of extremely high-grade ore. A local hunter had stumbled across it in the late 1930's. And where there was one good deposit, there might be more.

To direct the Venezuelan ore hunt, United States Steel called in Mack Lake, a veteran mining engineer. Lake assembled a crew of engineers, geologists, and some bushmen and prospectors who knew the jungle country.

First headquarters were on a cabin cruiser in the Orinoco. Then the party expanded into a second-floor apartment over the movie house in Ciudad Bolivar. Two rooms to sleep in, one to cook and eat in, and the porch for a business office with maps, charts, filing boxes, and a typewriter.

INTO THE WILDERNESS

Half a dozen parties, usually consisting of two geologists or mining engineers, a bushman, a cook, a muleskinner, and 10 brush cutters, began hacking trails through the jungle. The growth was so tangled and heavy that progress in most places was step by step.

It was a country of alligators, jaguars, boa constrictors, and anacondas—a water boa which grows 35 to 40 feet in length and hunts by lying in a stream or water hole with its tail wrapped around a tree root. It can seize a full-grown steer by the snout and drag it into the water to be crushed and swallowed at leisure.

With a machete in hand the natives had little fear of a boa or anaconda. They would wade in and lop off its head. But poisonous snakes—the dreaded bushmaster, fer de lance, coral snake, and rattler—were another matter, as were the millions of ticks and flies.

As the party became jungle-hardened veterans, the ore hunt proceeded methodically but unsensationally. For a long time the best prospect was Piacoa, a hill near the Orinoco containing 200,000,000 tons of iron ore. The ore was only 45 percent iron, but possibly worth mining if nothing better could be found.

Meanwhile, Cay Burrell, a Ph. D. geologist, was growing disgusted with jungle prospecting. The brush was so thick that it was impossible to get any idea of the terrain except that immediately underfoot. Lake had discovered that the United States Army had photographed the area during the war, searching for possible Nazi submarine bases. So Burrell got a set of the photos from the Venezuelan Government and retired to Ciudad Bolivar headquarters to study them.

No one had ever prospected for iron ore by air, but Venezuelan mining engineers who had used air photos to hunt oil showed Burrell how to determine various kinds of rock structures from the pictures. Gradually, checking information brought back by exploration parties against them, Burrell, Lake, and Folke Kihlstedt, chief engineer of the party, discovered they could trace the formation of iron-ore-bearing rock. It doubled back and forth, moving away from Orinoco toward the south.

With this discovery, prospecting parties no longer went out aimlessly across the jungle. They were directed to hills which lay on the ore formation and to bends in the strata where larger ore bodies were likely.

The system worked, but results were still unexciting. Using aerial photos, prospectors staked out the La Grulla concession, a cluster of ore bodies 30 miles back from the Orinoco. But they contained a relatively small amount of ore.

By this time United States Steel's exploration parties had been tramping the jungle for more than a year. The area had been thoroughly searched and prospects were about exhausted. In mid-1946 Munson reported to Fairless that, unless more promising results developed, further Venezuelan exploration would be stopped at the end of the year.

NEW HOPE

But in Ciudad Bolivar, Cay Burrell, still piecing together old Army photos, had made an exciting discovery. He was convinced that the iron-bearing rocks, after doubling back and forth to a point 60 miles south of the Orinoco, suddenly swept westward in a great bow. They extended across the Caroni River, which flows into the Orinoco from the south and out into the savanna.

Furthermore, Army photos showed that the savanna in that area—far back from the Orinoco—was broken by several spectacular hills and mountains. To Burrell and Kihlstedt this indicated the possibility of big iron-ore deposits in an area where they had never been suspected.

The Army photos in that area back from the river were too indefinite to identify one peak from another, but Burrell thought the possibilities of finding ore strong enough to warrant a new aerial survey of the area. This would cost another $185,000, but United States Steel decided to go ahead—either to find a big ore body or to know that, if it did not, none of its competitors would either.

While waiting for Fairchild aerial surveys to complete the job, engineer Kihlstedt sent a party to investigate a small hill west of the Caroni and close to the Orinoco. According to Army photos it showed indications of iron ore. It did contain ore. But while Kihlstedt's men were studying the hill, a local businessman who owned a ranch in the neighborhood noticed their interest. He filed a claim for the mineral rights to the hill, then proceeded to ask a large sum for his holdings.

The company refused to buy. But the experience was an eye opener. East of the Caroni—in the recognized ore zone—all mineral rights were reserved to the Government. It would negotiate a concession only with people capable of developing the deposits.

Prospecting west of the Caroni River was a different proposition, a wide-open area in which anyone could claim mineral rights to land merely by filing a denouncement. A denouncement, or claim, was good for 50 years and renewable for 50 more. In this area, local businessmen and farmers, watching every move, might easily beat United States Steel to the claim office.

Kihlstedt, an ingenious Swede who thrives on obstacles, had a high card up his sleeve. With the help of a stereoscope, he discovered he could not only identify iron-ore formations on aerial photos, but could virtually put his finger on high-grade deposits. Most of them were covered by copel, a small tangled jungle tree with light foliage and dogwood-like flowers. On aerial pictures, the copel stood out in lighter shadings.

When the new aerial survey became available, the real prospecting was done in the Ciudad Bolivar office. As the pictures were studied, excitement mounted. Several mountains west of the Caroni and 50 to 60 miles back from the Orinoco showed signs of huge ore deposits. One in particular, a long rugged mountain sitting alone on the savanna, had rock slides and vegetation indicating an ore body miles in length.

Kihlstedt bided his time. It was then late March 1947. Easter week, a time of big local celebrations, was at hand. At 4:30 on Good Friday morning the Swedish engineer slipped quietly out of town in a jeep. He took with him three helpers to help cut brush on jungle-brown slopes of the mountain.

That night they slept in a native hut at the base of La Parida. The next morning the little party began working up the side of the mountain. Suddenly they came to a 30-foot cliff. It was solid iron ore. "From then on all day," says Kihlstedt, "we walked on high-grade iron ore."

The great strike caught the exploration party oddly unprepared. For 2 years they had concentrated solely on finding ore. Previously they had operated in a reserve zone. Now no one knew precisely how to file a denouncement in free territory. Kihlstedt headed for the airport and hopped a plane for Caracas to see Dr. Travieso-Paul, a Venezuelan lawyer.

With Travieso's help they prepared the necessary documents. It took the better part of a week, defining boundaries and determining and listing the legal owners of the land to which they were claiming mineral rights. When everything was in order, Kihlstedt walked into the Government claim office in Ciudad Bolivar and made his denouncement.

He was too late. A group of three local businessmen had filed 11 claims in the same area the day before.

Kihlstedt was crushed. But luck had not deserted him completely. When surveyed, it developed that the claims overlapped by only a hundred yards. The rival interests had claimed several promising ore mountains, but not La Parida, which air photos indicated was the greatest of all.

How much ore was there in La Parida? It looked big, but in other areas iron formations had often proved to be only a few feet deep. Magnetometer experts were brought in and flown over the mountain. They recorded the largest response for any ore body in the world. The figures were sent to be checked by an outstanding authority in the United States. He replied that the calculations appeared to be correct, but that the decimal point must be in the wrong place. The figures were too big.

HIGHEST HOPES CONFIRMED

Final proof of the ore body lay in drilling it. Diamond drills were rushed to the mountain. By the end of 1947 the discoverers had drilled enough holes to confirm their highest hopes. Continued drilling in 1948 and 1949 showed they had been far too modest. The ore body ran 4 miles along the crest of the mountain and ranged hundreds of feet in depth. It contained more ore than the great Hull-Rust-Mahoning mine in Minnesota, heretofore the world's greatest surface mine. In its natural state the ore averaged 59 percent iron content compared with 51 percent for present Mesabi shipments.

Several mountains 15 to 40 miles to the east also contained excellent ore deposits, though none so spectacular as La Parida, now renamed Cerro Bolivar. United States Steel staked two other claims to round out its holdings for a major, long-range, development program. When the Government closed the area to further denouncements, making it a reserve zone, United States Steel also bought the claims staked by the three local businessmen. Though they had missed Cerro Bolivar, they had his several desirable ore properties.

How much ore United States Steel now owns in Venezuela, not even the corporation knows. Of its new claims it has drilled only Cerro Bolivar. The company talks in terms of 500,000,000 tons proved and another 1,000,000,000 tons probable in all its holdings. But steel-company estimates of iron-ore reserves are traditionally low. Some experts believe United States Steel's holding alone will prove greater than the 2,500,000,000 tons taken out of the Mesabi since its discovery in the 1890's.

WORK OUT DETAILS TO DELIVER ORE

In the offices of the Orinoco Mining Co., a new United States Steel subsidiary formed to develop the property, engineers are dovetailing thousands of details which must be worked out to deliver Cerro Bolivar ore to United States blast furnaces. Mining equipment, conveyor belts, a crusher plant, a company town, a railroad, loading docks, and a fleet of giant ore boats must be designed and built.

There are two alternatives for bringing the ore out. One is a railroad running 274 miles due north to a deep-water port at Barcelona; the other is a 93-mile railroad running to the junction of the Caroni and the Orinoco. In the latter case they would have to dredge the Orinoco-Macareo River route so that huge ore boats could come 170 miles up the river.

Dredging the river looks like the cheaper method. The Orinoco is broad, deep, and fairly straight, with few tributaries near the mouth. That means little silt. The Orinoco delta is dead, no longer building like the Mississippi.

But rivers can be as unpredictable as women. The longer railroad, spanning the Orinoco on a 4-mile bridge and rolling north to deep water, might be more dependable. But it would also be more costly. Aside from the tremendously expensive bridge, building a railroad in Venezuela would cost upward of $200,000 a mile. This decision, involving tens of millions of dollars, is only one of hundreds which must be made before the ore starts flowing.

Other divisions of United States Steel are rushing plans for a new eastern steel mill. It will soon be rising from the flat New Jersey farmland alongside the Delaware River, below Trenton. By the time it is in operation, in 1955, Venezuelan ore is expected to be flowing in ample tonnage to support it easily.

In Venezuela the pioneers of what will some day be a great ore-mining company are rapidly adjusting to tropical life. The company offices are now in a high-ceilinged, tree-shaded old mansion. Surrounding it in the company compound are comfortable, screened, and shuttered brick buildings, both bachelor quarters and family dwellings.

SNAKE SCARES

Even at the temporary advance camp, a third of the way up Cerro Bolivar, the jungle is giving ground grudgingly as civilization moves in. In the early days snake scares were numerous. Boeckmann, living in a flower-surrounded hut farthest up the hill, once found a bushmaster sharing his shower. Another time the wife of a geologist, making a bed, found a brilliant-colored coral snake under the pillow. In the camp garage a mechanic, installing a spare radiator on a jeep, dropped it in panic as a snake poked its head from the top.

In spite of such diversions, the project is moving rapidly ahead. United States Steel is counting on Venezuela for at least 10,000,000 tons of ore a year. It hopes to mine it cheaply enough to compete with other ore as far west as Pittsburgh and Youngstown, perhaps even to the shores of the Great Lakes. It also plans to sell Venezuelan ore to other steel companies.

The Venezuelan Government is anxious to develop its iron-ore resources and has welcomed foreign investment in order to do so. But American steel makers, who use 100,000,000 tons of ore a year, cannot afford to become too dependent on foreign sources. The Venezuelan ore basket, big as it may be, is hardly safe enough or close enough to hold all the eggs of such a vital industry.

Both United States Steel and other steel companies must continue to develop their taconite programs. Eventually, taconites will probably be produced cheaply enough so that they will be extensively used in the Midwest. Promising ore deposits in Labrador are also being studied for development.

Venezuelan ore, however, will make possible a smaller investment in taconite plants. It will also be available in quantity before taconite production reaches substantial levels. And every ton of Venezuelan ore used means one more ton of high-grade Mesabi ore saved for an emergency.

Even though the Government has made no move to set aside some of the remaining Mesabi ores as a war reserve, the steel industry has been thinking along those lines for several years. By the time the Government gets around to taking such action, far-sighted planning by the steel makers will have made it possible to do so without crippling the country's steel production and creating a serious industrial crisis.

Crusade for Freedom as Counterpetition to Communist-Inspired Stockholm Peace Petition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to supplement the investigation which has been made of the reports appearing in the Communist Party organ, the Daily Worker.

As I have previously stated, I would not think of dignifying anything appearing in that paper by including it in the Appendix, except for my hope that by making it available to my colleagues they may find opportunities to urge in their districts the greatest concerted action possible in obtaining signatures to the counterpetition developed by sincere Americans devoted to the cause of a real peace. Since September 1, there have been five articles of this nature appearing in the Daily Worker. The first is a short article reporting upon some organization of individuals in North Carolina. I sincerely hope that the Daily Worker of September 1 is in error in this report and that the persons stated to have formed a State-wide committee in support of the Communist Stockholm petition will take the opportunity of repudiating the report and associating themselves with the crusade for freedom. The article is as follows:

CAROLINIANS FORM GROUP TO BACK PEACE PLEA

North Carolina residents have formed a State-wide committee in support of the world peace appeal, the Peace Information Center learned yesterday. Seven of the 14 on the committee are ministers and one is chairman of the NAACP youth councils of North Carolina.

Mrs. Virginia White, of High Point, was chosen secretary of the committee. The others are C. Roy Swain, a carpenter, of Forsyth County; Mrs. Edna Russell, of Weaverville; the Reverend Frank O'Neil, pastor of the Union Mission Holiness Church, Winston-Salem; Edwin Hjorkman, author, of Asheville; Nathaniel Bond, of Durham, chairman of the NAACP youth councils, W. A. McGirt, Jr., Winston-Salem, and John Myers, graduate student, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill.

The other ministers are the Reverends J. M. Miller, Rocky Mount; T. E. Bond, Catawba; D. W. Roston, Chapel Hill; G. D. McNeil, Jr., Shaw University; M. G. Brown, and the Reverend and Mrs. E. T. Williams, of Winston-Salem.

The Peace Information Center continues to receive many moving letters from throughout the country, especially from the South. Washington, Ga.; Allerton, Mich.; Harrison, Idaho; Phoenix, Ariz., and Cumberland, Wis., are a sample of the names of towns sending letters of support.

The town of Harrison, Idaho—population 300—sent 36 signatures. A farmer from Cumberland, Wis., asked for "small-size Stockholm appeals so he can use them with letters" or Christmas cards.

A husband and wife of Richmond, Va., wrote that they had signed 56—she 30, and he 26.

Many include dollar bills to help "your splendid work along."

The second is a news story from Paris appearing in the Daily Worker issued for September 4. It is reported to be by Frederic Joliot-Curie, president of the Committee of the World Congress of Defenders of Peace, and carries the headline "Two hundred and seventy-three million, four hundred and seventy thousand, five hundred and sixty-six sign world peace appeal." The article is as follows:

Throughout the world they are talking today about the appeal launched at Stockholm on March 19 last by the Committee of the World Congress of the Defenders of Peace.

This appeal demands the absolute banning of the atomic weapon and the establishment of strict international control to insure the implementation of this ban, and condemns as a war criminal the first government to use such a weapon.

After a world-wide campaign commenced only 3 months ago, and which in some countries is only now beginning, the appeal has attracted up to the present time a total of 273,470,566 signatures. The detailed results are as follows:

Albania	620,000
Algeria	266,000
Argentine	1,000,000
Australia	50,000
Austria	578,578
Belgium	153,060
Bolivia	20,000
Brazil	600,000
Bulgaria	5,801,346
Burma	1,000,000
Cameroons	22,000
Canada	300,000
Chad	16,500
Chile	50,000
China	44,000,000
Colombia	50,000
Costa Rica	4,000
Cuba	400,000
Czechoslovakia	9,500,000
Denmark	100,000
Egypt	12,000
Eire	1,200
Ecuador	20,000
Finland	616,248
France	12,000,000
Germany (West)	2,000,000
(Democratic Republic)	17,046,000
Great Britain and Northern Ireland	790,277
Guinea (French)	10,000
Holland	229,067
Hungary	7,500,000
Iceland	5,000
Iran	25,000
Israel	261,750
Italy	14,631,523
Ivory Coast	50,000
Japan	1,345,000
Korea	5,680,000
Lebanon	56,000
Luxemburg	7,000
Mongolia	686,732
Morocco (French)	19,581
Niger (French)	12,500
Norway	50,000
Philippines	50,000
Poland	18,000,000
Reunion Island	20,000
Rumania	10,046,570
Saar	2,600
Senegal	25,000
Spain (refugees)	284,995
Sudan (French)	30,000
Sweden	250,000
Switzerland	150,000
Syria	60,500

Trieste	50,000
Tunisia	50,000
United States	1,350,000
Upper Volta	50,000
Uruguay	50,000
U. S. S. R.	115,275,000
Venezuela	12,000

To this list should be added countries like Ceylon, Cyprus, Indonesia, Iraq, New Zealand, Pakistan, Turkey, the Union of South Africa, Viet Nam, and others whose campaign results have not yet come to hand.

The campaign as a whole now extends throughout the world and at the present time is being carried on in 75 countries.

When one realizes that in the majority of cases only adult persons are called upon to declare themselves, it may fairly be considered that actual signatures in fact represent some 500,000,000 human beings, or nearly a quarter of the earth's population.

This mass support is made up of people of every country, every opinion, every belief, and kind and condition. We join them in sending our greetings to all those, wherever they may be, who are striving together toward the prohibition of the weapon of aggression and mass destruction, the atomic bomb. We urge them to continue and extend their efforts to achieve this end.

The banning of atomic weapons is the necessary first step to ease international tension; granted this, the peace of the world, which now stands in grave peril, can yet and will be saved.

Mr. Speaker, while it is unfortunate if anything like 1,350,000 Americans have been duped into signing this appeal, I am sure that our press and radio, as well as all organizations in this country, except the Communist Party, will be anxious to do everything they can to counteract any such assembling of signatures of misled Americans by united and effective work in supporting the Crusade for Freedom between now and October 24, when the signatures of those approving the crusade will be placed in the freedom bell in Berlin.

A Willful Little Man

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, when the special privileges and advantages given them by the Wagner law were—at the expense of the public and their own members—misused by a few—a very few—labor leaders, the public became outraged and demanded new labor legislation. The Congress, after long hearings, earnest debate and consideration, wrote the Taft-Hartley Act.

Certain labor leaders, opposed to any change, denounced the T-H Act as a "slave labor" law.

In their efforts to prevent its enactment, they were joined by President Truman who exerted all his political power in an attempt to defeat it in Congress.

But the will of the people, as always when they put their minds to it, prevailed, and the law was placed on the books. But not until the Congress, by an overwhelming vote, was forced to override the President's veto.

Thereafter, though President Truman promised to enforce the law, he has endeavored in more ways than one to sabotage it.

Notwithstanding his efforts and the violent, persistent opposition of a few others, the law has demonstrated its fairness, its efficiency, its workability.

Under it, membership in the unions has increased as have wages. Working hours have been shortened. Under it, according to the president of UAW-CIO, the best contract ever written between labor and management has been negotiated without even the threat of a strike.

Naturally, the Taft-Hartley Act is not perfect, but its imperfections can and will be ironed out by subsequent Congresses.

AROUSED, THE PEOPLE WILL NOT BE DENIED

To that fact the President is singularly blind. The legendary Missouri mule's chief characteristic is stubbornness, but the stubbornness of that mule is mild, compromising, and conciliatory when compared with that of President Truman.

The President prides himself upon loyalty to his friends even when their disloyalty to the Nation's best interests has been demonstrated. That is going just a little too far, even for a President.

THE REDS

The people want no truck with the Communists nor the Communist doctrine. The President cannot be ignorant of that feeling; nevertheless, he sticks by Acheson, who sticks by Hiss, who, throughout his public career, stuck by the Communists' program.

The President, though he apologized to the Marines, has never apologized to the American people for his reference to Stalin as "good old Joe" when he said, "I like old Joe. He's a decent fellow but he's a prisoner of the Politburo."

Notwithstanding the public demand for legislation curbing Red efforts, the President, with the CIO as one of his advisers, bitterly opposed the enactment of the demanded legislation, characterized Republican attempts to oust Communists from Federal positions as a "political 'red herring'."

The President, looking for votes in New York City, yielding to certain labor leaders and left-wingers, refused to consent to the writing of any bill curbing Reds.

With an election coming up, the Members of Congress, even those in the Democratic Party who desired to go along with the President, were forced to write an anti-Red bill. Like the Taft-Hartley Act, it may have its imperfections but those can be ironed out by subsequent Congresses. It is far better than no law at all. Mr. Truman has objected to "Red-curbing" legislation.

Stubborn, as always, and angling, as always, for votes, the President vetoed that bill. His veto was overridden by a vote of 286 to 48 in the House; 57 to 10 in the Senate.

The will of the people cannot, it will not, be denied when they make known their wishes.

The salvation of this country, the preservation of the Republic, depends upon the people. They will get what they want if and when they vote intelligently.

Tuesday, November 7, is the date.

Elect then a Congress—and in 1952 a President—who will think first of your welfare, the security of the Republic.

Articles and Editorial Comment From Various Newspapers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. JENNER
OF INDIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, I ask to have unanimous consent to have the following articles inserted in the RECORD:

First. About That "Living Lie"—views of the News-Sentinel, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Second. Time To Liquidate Commitments, by Charles T. Henderson, appearing in Cleveland Plain Dealer, September 21, 1950.

Third. Copy of telegram from Ashland Daily Press, Ashland, Wis., September 22, 1950.

Fourth. Editorial from Washington Post, September 22, 1950, Alas, Poor Clio.

Fifth. Article by Arthur Krock, New York Times, September 21, 1950, A Game Others Can Play and Will.

Sixth. Article by George Dixon, Washington Times-Herald, September 27, 1950, Washington Scene.

Seventh. Article, United States News and World Report, September 29, 1950, West To Open UN Door to Mao—If He Behaves.

Eighth. Article, Washington Daily News, by Charles Lucey, September 27, 1950, Truman Knew He'd Succeed Roosevelt Before Election.

Ninth. Article, Bangor Daily News, George E. Sokolsky, March 21, 1948, These Days.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of September 25, 1950]

ABOUT THAT "LIVING LIE"

Senator JENNER'S "living lie" castigation of the new Secretary of Defense shocked many sensitive souls. The language at the time seemed intemperate and not a few of the incomparable Hoosier's admirers thought the choice of words might defeat their purpose, which was to challenge General Marshall's fitness for a high civilian post in the Government. But after Senator JENNER had twice laid his case before Fort Wayne audiences last week, a great many of those who had criticized his language commended his courage.

Senator JENNER is not popular in Washington. This fact in itself is scarcely a damning trait, since popularity and statesmanship are not necessarily synonymous. He is the target of the Drew Pearsons, Alex Campbells and other apologists for an administration bent on giving America away.

Senator JENNER's popularity is not the issue. Nor is the question of whether his bare-knuckle attack on the defense post appointment alienated some votes. After all, Senator JENNER, as he himself puts it, is expendable. What happens to one Senator isn't the point.

The issue is this: Is General Marshall, acknowledged by the Hoosier as a great soldier, a "living lie"? If that is the truth, then the good American will be more concerned by its implications for the future of his country than in the choice of words required to tell the truth.

Twice during his whirlwind visit to Fort Wayne, Senator JENNER said he made the "living lie" remark with his eyes open. Twice he repeated the threat made to him by a prominent Democratic Senator that if he gave that speech on the floor, he would be destroyed. The charge was not the impulse of a moment. Nor was it politics. For if that were the only motive public expression of such a remark would be very bad politics, particularly when it shocked and irritated members of Senator JENNER's party.

Actually, the perspective of time, rather than any of his contemporaries, will be the final arbiter on the accuracy of Senator JENNER's accusation. We don't think, however, there was a soul who heard the fiery Hoosier speak here last Thursday who would doubt his sincerity or convictions. And when a man of Senator JENNER's courage and discernment, with eyes open, speaks out against treachery and conspiracy against his country, his voice cannot be stilled by either the smears of his political enemies or the muffled groans of timid members of his own party.

Let's take another look at the "living lie" tag. That would seem to mean a person who pretends one thing but is really another. For all practical purposes, it could mean a distinguished general deluded, misguided, or even deceived into betraying his country by superiors.

Senator JENNER, on his recent round-the-world trip, stood on the deck of the partly sunken battleship Arizona during a memorial service for the dead of Pearl Harbor. Hundreds of bodies lie within that battered hull. How many of those bodies would be there now had General Marshall, then Chief of Staff, warned Pearl Harbor to be prepared for a Japanese attack by telephone rather than through commercial channels, which delayed arrival of the message until after the sneak attack? Considering the gravity of the situation, wasn't it odd and quite abnormal that Pearl Harbor should not have been alerted in the shortest possible time?

With Senator JENNER, many good Americans believe we were pushed into the war with Japan by deliberate provocation of an attack. The Senator quoted ex-Secretary of War Stimson to the effect that Roosevelt, with Marshall and his inner circle, courted war. We have never seen this version denied.

Moreover, General Marshall still doesn't remember where he was on December 6, the day before Pearl Harbor. His wife thinks he was home; but he isn't sure. Most people have vivid recollections of their whereabouts on this tragic occasion.

General Marshall's acceptance of a mission to bring peace in the Chinese civil war can only mean he favored putting Communists in the Nationalist Government, or was merely a tool to those who did, without protest, because that is what he tried to do. We have never read that he rebelled at trying to sell out a World War II ally, China, now on the Soviet side of the fence. General Marshall would not dare to suggest we form a coalition American Government, with the Commies in choice seats. Yet he found it easy to do so to a then free country which today might be an ally instead of a Kremlin satellite. Today, would American boys be dying in Korea had the Truman-Acheson-Marshall team not given the Kremlin an assist?

Senator JENNER is saying that General Marshall's record is contradictory to Mr. Truman's claim that he is now fit to head a department charged with the security of our country. The hypocrisy and double-dealing in Washington should collapse of their own weight and they would, if more of our public servants had the courage of Senator JENNER to expose them.

TIME TO LIQUIDATE COMMITMENTS

(By Charles T. Henderson)

The secret commitment business of the operatives in Washington has to be liquidated.

To be specific on the meaning of liquidation, it must be stated that it includes notification to all the world that we will no longer recognize secret commitments when they are revealed, as revealed they always have to be eventually, no matter how far their consequences may have proceeded clandestinely.

The Nation's purse strings are the key to that part of the problem, of course. As the next step, and equally as a matter of course, is a careful audit of all commitments now on our books as alleged to be due. Many will be written off entirely, many more will be written down, but the remaining total will come well within our capacity to deliver, and well within the standards of national righteousness.

REPUDIATION

But this spells repudiation? It does, and why not say so? A well-considered repudiation, as the diplomats say, but, as regrettable as it is, a necessary one. If we had had the courage and the character to face the facts at the start, and as they were presented to us, they would not now be piled into the toppling mountain which threatens to destroy us.

When it is gravely stated by an honest and informed, but cautious and orthodox, commentator that the American people have been committed to more war than we have the military strength, even in soldiers, to deliver, the necessity of taking action instantly becomes frightfully apparent. But it was known long before the German phase of our warring was over that we were being led into a position where we would be compelled to fight the world, or try to.

And so it turned out. Arguments and diagnoses and learned twitterings about balancing power alike have no bearing on the fact that we are in a jam, and the two corollary facts, first, that we've got to get ourselves out of the jam, and, second, that we cannot fight our way through it. General Eisenhower's crack—if he really made it—that we can lick the world, if we are unified, was its substance, was a very silly and dangerous one. For there is not unity among Americans and there neither will be nor should be.

TOO MUCH TALK

Preferring to believe that he did not say it, the fact is that the sentiment, wrong and deadly as it is, has marked much of our general talking and thinking. The dear people themselves are not blameless in the present pass, let them blame their leaders as they may. The blame is not pertinent. The only pertinent thing is the jam we are in, and the undertaking to get out of it. Obviously our leaders are quite useless—they are the ones who got us in the fix we are in. Acheson and Truman could be impeached and hanged higher than Haman and we would still be teetering on the edge of the destruction which those two worthies were very far from being alone in creating.

With all of its faults, which are those inherent in any assemblage, our only chance of cutting the Gordian knot which secret commitments and suicidal obligations have tied around our Nation and our people lies with what we call our Congress, and Congress already has the sword with which to cut that knot. All Congress has to do is to swing it, right smack on the appropriations which are always demanded to back up the blunders, or worse, of those doing our international operating.

Feeble as Congress is, there is yet genius in democracy, and Congress is the only place where the light of democracy still burns, dimly to be sure, but with a spark of effectiveness in it. Four or five men in Congress can yet provide the leadership which is all that is lacking. TAFT can provide the character, the intelligence and the patriotism of the Pym and Hampden, who led the English Parliament's revolt against Stuart military tyranny and wrong taxation—for the two are always twins. But TAFT is no Cromwell. Maybe none will be needed in the present parallel.

It is not a fanciful parallel, nor need there be a fanciful application of its principles. An orderly, constitutional committee of the present Congress will do the work with sessions open to the public, and absolutely no privilege of immunity on the old gags "not in the public interest" to tell the truth—as if war were in the public interest. In the meanwhile, not a dollar of public funds to be appropriated for secret use by anybody, especially the President, for any purpose related to war, or peace or anything else, and the only military funds expended to be for service payrolls.

Only by such forcible liquidation of secret commitments and obligations can the perpetual war with which we are now confronted be diverted, or brought within endurable limits. American patience may be yet another insufficient material, quantitatively, for the amount of war that has been bitten off for us to chew.

[Telegram from Ashland (Wis.) Daily Press]

United States Senator WILLIAM JENNER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Congratulations on your General Marshall speech. It makes you one of our great Americans in today's crisis. Letter follows:

Respectfully.

[From the Washington, D. C. Post of September 22, 1950]

ALAS POOR CLIO!

The President preferred to sidestep a question at his press conference yesterday on the concurrence or otherwise of General Marshall in the instructions which he took with him on his mission to China in 1945–46. Mr. Truman says he was a special envoy of the President, and went to China to carry out the President's written instructions. In other words, the general even in his retirement behaved like a good soldier, and the general's disclaimer at the Senate Committee the previous day of any responsibility beyond that thus stands unqualified on the historical record. It will now be added to the Republican indictment of the State Department in the November elections.

It is odd, looking over the Truman statements on China policy and General Marshall's subsequent exposition of that policy, to think of General Marshall as a robot, speaking lines after he had been cranked up. There can be no precedent for it. When a person of General Marshall's eminence is given a mission, the usual thing is to talk over the instructions, so as to find out whether the envoy believes in and approves of his mission. Only in that way can you be sure of a sincere prosecution of the mission. General Marshall's career has hitherto supported the view that this has been his practice. "Give me the facts," he is wont to say, "and I will make up my own mind." The function of State Department officials in the China matter was to dish up the facts; as hired help they could do no other.

The understanding that this newspaper has hitherto entertained about the Marshall mission was the logical one—that when civil disorder broke out in China the diplomatic experts supplied the briefs on all possible alternatives of American action. One was nonintervention (which would have been our own preference) another was all-out intervention on the side of Chiang Kai-shek, yet another was all-out intervention on the side of the Communists, and the fourth was mediation. These alternatives are said to have been given to General Marshall. He is said to have plumped for mediation. If, in spite of the Truman assurance in 1945 and 1946, he wasn't consulted, and urged mediation on the Chinese without having committed his own beliefs, then the situation is passing strange.

The way that the public has been misled both on the GOP side and on the administration side on China is hard to stomach. The President has avoided the issue before; now he avoids it again. The administration seems ashamed in 1950 to acknowledge what in 1945 was regarded by almost everybody in America as a noble experiment. So the buck is passed to the hired help, and the Republicans are left with more material further to tar and feather the career officials. In sympathizing with them, let us also condole with the Muse of history.

IN THE NATION

A GAME OTHERS CAN PLAY, AND WILL

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, September 20.—Organized labor, having clearly failed to persuade the country or a large congressional majority that the legislation which bears the name of Senator TAFT has enslaved the workers and should be replaced by a very slight modification of the Wagner Act, is trying to retire the Senator from public life on the votes he has cast which dealt with foreign policy. That is the best strategy available to organized labor. But the same cannot be said of the administration and its choice of the spokesman who espoused this strategy in a speech at the convention of the American Federation of Labor at Houston, Tex., yesterday.

There are several reasons why this is very vulnerable procedure:

1. The spokesman selected by the administration, W. Averell Harriman, is the Presidential assistant whose task it is to coordinate foreign policy and help thereby to make it more effective. Important to this task is bipartisan support in Congress. Nothing could be better calculated to destroy the basic understanding in this enterprise—that no partisan politics is to be engaged in by any of its principals—than an assault of this type on Senator TAFT by one of the President's chief deputies in that field.

2. There is much fairly to be criticized in votes cast by Mr. TAFT on the foreign-policy proposals of the administration. But to say that, if they had prevailed, "Soviet objectives would have been furthered in the world" invites an impressive tu quoque which can be documented by the foreign-policy record of the administration for several years and by the record of Mr. Harriman himself. In that debate, which Mr. Harriman, with the obvious approval of the President, invited, the testimony of Yalta and Potsdam, and activities and statements by Secretary Acheson and General Marshall with respect to the Far East, will have great weight.

China and Yalta

In this connection two statements made yesterday by General Marshall in reply to questions from Senator JENNER illustrate how effectively critics of the administration's foreign policy can cite instances by which this has "furthered Soviet objectives":

"A. I accepted that commission to China [in 1946] because the President had to have a representative, there was trouble, and a resignation of a delegate, he asked me to go, and I said 'Yes.' Then, while I was in this room for a week undergoing the Pearl Harbor investigation, the policy of the United States was being drawn up in the State Department, and that was issued while I was on the ocean, going over there. The policy, of course, speaks for itself, the message from the President. Once in China my job was to stop the fighting.

"B. I do not think it would have been my position [to 'protest the policies adopted at Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam which handed half of the world on a silver platter to Stalin,' the text of this JENNER query]. I was very much engaged in a war at the time and the meetings with the Soviet commanders and staff, and those are not simple affairs, I might say. The political meetings took place at other places with which I was not familiar. Admiral Leahy [President Roosevelt's military adviser] attended practically all the political meetings, but the general agreement, and all, I read largely in the press afterward, so far as that was disclosed."

In at least two of these meetings Mr. Harriman was among the deep insiders.

Other points for counterattack

3. To say, as Mr. Harriman did, that Senator TAFT failed to appreciate the fact that "American leadership is essential to the world" is to say what cannot be demonstrated on the record. This is fundamentally different from a charge that the Senator's views on how that leadership could best be exercised have proved unsound.

4. Not to give credit for sincerity to a public servant whose sincerity has been thoroughly established, while asking full credit for sincerity on the part of those whom he opposed, is poor tactics in any controversy.

5. In singling out Mr. TAFT for attack before an organized labor convention Mr. Harriman obviously was playing politics for a particular audience and, with the blessing of the President, giving organized labor additional assurance that its personal loves and hates, like its social-economic programs, are law to the administration. Only the day before the President had dismissed Robert N. Denham as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board for interpreting the Taft-Hartley Act and his duties under it in ways that organized labor found objectionable.

This may be good politics—though not for an official in Mr. Harriman's position—but the attitude of Congress on labor legislation does not indicate that it is.

There is one interesting personal aspect to the choice of Mr. Harriman to speak at Houston and his enthusiastic acceptance of the mission. He and the Senator are both members of a senior society at Yale which is as famous for its brotherly devotion in collegiate and later life as it is for the grisly symbol of its being. Seldom, if ever, have two members of this close-knit order, bound by secret oaths of enduring fealty, been publicly ranged in a political gouging match. That is the more notable because, when Mr. Harriman was a freshman on the Yale campus in the fall of 1909, the biggest man there, not only because his father was President of the United States, was a senior and future club brother named ROBERT A. TAFT.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Ferald]

WASHINGTON SCENE

(By George Dixon)

I have just received a confidential report from a source so deeply inside the administration inner circle he has claustrophobia. It isn't a pretty story, but I feel you should have it placed before you for your consideration. This insider assures me the facts are as follows:

He declares this thing of putting Gen. George C. Marshall in as Secretary of Defense is a barney to take the Democrats off the hook with the voters.

He says General Marshall is only going to stick on the job until after the November elections.

He says that General Marshall will then be replaced, amid great administration hoopla of returning the national military establishment to civilian control, by the United States High Commissioner of the American occupation zone in German, John J. McCloy.

This insider says the whole gimmick was worked out at the White House before poor Louie Johnson, the President's trusting pal, was given the boot. Poor Louie wasn't in on the plot. He didn't know what hit him, and doesn't yet.

The scheme came to a fruition after the political brains at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue decided poor Louie was too big a burden for a political party to carry in an election year. The brains thought around for someone big enough to still the growling of the electorate.

General Marshall was the outstanding choice. But he is 69 years old and craves nothing more than to spend his days on his farm at Leesburg, Va. When approached he made this very forcibly known.

My source declares that brought the plot to a head. The deal was consummated for the distinguished general to stay in there long enough to appease the voters, then announce that he had found his return to public life too much for his years and strength after all.

This done the White House will make a great thing about taking the national military establishment completely out of politics by appointing McCloy, a Republican.

I suppose McCloy is a Republican—if you can call a fellow who began working for the Democratic administration back in 1940 a Republican. In that time McCloy has had a succession of very good administration-appointed jobs.

This GOP stalwart from Philadelphia left a law practice 10 years ago to become a consultant to his fellow Republican, F. D. R.'s Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson. A short time later McCloy was appointed Assistant Secretary of War.

Among his jobs he handled State Department liaison for the Army. He attended the Casablanca, Cairo, and Potsdam Conferences.

After that he was made president of the World Bank, from which he resigned in 1949 to succeed Gen. Lucius D. Clay as our occupation chief in Germany.

My informant says there's another political angle to restoring the national military establishment to civilian control. It is designed to forestall the Republicans from installing some great military figure, such as Ike Eisenhower, as Secretary of Defense, should the GOP take over in 1952.

One of Washington's legal luminaries, a member of the Army Reserve, wishes very much to avoid being summoned back to active service.

He grudgingly filled in a questionnaire sent him by the Army. When he came to the question: "What languages do you speak?" he answered: "None."

Listed in the Washington telephone directory: "Truman Boyles."

What about?

[From the United States News and World Report]

WEST TO OPEN UN DOOR TO MAO—IF HE BEHAVES

Door to the UN is being left ajar for Chinese Communists. But they won't get in as puppets run by Stalin.

Idea is to let Mao Tse-tung have his say if he stays out of Korea, shows that he doesn't take his orders from Moscow.

It can lead to United States recognition in the end. But the whole thing is touchy business. A misstep can mean war.

LAKE SUCCESS, N. Y.—Here is the story of how Communist China is being shown a way into the United Nations, a way of getting much of what it wants without war, as told by delegates to the UN who know what is happening.

Sooner or later, Communist China will be seated at the UN, assuming, of course that the Communist regime behaves itself. If the Chinese Communists send their troops into Korea, if they attack Formosa, then it's all off. They would get war, real war.

The whole affair, as the story is told, is to be handled smoothly and slowly. It is recognized that China policy is a political issue in the United States elections just ahead. The timetable isn't set. Communists will not get China's seat in the UN right away. There will be no "appeasement," no secret deal. But steps are being taken to show Mao Tse-tung, the Chinese Communist leader, that peaceful waiting will pay off better than fighting Russia's wars for Moscow.

Inside the UN, many delegates believe Mao knows that Russia, which pretends to be helping Communist China, is really working in Russia's interest. They feel that, if Russia wanted to get Communist China into the UN, Russia's delegates would go at the thing quite differently.

Mao is pictured as eager to get his delegates into the UN where they can do their own talking. Most UN delegates here feel that the west should have some means of talking directly to the people who run all of mainland China.

The opening step, now being tried, is an effort to find some pretext for inviting Chinese Communists here.

Canada, for example, got the Assembly to approve creation of a special committee to study the question of China's membership. And India is pressing to have this committee invite Chinese Communists to appear before it.

Both the United States and Russia have asked the Assembly to take up the question of what to do about Formosa. There, too, when the matter is referred to committee, the Chinese Communists might be invited to state their claim to the island.

Western idea is to give the Chinese Communists a foot in the door of the UN, where the west can talk directly to Mao. Russia, of course, sees the plan. UN delegates expect Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Vishinsky to do what he can to block it. They also expect Secretary of State Dean Acheson to go slowly on all matters concerning Communist China in an election year in the United States.

Next step, as now planned, will be to talk directly to Chinese Communists if and when they get to the UN as observers or witnesses. Moscow, if these estimates are correct, can't treat Mao like a North Korean Communist. Mao is pictured as strong in his own right, who won't be ordered around to fight wars while Russia sits on the side lines.

After that, as western delegates see it, Mao will have to make up his mind. All the western governments can do is to show him what the UN can offer.

Formosa, for example, now is a UN question. Mao, inside the UN, would have a chance to state his government's claim to the island and, perhaps, get full legal title to Formosa in time. One route to this end proposed by western delegates is to have Formosa placed under a UN trusteeship. As UN delegates see it, Mr. Truman and Secretary Acheson both have paved the way for such a settlement by declaring that the United States does not intend to keep Formosa for itself and wants no special position—that is, military or naval bases—there.

Korea is likely to set the timetable on Mao's entry into the UN. If the United States and UN forces reach the thirty-eighth parallel in about 2 months, western delegates believe, Mao will understand that Russia has lost its gamble there.

UN membership for the Chinese Communists, full membership, as the western delegates see it, may come at the spring meeting of the UN Assembly, if not before. It depends, they say, on whether Mao is willing to wait.

Mao, they admit, may not wait, may get impatient and try to seize Formosa by force or move into the Communist-led war against the French in Indochina. But Mao, they believe, would prefer peace in order to consolidate the Communist hold on China. Aim of United States officials and other delegates here, as it now shapes up, is to open a way for Mao's Communists to be heard in the UN, to make direct contacts with the west, bypassing Moscow, avoiding war.

TRUMAN KNEW HE'D SUCCEED ROOSEVELT BEFORE ELECTION

(By Charles Lucey)

Among Democratic leaders who helped nominate Harry Truman for the Vice Presidency there was a conviction Franklin Roosevelt would not live out his fourth term and that in choosing the Missourian they were really picking a President.

Harry Truman himself apparently thought so long before the people voted in that November of 1944.

That's the story told in Jonathan Daniels' new book, the Man of Independence, published today. Mr. Daniels is the son of the former Navy Secretary and envoy to Mexico, and was himself White House press secretary in the latter Roosevelt days.

"You are not nominating a Vice President of the United States but a President," Mr. Daniels quotes Edwin W. Pauley as telling party leaders before the Chicago Democratic Convention that year.

And in September after Mr. Truman had been named F. D. R.'s running mate, when a friend named Edward McKim told him he would be living in the White House before long, he is quoted as saying:

AFRAID I AM

"Eddie, I'm afraid I am."

Mr. Daniels' Truman story is pegged on the intimate and friendly approach. He gives the Man of Independence more than a shade the better of his judgment most of the way but acknowledges, for example, that he had an impossible case in trying to defend Pendergast politics before the Senate.

The author, editor of the Raleigh News and Observer in Raleigh, N. C., has pulled together his stories of others who have written on past Roosevelt-Truman phases, and has added enough reportorial fact to make his work a contribution to history of the period.

But it isn't just a story of Harry Truman. James F. Byrnes, of South Carolina, gets an awfully rough handling in this book, and Mr. Truman apparently was glad to help out on it.

QUESTIONS MARSHALL TRIP

The stature of Gen. George C. Marshall as diplomat to China and as Secretaray of State is brought into serious question. And Mr. Daniels cites—and tries to explain with soft words—the amazing conduct of Mr. Roosevelt in seeming to promise the job of 1944 running mate to almost any politician who dropped past his office.

"No sensible friend of Roosevelt will try to make neat, punctilious logic out of Roosevelt's behavior at that convention," Mr. Daniels says. "There will be no easy explanation of his various letters, his apparently vacillating positions. He was tired. The scissors of time had cut his strength * * *."

Of Mr. Truman's adoring devotion to General Marshall, Mr. Daniels writes:

"Sometimes indeed he (Truman) acted when some members of his staff thought that Marshall was being a little stuffy, as if Marshall were his walking equivalent of George Washington and Robert E. Lee.

NOT SO CONFIDENT

"Some others who admired the General's great abilities as a war leader were not so confident of his abilities as a diplomat or foreign minister. As Secretary of State they thought he depended too strictly on the proposals which came up to him in the line of command in a field with which he was less familiar than he had been as a professional soldier."

Admiral William H. Leahy was one not so sure of General Marshall.

"I was present when Marshall was going to China," the admiral told Mr. Daniels. "He said he was going to tell Chiang that he had to get on with the Communists or do without help from us. He said the same thing when he got back. I thought he was wrong then, both times."

Mr. Daniels discloses that "in Marshall, Truman had a Secretary of State whom he trusted sometimes, some of his staff felt, to the point of his own injury."

Jimmy Byrnes is needled through much of the book. Mr. Daniels dates the Truman break with Mr. Byrnes as beginning with the Moscow Conference of December 1945. He thought Mr. Byrnes went too far in accepting Russian positions in regard to Bulgaria and other satellites, and said that "Byrnes lost his nerve in Moscow." Mr. Truman told Mr. Daniels that Mr. Byrnes "got the real riot act" after Moscow and is quoted as saying Mr. Byrnes "failed miserably as Secretary of State."

The fallibility of men's memories is an interesting sidelight of the Daniels chapter—and a most useful one it is—on the maneuvering that saw Henry Wallace kicked out and Mr. Truman dropped into the Vice Presidency. Mr. Daniels is quoting Mr. Pauley, Ed Flynn, George Allen, Sidney Hillman, and many others, and at times is forced as a reporter to note the discrepancies in the tales they tell.

Behind the whole book is a very human study of a quiet, modest, retiring, studious Harry Truman arriving in the Capital as a Senator with his Bess and Margaret at a time when, as he said, "I am the poorest Senator financially in Washington."

THESE DAYS

(By George E. Sokolsky)

ALARMS! ALARMS!

The record ought to be kept straight in these days of alarms and excitements. A historical error can never be corrected; it sets up a chain of events which moves in the direction set by the error until it wears itself out, or is diverted by other events or is stopped by force.

Among a free people, those who participated in the errors must be held responsible for them. It may be pleasant for those who built reputations and made political profit by making mistakes to have us forget what they did and said when the going was smooth. However, now that their mistakes are being uncovered, they shout, "Stop Thief!" We have to assume that those who supported Roosevelt's policy at Tehran and Yalta and Truman's policy at Potsdam, and such trivia as Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods are responsible for our present misfortunes. It will avail them nothing, for they face the facts of their own incompetence. There is no longer any cover-up.

Therefore, when Jimmy Byrnes, or George Marshall, or Averill Harriman gets terribly excited about the evils of the Russians, I challenge them to deny the charge that they were accessories before the event, that they condoned in advance the rape of European civilization by Stalin, that Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill, in advance, consented to the despoilation of our allies and the countries we liberated. At Potsdam, President Truman joined in these operations.

Nor, were these men and others to confess their sins, were they to assume moral responsibility for what they did, even if they pleaded ignorance, it would be possible to forgive them while pitying the country that fell into their hands. But when they deliberately reverse themselves and, shouting louder than anyone else, demand a war to correct their errors, we must say to them that if it is another war they managed to get for us, we may have no alternative but to offer our sons as sacrifices, but we want better, more competent, and more truthful managers. We cannot trust those who lied to us.

On February 13, 1945, it was reported that War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes returned to Washington from Yalta and disclosed that President Roosevelt proposed the formula for the solution of the Polish question. Mr. Byrnes did not say that he, Byrnes, opposed that solution nor did he tell us then that other arrangements were made there, even an arrangement making Soviet Russia the successor to Japan's rights and privileges in Manchuria in direct violation of our treaties with China since 1844 and constantly renewed. Mr. Byrnes said nothing about that. Nor did General Marshall or Averell Harriman, or any of the ex-New Deal commentators who are trying to run General Eisenhower on the Democratic ticket as part of a war scare.

On June 15, 1945, General Eisenhower told a press conference in Paris that so far as he is concerned, there is nothing to indicate that cooperation with the Russians is impossible. He said that "peace lies with all the peoples of the world, not just for the moment with some political leader." I never quite knew how the people would produce peace unless they did it through their political leaders in control of their government. The fact is that they have not produced a peace, nor a peace treaty, nor a formula for peace, and they are all again talking about another war as though it were seasonal, like Easter or Christmas.

As for General Eisenhower's belief in our ability to cooperate with the Russians in June 1945, he said that after Yalta and Tehran, and he must have known in his position what was done at those conferences, or perhaps he was as deceived as Mr. Hull seems to have been. At any rate, those who connived at Tehran and Yalta and those who condoned and defended Tehran and Yalta ought not to be believed. They are not to be trusted. Until we get a new and undefiled leadership, there is no need of alarms, excursions, and incitements. If Soviet Russia chooses to make war on us, let her not face those who helped Stalin to deceive the American people.

Prompt Action in Military Defense Assistance Program Is Imperative To Maintain Peace—Delay Could Lead to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted, I submit herewith a report which I am sending to Hon. CARL VINSON, Chairman of the Armed Services Committee, concerning the Military Defense Assistance Program as I observed it and learned about it on a trip to Europe recently.

REPORT BY LEROY JOHNSON, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, CALIFORNIA, ON STUDY OF THE MILITARY DEFENSE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AND RELATED MATTERS FOR THE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MADE BY VISITING COUNTRIES INVOLVED

Pursuant to the instructions of Chairman CARL VINSON, I proceeded by air to Bremerhaven, Germany, arriving there on July 20, 1950, for the purpose of studying the Military Assistance Program and related military matters. I remained abroad until September 9, when I proceeded, via Army Transport Rose, to New York, arriving there September 18, 1950.

MILITARY ADVISORY ASSISTANCE GROUPS (MAAG'S)

During those 2 months most of my investigations were in those countries in western Europe in which we have Military Advisory Assistance Groups (referred to abroad as "MAAGs"). These countries are: the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Italy, and France. I also visited Sweden and Spain to inquire into the situation in these countries, as our relations with them in the near future may well have a significant bearing on our own military posture and potential in Europe and the Mediterranean basin.

Each of these groups (MAAGs) has as members a representative of the Department of State, and a representative of each of the Armed Forces. These men work with their counterparts in the various foreign nations trying to develop the defense needs of each particular country—recommending the relative priorities of the myriad military items required, determining which programs in a particular nation will build its defenses most effectively and at the least cost, analyzing the potential of each country for the manufacture of military equipment, munitions, etc., and assisting in the development of a master defense plan for western Europe by studying out the mission each country should assume in order to assure the greatest success for the master plan.

I was impressed by the high caliber of the men who compose these various groups. They must have been selected with extreme care, not only on the basis of outstanding military record and efficiency but because they also have the talent of friendly association with other people. They are not only military advisors, in their special fields, but they function also as American ambassadors of good will in their dealings with their foreign counterparts. I want to make it clear that these remarks are not confined to our military personnel on these groups. The same fine talents were equally evident in the State Department representation on each group.

Of the numerous fields which these groups explore, of signal importance is the manner by which the military programs in each particular country contribute the most to our own defense effort, when considered as part of the collective defense program of the North Atlantic Treaty organization. It is now painfully evident that each country (the smaller ones in particular) cannot build a balanced modern defense force and have the collective effort of the free nations thus become an integrated, sound, reasonably economical defense organization. Consequently, the present aim is to develop such a military program in Norway, for instance, as will promote the most security not in itself but as an integrated part of the defense effort of the other cooperating countries. The underlying precept is that each of these countries is now incapable of defending itself adequately against aggression, but the group, working together, can assuredly build a balanced defense system capable of defending each and all of these countries. It is hoped that in the future each country will concentrate its efforts on only that part of the defense program it is best capable of strengthening and hence bring the maximum total military strength of all to bear. Thus and only thus, the entire grouping of nations may in time be able to repel any aggression, no matter its source or victim. If an aggressor knows, as the North Atlantic Pact provides, that an attack on any one of these countries will be considered an attack against all, and will result in immediate retaliation from the entire group, then it will be prevented from picking off relatively small and helpless countries one at a time. The urgent need is to bind together this joint defense effort and to get each country equipped and trained for its part of the job in the shortest possible time.

EXPEDITIOUS FURNISHING OF EQUIPMENT AND TRAINING IN ITS USE IS IMPERATIVE

In developing this program it can readily be understood that after having decided what a country should have and can use to the best advantage, the equipment must be provided to implement that decision. But it should also be recognized that an equally important part of the effort is the training of those who are to use the equipment.

Consequently a large training program is going on concurrently with the furnishing of the arms and equipment. The recipient countries provide students to be trained in the use of the equipment. Some are taught in the United States at our various service schools. Some are taught at a school operated by EUCOM. In all parts of the American Zone are schools teaching these foreign students in the use and upkeep of rifles, artillery of various calibers, tanks, vehicles, various types of aircraft, radar, and in the tactical principles in the use of various kinds of equipment, etc. It is a comprehensive program; a program essential in order that the recipients of our aid know how to handle the equipment furnished them as well as to repair and maintain it. The underlying idea in selecting the students is to designate men for this training who, by training and aptitude, are potential teachers. They in turn will train others in their own countries and thus the countries will ultimately have enough trained men to administer their own programs. The results from this effort in training have been good as to quality, but the program is entirely too conservative in size.

Also, although there was money in the 1950 appropriation for a considerable acquisition of material to be sent to these countries, only a very small volume of goods was actually sent. Only from 5 to 10 percent of the total authorization and appropriation has arrived in the form of military goods. I was told that some requisitions have been as long as 6 months in being filled, and yet the goods are readily available. Now that much larger funds have been authorized and appropriated, it is hoped that there will be a far greater expedition in shipments of all requisitioned goods. Time is the most important element in this program. Failure to recognize this and to fill the needs promptly may plunge all of western Europe into disaster and seriously jeopardize our own national security. The time to stop trouble is before it starts, and the MDAP is designed to do exactly that. If the program is carried out promptly we have every reason to believe that the result will be what we anticipate. If the program drags it may be merely a waste of time and money and place us in a very dangerous position. The combined power of these North Atlantic Allies in men, productive capacity, and in military striking power, if properly armed, is tremendous. Delay and inertia in getting this program adequately implemented might provoke the very aggression that we are trying to forestall by this program, thus not only injuring irreparably the very countries we are trying to help but also dangerously imperiling our own security.

ONE ARMY UNDER SINGLE COMMANDER WOULD MAKE MDAP MOST EFFECTIVE

This brings us to another aspect of this problem. It is the proposal made by Mr. Churchill and also by Mr. Schuman of France that the countries involved in the MDAP program have a common army and other defense forces and that these forces be employed as a unit under a unified command. I favor this program enthusiastically as it will bring the maximum strength to this effort. With a unified command over the entire group of forces, with a master defense plan worked out by the combined efforts of all the participants, the most important area of the free world would be in a tremendously improved position to defend itself against attack. Such an organization, equipped with the best quality and adequate volume of modern weapons and auxiliary equipment, need not fear any aggression of the type now so feasible in Europe. This, as I see it, would be the accomplishment of the first phase of the mission of the Atlantic Pact countries in the military field, namely, the neutralization of the present threat of aggression against western Europe and western Germany.

EUROPE IS THE KEY TO SUCCESS OF CONCEPT OF UNIFIED ACTION AGAINST AGGRESSOR

There is one thing that we should keep clearly in mind in the development of this program in Europe. That is that Europe is the key to the success of the entire concept of military aid to our allies and the joint utilization of our military strength and productive capacity. In the group of countries with which we are concerned (I am including Greece, Turkey, and Iran) there are over 260,000,000 people. Moreover, these countries are one of the most mighty industrial areas in the world. Unless the plan of unified defense is made to work in Europe it will be futile to try it elsewhere. The close association of these European countries with the United States, and indirectly with the Western Hemisphere, Australia, and South Africa, would in effect unite for mutual protection all free people of the world and the great majority of the industrial capacity of the free world. Therefore, I urge as forcefully as I can that our Chairman and the committee over which he presides will use its every last ounce of power and influence in seeing that this program is greatly expedited. We cannot toy with the security of the free world or with our own. The quicker the joint action of this group becomes effective, thereby enabling the free world adequately to resist aggression, the safer will our generation be, as well as those to follow. Time and again I was told by members of groups representing other countries that what they want is a definite plan. It was repeatedly told that "if a plan is given us we will see that the part of the plan assigned to our country will be carried out." I cannot attest that these people have the authority to do exactly what they said. Yet I received the firm impression that they were reflecting not only their own viewpoints but those of their political leaders as well. The people I met in these various countries are acutely aware that they are in a dangerous position. However, they also realize that if we are willing to put out the necessary effort to help them get armed rapidly, all countries in Europe, as well as the United States, joined together in a firm determination to resist aggression by joint action and adequately equipped with modern weapons, the feared aggression may not and probably will not come.

JOINT AMERICAN MILITARY ADVISORY GROUP (JAMAG) COORDINATES PROGRAM FOR EUROPEAN ASSISTANCE

The Military Defense Assistance Program is a part of a broader program. The broader program dovetails the efforts of the State and Defense Departments and the European Cooperation Administration. These agencies work together in trying to strengthen our European allies in the economic field so their productive capacity may be enlarged, buttressing the weakened economic fiber of these nations. As this effort succeeds, each country becomes thereby better able to contribute to the common defense system.

In the diplomatic field the effort being made is to achieve a world ruled by law rather than by fear and force as is the case today. Even the free world could not forever maintain peace through the threat of military force. A way to an understanding with those in the world whom we believe are threatening the peace of the world must be found. Otherwise the future is forever to be one of fear and uncertainty for everyone; the end result will surely be war on a global scale, a war that might wreck civilization. America was caught so miserably off base in Korea that we cannot but wonder if the same situation can suddenly arise in Europe.

To coordinate all this effort and make the maximum progress toward peace—which is our real objective—the Joint American Military Advisory Group (JAMAG) has been formed. This Group, headquartered in London, is composed of two major subgroups. One is charged with planning under the North Atlantic Treaty. The other is charged with the Military Assistance Planning Advisory Groups. This JAMAG organization and its branches screen the requests of the various MAAGs and keeps them informed of the top-level planning of the whole effort. The JAMAG also encompasses what is done by our diplomats, leading military men in Europe, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the State Department to weld the United States with the United Kingdom and other European nations in a defense plan capable of withstanding any aggression. It has numerous committees aimed at developing a rounded program and performing such essential functions as keeping the Defense Department informed of State Department activities, and vice versa, letting the planning group know what the group that implements the program is doing, and all in all keeps the program moving consistently and in harmony in every respect. Certainly, in an effort of this nature, the most important purpose is to obtain adherence to an over-all program, with as little duplication and confusion as possible.

WESTERN GERMANY SHOULD BE ARMED AND ITS INDUSTRIAL POTENTIAL USED FOR THE PROTECTION OF ITSELF AND WESTERN EUROPE

I gave particularly close attention to this matter. I talked with a great many people about the problem of getting Germany properly armed. Germany has often been referred to as "the key to the economy of Europe." It has major industrial resources; it has the population; its people have the discipline and the ability to produce vast stores of military and industrial goods. Germans have twice proved this ability in two great wars, which have proved devastating to them because they were outnumbered and outgunned. It is foolhardy, in my opinion, not to provide arms for these people in the three western zones of Germany. The Soviets have been arming eastern Germans for a considerable time. They are using the so-called German police as a subterfuge and organizing them into combat units of various types and sizes. In some instances I learned, from authentic sources, that the Soviets are now contemplating the organizing of these groups of so-called police into divisional units.

The Germans have always been accustomed to seeing visible symbols of power that would protect them against foreign aggression. They have always had a large and well-disciplined army. They have always felt that they could look to this group of professional soldiers, airmen, and naval experts to protect their country against any penetration by aggression. Today there is not a single gun in Germany available to any German. They know that should aggression start they will be absolutely helpless. A man high in authority in the American organization in Germany (whose name I cannot reveal) advised me that our people have already learned that many Germans in the western zones are signing up with communistic or semicommunistic groups. They are doing this, I am told, not because of a belief in communism, but as a result of fear that if invasion comes and they are seized by the invading forces, they could point to the fact that previous to the invasion they had been members of Communist groups and therefore should receive decent treatment. Anyone who has been in Germany and France and fought in one of the world wars realizes how sensitive the French are about the arming of the Germans. We cannot ignore this natural feeling. However, I am positive that any arming of the Germans would be of a type which could be easily controlled by the remainder of the allies in the group, so that Germany could not again become the militaristic and belligerent nation she has been in the past. The ideal is that ultimately, once Germany has demonstrated a willingness to live in the family of nations as a peaceful member and once international security is achieved by collective efforts, Germany be admitted to the western nations family. Her period of probation must depend on her own conduct and the progress of the United Nations, but I believe it is generally agreed that ultimately Germany should become a part of the western society of nations. Consequently we must take reasonable steps—and promptly—to arm Germany. We must make Germany capable of arming herself at least in part in order to have the ability of protecting her own citizens and her own territory. This should be merely to supplement the protection to be given by the group in western Europe, which we are trying, by means of the MDAP under consideration, to arm for their own protection.

No reasonable person can afford to ignore the tremendous industrial potential of Germany. Germany had immense industrial plants previous to the war. These have been largely wrecked. Some have been revised, but others should also be. In this great industrial complex can be produced many things useful to the western defense. If there is hesitancy about permitting Germany to manufacture munitions and other war material of value to the armed services, she can assuredly produce many other things that will be collaterally helpful in developing our mutual defense system. Germany should be set about making some of them.

The need for the rebuilding of the German industrial system is evident. The near-sighted and crude concept of reducing Germany to an agricultural nation has been wholly abandoned. Modern nations cannot be wiped out. It has been tried several times in Poland and each time the Polish people finally reemerged as a nation. It is the international hope that the German people have learned from their two mistakes, that they will in the future turn to peaceful pursuits, and that this great nation may ultimately qualify for membership in the United Nations. But in the meantime, I see no harm, and much good, in using the German productive capacity to help develop an organization to maintain the peace of Europe. Some of our American representatives in Germany indicated to me that more and more the Germans are insisting upon the reconstruction of Germany, politically and physically, so she can assume the station of a respected and peaceful member of the family of nations. In assisting her toward that goal, we should permit her to add her mite to the defense effort we are making in western Europe.

One of the problems facing Germany, and especially in Berlin, is the problem of unemployment. In Berlin I noticed an unusually large number of night policemen. Upon inquiring about this, I learned that this was not because of excessive danger of burglary, assault, robbery, or other crimes being committed or contemplated but was a measure initiated by the American group in Berlin to ease the unemployment problem in Berlin. Our effort to build our defense system with German assistance would help this problem also, as well as build up our peace insurance in that explosive area.

SPAIN SHOULD BE WITH US IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF A DEFENSE SYSTEM FOR WESTERN EUROPE

I visited Spain to gather first-hand information from our military attachés at Madrid and from others. Also, I took the opportunity of talking with most of the members of the Grand Military Staff of Spain. As nearly as I could determine, this organization corresponds closely to the American Joint Chiefs of Staff. It is the group of men who formulate and carry out the military policies of Spain.

Spain is a country with which we should find a way to cooperate, in our effort to build a strong mutual defense system in Europe.

Portugal is in the Atlantic Pact. It has had a dictator for 20 years. We seem to have no difficulty in working with him in developing the MDAP.

We should not let our political antagonisms blind us to such an extent as to prevent Spanish participation in our MDAP for western Europe. When your home is threatened by fire you do not junk the fire extinguisher simply because its manufacturer is not in accord with your politics or morals.

Spain's strategic location is magnificent. It commands the entrance to the Mediterranean. It has the only substantial defense line in Western Europe. The Pyrenees, used as a defense line, permit great results to be achieved by a small army. With this range of mountains in our control, and with the cooperation of the country behind them, we could repel a gigantic attack.

As a military matter, Spain is the most strategic air base in the entire world. Operating from the Iberian Peninsula, the air fleets of any nation can sweep all of Europe except the extreme northerly part. It can cover the entire Mediterranean area, the Near East and Northern Africa. Such planes would be in reach of the greatest industrial potential in the world, excepting North America, and some of the most valuable natural resources of all kinds in the entire world. No area in the world, in the light of present day conditions, is as strategically located from the standpoint of defense as the Iberian Peninsula.

With Spain on our side we could control access to and exit from the Mediterranean. That is of crucial importance, and plainly evident. It would also mean that North Africa would be friendly territory. America learned the great importance of that in the recent war. It is sheer nonsense to turn a cold shoulder to a country of 22,000,000 people who could be so helpful to us, if the military storm should break over Europe.

Few actions of the Congress in recent times could ultimately be so meaningful to American defense and the future of the free world as the recent appropriation on behalf of Spain. The strategic implications are so sweeping, the defense potential so stupendous, that all the free world stood to benefit enormously from this effort to breach the unrealistic moat between western nations and Spain.

And yet, during my visit in Europe, the President announced his intention not to permit the expenditure of these funds on behalf of Spain.

This is a shocking abuse of Presidential authority, even leaving aside the grave effects this unwise move has on western defense efforts. As in the case of Presidential withholding of Air Force funds in the amount of $735,000,000 in the 1950 military budget, and as characterized unanimously by the Committee on Appropriations, this type of action amounts to an item veto, which is an unconstitutional act by the President.

My personal reaction to these repeated and studied acts by the President, contemptuous of the will of the Congress, flippant in approach and derived from the conviction that the President and his minions can construe all national and international problems better than the American people through their representatives in Congress, is that renewed and more determined efforts must be made by the Armed Services Committee and by the Congress generally to recapture the rapidly vanishing congressional powers being so cavalierly usurped by the executive branch.

Cancellation of the aircraft carrier United States after thrice being authorized by the Congress; vetoing appropriations of the Congress in an unconstitutional manner; high-handed administration of the defense program of America over the strong protests of the Armed Services Committee; act after act eating away at the fiber of the American Government, taking from the people their influence and control in the decisions of their own Government. How ironic "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" sounds in the light of these acts contemptuous of the desires of the American Congress.

The Presidential item veto of the Spain appropriation is, in my view, not only unconstitutional but constitutes a terrible disservice to the cause of the Nation's defense in an hour of extreme peril.

It ranks right along with the recent acts of the administration in pulling the pillars from under the Armed Forces in the name of economy while the northern Koreans were girding for their June 25 attack on South Korea.

How long such nearsighted actions, such cavalier mishandling of the Nation's vital problems, can continue without a violent protest from the American people, is an interesting, challenging question.

SWEDEN

Sweden is not in the Atlantic Pact. Its foreign policy is one of neutrality and no one can blame Sweden for adhering to this policy, if she can make it work. Norway, Denmark, and Holland had the same policy, but they learned to their sorrow that ambitious, warring nations no longer pay any attention to neutrality if the neutral country is needed in a military campaign that the great country is waging. However, Sweden is not as necessary in the defense of western Europe as are the other countries in the program. If Sweden were in the group we would be committed to defend her in the event of an attack on her territory. She faces the Baltic and it would be easy for any country to the east or south to make a surprise attack on Sweden such as Germany made on Norway. That would be a hard situation for us to cope with as it might take a terrific number of troops and enormous quantities of equipment to dislodge a well-trained force already in possession of the country. Furthermore, the entrances to Sweden from the south and the east are very difficult for a military expedition, if a strong force should be in control of Sweden.

THE REAL PURPOSE OF THE SOVIETS IN ITS PROGRAM OF PENETRATION AND POTENTIAL AGGRESSION IS TO SUBDUE THE UNITED STATES

In studying our problems for a number of years and listening to witnesses and talking to all kinds of people about it, I have formed one imperishable impression. It is this: The conduct of the Soviets against countries like Greece, Iran, Korea, countries behind the Iron Curtain, Italy, France, etc., are merely incidental steps in their major plan. The Soviets do not necessarily need Italy or Greece to carry out their ultimate plan. However, their purpose is to weaken or absorb certain nations that might be friendly and helpful to the United States in the event of a conflict with the Soviets. The major purpose of the Soviets is to get themselves in a position where they can conquer or neutralize the United States of America. The only reason for their activity in other countries is to lop off possible American friends; to liquidate numbers of people who might be helpful to America in the event of a struggle; to limit, constrict, and reduce the potential striking power and the potential resources which might be at the command of the United States in the event of a conflict with the Soviets. The attack is not made directly; it is made under cover. It is made by political and economic penetration but it is all aimed at the same end, namely, to create a world where the Soviets would be in a position to strike successfully at the most powerful free country in the world, the United States of America.

We should not deceive ourselves about the situation. We are the object of the aims and attentions of the Soviets and to subjugate us is what they believe is their mission in the world. Since we have only about 6 percent of the world's population, it is obvious that the matter of relative manpower is very vital in the struggle of the type that might follow. In the free world in Europe alone, there are roughly 250,000,000 people who would like to see the western form of political and economic life continued and expanded. That is why it is so essential that we develop our defense plan without any hesitation and without delay. Our strength would neutralize the possibility of the accomplishment of the major Soviet mission. In fact, if the status quo could be held for a number of years or decades it is conceivable that trouble within the Soviet areas might be very helpful to those who are now the objects of their envy and hatred. Dictators have no easy situation. The fall of a dictator usually precipitates squabbles and fights and brings about division, indecision, and confusion. People are chafing under dictatorial decrees of the Soviets. It is a well known fact that the armies of Hitler when they marched victoriously into Ukraina were received as liberators. Had it not been for the fact that Hitler was a madman devoid of any objective consideration of the problems before him, the Ukrainians might now be on our side. However, Hitler so insulted them and enraged them that they promptly fell back into the Soviet orbit. That underlying tension is still there. While it is hard to rebel in a police state, the lid may some day blow off. But it takes time to generate the steam necessary to bring about the explosion which will blow the lid off dictatorship and oppression. That is why I am so heartily in favor of joining with these western nations to the full extent of our economic power and our military ability and genius to bring about a closely knit group of countries properly armed, trained and disciplined to be ready for any difficulty which may arise. This might be the deterrent that will give the time lag which will work in favor of freedom and of the United States.

THE TROOPS IN EUCOM ARE WELL TRAINED AND THEIR MORALE IS GOOD

While in Germany I had the pleasure of seeing the First Infantry Division in three different exercises. The first was an anti-aircraft battalion shoot at a place on the Baltic. This battery had a very interesting exercise and it was my privilege to see their equipment and to witness the shooting. By modern standards, their equipment is out of date. This is the kind of equipment that was used in the recent war and now with only 5 years elapsed much more modern equipment has been developed, particularly, radar equipment.

I saw the engineers of the First Division span the Rhine River with a pontoon bridge. This was an exceptionally interesting exercise. The Navy participated in the exercise. In addition to helping haul the segments of the bridge to the place where they were to be connected, the Navy had a large boat with some heavy anchors. Thus the connected segments of the bridge were held in place while others were being put in, until the entire operation went from shore to shore. The bridge was made in 3 hours less time than any previous effort.

Then I attended the final exercise of the First Division maneuvers. The First Division maneuvers lasted over 1 month and were actual simulated battle conditions, both as to the equipment and the manner in which the men lived. The final exercise was a display of the fire power of the division, and we saw them shoot every kind of a weapon from a 30-caliber machine gun to a 90-millimeter cannon. The exercise was witnessed by a great many foreign observers, as well as a great many of our military leaders in Europe. It was a tremendous spectacle and emphasized the terrific fire power of a modern infantry division. In addition, we had a tank attack, exactly as it is carried out in actual warfare—which was also a tremendous spectacle.

Our old friend, Maj. Gen. John Dahlquist, who proved to be such a fine witness on many of the important bills passed in the Eightieth Congress, is now the Commanding General of this division. The morale of his troops is excellent. The First Infantry Division is battle-worthy. Twice a year they maneuver and they keep themselves in first-class physical shape and are continually developing their marksmanship and other activities which makes them wonderful soldiers. The housekeeping affairs of the division is handled by another unit, so that every man may be trained primarily for combat and be continuously ready for any eventuality. The First Division is one of our best-known divisions. It looks and acts like a worthy successor of the great First Division I knew in 1917 and 1918. It is well-led by a great leader with much battle experience, as well as wide knowledge of the administrative problems of the Army. It is well-staffed by junior and senior officers and has a group of men in the ranks that are the equal of any other unit in the armed services.

I saw a good deal of the Air Forces and they seem to be in fine condition. They are also ready for any eventuality and are kept in continuous readiness. Their commander is Lt. Gen. John K. Cannon, who is an able, resourceful, and experienced Air Force leader.

When I say for any eventuality, it must be understood, of course, that these contingents of our forces are small compared to what would be required if a major conflict should start. We have, really, only a token force but it is in excellent shape and in fine condition, and for its size, unequaled by any similar sized force in the world.

It was my privilege to be briefed by the EUCOM staff officers. The briefing was most interesting and they are likewise alert and ready for any situation. The Commanding General in Europe, Gen. Thomas Handy, is well known to the members of our committee. He is a man with a vast combat experience, as well as great experience in staff and administrative problems in peace and war. General Handy was Deputy Chief of Staff and had other important key positions in the Army. He is a leader of men and knows how to get along with his associates and get the most efficiency out of them. In my opinion, he is doing a splendid job. We are fortunate to have such fine leaders at the head of our various groups in the EUCOM. All they need is some tools to work with and they will produce results in the event that their services are required. I only wish we had more personnel. We simply must have more to be safe. Five to ten divisions more and an equal number from our western European allies would ease the tension a lot.

Appropriations, Second Session, Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as is customary at the conclusion of a session, I submit a summary of budget estimates and action thereon in the appropriation measures considered and adopted thus far during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. Only four appropriation bills were considered during the entire session, not counting the District of Columbia bill which is not a charge on Federal revenues.

Budget estimates for appropriations totaled $54,321,138,822, which were reduced by $1,893,212,194; amounts enacted totaled $52,427,926,628.

Reductions totaling $40,269,500 were made in estimates for contractual authority and loan authorizations of $2,998,799,500, allowing $2,958,530,000 for these categories of obligational availability. In addition, provision for an over-all cut of $550,000,000 was included in the omnibus appropriation bill, and since this figure was a minimum rather than a fixed sum, total reductions against all items aggregated not less than $2,483,481,694.

There follows a tabulation summarizing the amounts in comparative form:

Comparison of budget estimates, appropriations, and authorizations, 2d sess., 81st Cong.

Your Congressman Reports to His Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, September 19, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the Eighty-first Congress is approaching the end of its sessions after two long and difficult years of legislative work. This is a proper time to report to my constituents on some of the major problems which confronted us during the past 2 years. The people of my district are entitled to know how their Representative in Congress served their interests and that of the Nation as a whole. They will have an opportunity to pronounce judgment on my record of service on election day.

During each of my campaigns for election, I fully and fairly made known my views on all major political and economic problems. I made it crystal clear to them what they could expect of me as their Representative, how I would represent them, what I would fight for, and what I would fight against. They elected me by overwhelming majorities, in 1948 by more than 3 to 1. I am very grateful to the people of my district for this outpouring of confidence in me. I believe I have fulfilled every promise made to them. In the few instances when some of my people disagreed with me, time has proved me right. There is but one instance in which some of my supporters still honestly differ with me. There too, I am confident, the future will justify my vote.

For the third time in succession my party—the Democratic Party—has designated me unanimously for another term in Congress. The Liberal Party also is unanimously supporting my candidacy, as it had done twice before.

Labor's League for Political Education, in its congressional scorecard issued for the guidance of American Federation of Labor members and the public generally, has given me a perfect score on 10 selected key issues in Congress, including such matters as the Taft-Hartley Act, rent control, public housing, minimum wages, antitrust laws, social security, and others.

Similarly, the Congress for Industrial Organizations—CIO—published a supplement to the CIO News where the voting record of all Members of Congress was appraised on the basis of 13 selected issues, and I was rated as having voted "right" on every issue.

The magazine, New Republic, in a special supplement containing a progress report on the Eighty-first Congress, gave me a score of 100 percent on 15 major issues, among them the Marshall plan, reciprocal trade, broadening social security, veterans' pension plan, antipoll tax, Brannan farm plan, and others mentioned previously.

More recently, the well-known liberal organization, Americans for Democratic Action, labeled my voting record perfect on what they considered the 15 most important issues. These included some of those already mentioned by the other organizations, as well as Korean aid, FEPC, middle-income housing, point 4 aid to underdeveloped areas, the natural gas bill, health reorganization plan, Defense Production Act, and the Wood-Mundt-Nixon bill.

During the first and second sessions of the Eighty-first Congress over 12,000 pieces of legislation were introduced, including public and private bills and various resolutions. Several hundreds of these reached the floor of the House for action. Those and many others were carefully studied and analyzed by me. I voted at all times in the best interests of the people of the United States and of my district, but never provincially and never contrary to my platform pledges.

My record in Congress is an open book. I modestly, yet proudly, present this record to my constituents and invite them to acquaint themselves with my efforts and accomplishments. I do not pretend to be infallible. Suggestions and constructive criticism will always be welcomed by me.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

During my campaign in 1948, I expressed the following views:

> Peace and democracy at home gain when democracy abroad is healthy. The Marshall plan to rehabilitate Europe strengthens our economy and helps destroy subversive influences. Antidemocratic doctrines must be vigorously combated. We want peace without appeasement.
> Strengthen the United Nations. A strong United Nations demands a strong United States of America. Discard the veto power. Establish an international police force to prevent aggression.

In the 2 years that have passed since I stated these views communism has made serious inroads abroad, particularly in Asia, but it was stopped in Europe where countries like Italy, France, Greece, and others were threatened. Thanks to the aid given them through the Marshall plan, the march of communism in Europe was successfully contained. The United States has demonstrated to the world that she desires peace, but that she is not desirous of attaining it through appeasement of communistic efforts at enslavement of the world.

Unfortunately, the situation is different in Asia where open warfare and bloodshed are the order of the day as a result of the invasion of South Korea by the Communists of North Korea, using Russian arms and serving as a spearhead of Russian imperialism in the Far East. If we had had a stronger United Nations, if the UN had discarded the veto which Soviet Russia is utilizing for its own interests and to the detriment of the UN and world peace, if the UN would have had a strong international police force to deal with acts of aggression—it is very likely that the Soviet aggression in Korea would never have been risked and communism would have been stopped in its tracks in Asia as in Europe.

I have supported the Marshall plan during the past 2 years and I shall continue to support it in the future. I shall also continue my efforts to build a strong UN, as I have done in the past. I voted for the Korean-aid bills originally, and more recently supported the bill providing additional funds for military assistance.

On the matter of war, I stated on the floor of the House of Representatives on March 7, 1950, as follows:

> The American people do not want war. I believe the Russian people do not want war either—if only they had the opportunity to speak their mind freely. But if war nevertheless engulfs this world, it will be due to the insatiable lust for power on the part of the present rulers of Soviet Russia.

On June 26, 1950, the day after the brutal and unwarranted attack by the Communists on South Korea, I supported the declaration of the UN Security Council condemning this aggressive act and I lauded President Truman's decision to aid the UN. I said:

> No one can consider it a warlike act for us to carry out our obligations as a member of the United Nations to protect our weaker sisters from brutal, unprovoked aggression. No one in our time has done more than President Harry S. Truman to bring about permanent peace in every part of the world. * * * His action with reference to Korea and the Far East is further proof of his determination to maintain peace. Our country and all the peace-loving peoples of the world will be ever grateful to him for his patience until action could no longer be withheld, and for the speed and forthrightness with which he ordered our Armed Forces to the defense of democracy when no other alternative was possible.

On June 30, 1950, President Truman graciously wrote to me with reference to this subject. He said in part:

> Your assurances will be helpful indeed as we go forward with the steps necessary for the promotion of peace and stability in the world.

PRICE CONTROL

Next to the problem of war, the most immediate threat to our democratic way of life is the spiraling inflationary situation which took on sudden momentum after the outbreak of the conflict in Korea. Prices of food, clothing, and other necessities of life began to soar sky-high, and hoarding once again reared its ugly head. During my campaign in 1948 I said:

> Runaway prices of food, clothing and other necessaries make it harder and harder for you to make ends meet. American family life cannot survive without food, shelter, and clothing which the people can afford.

It would extend my report to undue proportions to cite the many instances in the past 2 years when I spoke up in Congress against high prices and in favor of effective price control and the interests of the consumer. I have appealed for an end to profiteering and for the necessary measures to stop hoarding.

More recently, when Congress was considering the Defense Production Act of 1950 to establish the necessary controls for the present emergency, I supported the establishment of such controls and urged granting the President the necessary powers to control prices, wages, rationing, credits and commodity speculation. On August 2, 1950, I said in the House:

> If we must invoke controls, price controls, wage controls, and other controls we ought to go all out and make them enforceable.

The next day I said:

Price and wage stabilization is intended to eliminate and prevent profiteering, manipulation and speculation, and to protect the consumer, the wage earner, and the investor from undue impairment of their living conditions.

And on August 10, shortly before the House voted on the Defense Production Act, I made a final appeal and issued a warning, as follows:

In a few moments you are going to be called upon to stand up and be counted and have your names recorded permanently in the records of this Congress so that your children and the children who come after them may know who stood up here and said: "Send them over to fight, but keep from them that which they need in order to be able to fight. Regiment the boys into the armed services. Regiment little lobbyless John Q. Consumer back home. But stay away from the untouchables who can pressure us with their powerful lobbies. Exempt the agricultural exploiters, the commodity-exchange manipulators, and the real-estate interests. Control the little man and woman in the home and in their daily activities, but let the money lenders and the money changers and the gamblers run riot."

The time will soon come for you to be recorded; let your conscience be your guide.

RENT CONTROL

Coupled with the problem of rising prices, profiteering and protection of the consumer is the question of rent control. During the campaign in 1948, I said:

We must continue the fight against exorbitant rents. Low-cost housing and slum clearance laws must be enacted.

I have fought consistently for an effective rent control act. I am aware of the great hardships to the people in the large metropolitan areas who are threatened by any relaxation of rent control and I raised my voice in Congress on numerous occasions to bring this matter to the attention of all legislators. Typical of my remarks on this matter are the following:

January 18, 1950:

I think every man, no matter what his politics may be, who comes from any metropolitan community, any large municipality, must stand for an extension of rent control at this time.

March 30, 1950:

There are still millions of families who urgently need the protection which this law (i. e. rent control) affords them, and there are still hundreds of thousands of families who have to live doubled-up because of lack of sufficient housing * * *. In view of the fact that rent has always been a basic factor in the cost of living for many millions of families, and in view of the slow but gradual increase in unemployment in many sections of the country, we should not be too hasty in suspending this means of protection which will unquestionably hurt the lower-income groups very severely. I fear that if we allow the rent control law to lapse, that if we do not renew it for another year, our inaction or refusal to extend its protection to those millions of our citizenry who still need it, may lead to a chain of events which would seriously undermine the economic stability of many areas of the country * * * Let us not encourage economic chaos; let us not contribute to economic instability. Rent control is still a matter of emergency legislation. It is absolutely necessary.

June 13, 1950:

Who wants this continuance of rent control? Is it, as you have been told by some of the opponents of the bill, only the left wing or the Communists or those who think along the same lines? Six of the largest and most influential national veterans' organizations of this country came before our committee and asked that these controls be continued. The CIO and the A. F. of L. asked that these controls be continued.

After a bitter struggle, Congress voted to continue the rent control law until the end of 1950 with a provision for an additional 6-month extension for local municipalities which enact laws therefor.

The Korean war and the resulting emergency, of course, make it imperative that rent control be continued, and strengthened. It will be one of my major tasks to fight for a more stringent rent control law in the next session.

HOUSING

The enactment of housing legislation, including adequate provisions for slum clearance and low-rent housing projects, is of utmost importance. In this matter I supported President Truman and the plank in the 1948 Democratic platform which said:

This Nation is shamed by the failure of the Republican Eightieth Congress to pass the vitally needed general housing legislation as recommended by the President.

Throughout the session of Congress I urged housing legislation for the benefit of low-income groups, including cooperative housing projects. When the executive board of the CIO passed a resolution on February 16, 1950, urging Congress to approve the middle-income housing bill, I had that resolution reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the same day so that all Members of Congress might read it. When the bill came up before the House on March 20, I described to my colleagues the cooperative housing movement in certain western European countries as I had observed it on a mission for the House Committee on Banking and Currency. I said:

The surest way to make a convert to capitalism and to individualism is to give a family a piece of property or an equity in it, no matter how little. Give him the opportunity to call something his own and he will fight to the death the efforts of socialism or communism to take it away.

When some Members wanted to retain certain obnoxious provisions in the housing bill, I frankly stated on March 22:

They say those provisions are not special legislation; they do not take care of special groups. They just take care of big business, the financial fraternity of the country, the big builders. Of course, when we do anything like that we are never catering to special interests. But when you try to take care of the forgotten man who is never forgotten when it comes to taxes, the fellow in the middle-income group who is carrying the tax burden of our Government, you are told we are socialistic, communistic, collectivistic, discriminatory, everything except what it is.

LABOR, SOCIAL SECURITY, AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

During my campaign in 1948, I said:

The aged, the ill, and the unemployed must be cared for. A broad program affords your best protection against depression and the awful hazards of illness and disability. The gains of labor must not be impaired.

My opposition to the Taft-Hartley labor law is a matter of record. My votes against this bill and some of its rigid antilabor amendments have been duly noted by the American Federation of Labor, the Railroad Brotherhoods, the CIO, and all patriotic labor unions. I shall continue to work for the removal of its restrictions on labor unions and the laboring masses. At the same time I shall continue to work for sound labor relations during the present emergency and to keep strikes at a minimum in order to maintain production at a high rate.

I have been an ardent supporter of the Social Security Act and worked for its expansion to include 10,000,000 additional people. The expanded act finally went into effect recently thereby substantially increasing benefit payments to many millions of our citizens. Due to the more liberal provisions of the act many who were ineligible before will now be entitled to receive social-security payments. In time, it is hoped, the act will entitle our entire adult population to the benefits of old-age and survivors' insurance when they reach the statutory age. I shall continue to work toward that goal.

In the matter of unemployment, I constantly advocated that the necessary measures be taken to prevent a rise in unemployment. Among such measures, I urged the repeal of wartime excise taxes on a large number of commodities and articles in order to stimulate production and purchasing of such articles on a larger scale. In a statement to the House Ways and Means Committee urging repeal of such taxes, I said:

I am also fearful of the effect this will have in the near future on the employment situation, not only in the industries affected by the excise taxes where already considerable unemployment is being reported, but even in other fields.

Fortunately, at the present time our unemployment figures are among the lowest in our peacetime history. For those who unfortunately must remain on the unemployed lists I wholeheartedly favor maximum payments under unemployment insurance.

TAXES

During my campaign in 1948, I said:

Low income earners should not pay taxes. The first $3,500 of income should be exempt.

Throughout my incumbency of office I have supported the idea of tax exemption for the low-income groups. Notwithstanding the need for higher taxation resulting from the war in Korea and our defense needs, I still believe that the burden of taxation should be taken off the shoulders of the small wage earners and placed upon the high income groups, big business and the big corporations. When I advocated the repeal of excise taxes, I did it primarily because it hurts the small-income people most. The Korean conflict, unfortunately, postponed the possibility of repealing the excise nuisance taxes.

I also earnestly support an excess-profits tax to stave off excessive profiteering on the part of a small group at the expense of the rest of the population. An excess-profits tax at this time would help take the burden off the small taxpayer.

I urged repeatedly that we pay for armaments and defense as we incur the expenses therefor. That means more taxes now.

I voted against adjourning the Congress until we enact an excess-profits tax. I earnestly hope we will do so before the end of the year.

In the matter of excess profits, I said:

One need not be an economist to know that you control profits when you control prices. A primary result of price control is the limitation of profits.

CIVIL RIGHTS

During my campaign in 1948, I said:

Safeguard freedom of opinion and speech. Sustain our traditions of justice and fair trial. Eliminate poll taxes. Abolish discrimination.

I have worked most diligently to safeguard civil rights in this country, notwithstanding the hysteria of the times and the befuddled thinking of conservative forces who are dividing our people at a time when unity is most urgent. As the leading Nation of the free world we should be a model of democracy and should set an example in practicing the principles of tolerance, understanding, and the treatment of minorities in our midst. Abolition of discriminatory practices in employment, in education, in the Armed Forces, in housing, and other phases of our activity will not only safeguard our freedom here, but will help us gain many friends throughout the world for the cause of democracy.

During the term of the Eighty-first Congress, I spoke up on numerous occasions for the maintenance of civil rights. Here are a few such examples:

January 12, 1950:

Never before in world history was there greater need for human understanding, good will, and lasting peace than in the present postwar critical period. * * * False prophets and hatemongers in our own country spread doctrines of bigotry and hatred which serve only to undermine the unity of our people at a time when such unity is urgently needed for our very survival.

January 18, 1950:

I hope that on Monday of next week this House will call up for final action the FEPC bill that has been receiving so much attention throughout the country. At this time I want to direct your attention to the fact that one more step in the right direction to eliminate discrimination in this Nation has been taken by the Army, pursuant to an order issued by Gen. Gordon Gray. He has issued an order which requires that Negro troops be integrated into every branch of the service. * * * Last year I introduced a bill in the House which would attempt to accomplish the same purpose in the National Guard. * * * The enactment of the FEPC law on a national scale will go a long way toward eliminating those very situations which bring about such riots and lynchings, it will be one further step in the accomplishment of true freedom, freedom in the democratic way.

The FEPC bill was finally called up in the House on February 22, 1950, and I voted for it. Although it was stymied in the Senate, I continued to urge final passage of this bill and other civil-rights bills.

I urged home rule for the 900,000 disenfranchised Americans living in our Capital City of Washington.

In continuing the struggle against intolerance, on March 22, 1950, I said:

My view is that wherever bigotry and intolerance of our fellow men is practiced, in any part of our country, it should be exposed. Every effort should be made to eliminate the cancerous growth of hatred and prejudice wherever it shows its ugly head.

When the courts of New York upheld the restrictions limiting the huge housing project of Stuyvesant Town to whites only, I advocated that the United States Supreme Court reverse that decision. I stated as follows:

The effort to reverse that decision has significance which goes beyond the field of housing or even the problem of racial discrimination. Unless the decision is reversed it may set a precedent which in time may prove ominous to our whole American pattern of democratic government.

When reports reached me that segregation and discrimination are gradually and successfully being eliminated at our military bases and camps, I said on August 15, 1950:

At a time when our democratic system is on the defensive the elimination of racial segregation in our Armed Forces is a very encouraging factor. It is the best reply to Communist hypocrisy and double talk. Nations throughout the world cannot fail to realize that as a Nation we stand united, in peace or war. They, likewise, will realize that the rights of minority people and human rights for all are best respected and defended in countries which practice true democracy.

COMMUNISM

During my campaign in 1948, I said:

Fight communism, but not at the expense of Americanism.

I have favored elimination of subversive and disloyal elements from Government service, but I am vigorously opposed to any punishment being meted out to any of our citizens who may have different political views. Thought control is not in the American spirit or tradition. It is the practice of dictatorships, not of democracies.

Discussing the question of democracy versus communism, I said on May 2, 1950:

The late Franklin D. Roosevelt, at a time of national emergency, told the people of this country that the only thing we had to fear was fear itself. Should another emergency arise, the American people will not be afraid to rise to the situation. Our problem is how to avoid that emergency, how to stave off disintegration from within and destruction of our freedom from without.

On another occasion, on May 24, I brought to the attention of Congress the excellent article by David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union, published in the magazine Foreign Affairs, in which he discussed the new international labor organization created earlier this year in London and the role of free labor throughout the world as a dynamic force in the struggle against communism. On another occasion, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the full text of a plan by Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers Union, in which he suggested a positive peace offensive to stop Communist aggression by initiating a program of economic and social action to eliminate poverty, human insecurity, and injustice which are the sources of Communist power.

Although I have spoken out against communism on numerous occasions, I was and still am opposed to so-called control bills. I opposed the Mundt-Nixon bill when it first came up 2 years ago, I opposed it when it was revived recently as the so-called Wood bill. I said then and I still say that such bills are bad, they will do us untold harm and will not help us solve the situation.

During my 1948 campaign I frankly told the voters that I had voted against the Mundt-Nixon bill and why. I made perfectly clear that if reelected I would vote against any similar bill.

I would have been duty bound to vote against the Wood-Mundt-Nixon bill this year if it were only as bad as the Mundt-Nixon bill of 1948. As a matter of fact, it was much worse.

The company in which I find myself in opposing this bill is small, but indeed select. It includes our President, Harry S. Truman; our Attorney General, J. Howard McGrath; FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover; our Secretary of Defense, Gen. George C. Marshall; our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson; our Director of Intelligence, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith; Gen. Dwight Eisenhower; Catholic Bishop Bernard Sheil, of the Archdiocese of Chicago; Philip Murray, of the CIO; William Green, of the A. F. of L.; Walter Reuther, of the UAW; David Dubinsky, of the ILGWU; and Jacob Potofsky, of the ACWU. I have no doubt that time will prove us right.

In opposing the bill in the House of Representatives on September 20, I said:

I bow to no man in or out of this Congress in a desire to preserve this country and its good, true—yes, divine principles of democracy. Time is too brief to call again to your attention the arguments that were raised against the Mundt-Nixon bill 2 years ago and then against the present bill a short time ago when we considered it. They are still valid against this bill.

I enumerated some of the dangerous parts of the bill. They were referred to at length by President Truman when he vetoed the bill. The bill is designed to catch votes and headlines but not spies.

As I told the Congress, the alien and sedition laws of 1798 were directed against subversives too. The reported cases, however, show that the only ones convicted and jailed under them were Republicans who opposed legislation espoused by the Federalists—the then majority party. I do not want my party prosecuting Republicans or even Dixiecrats, nor do I ever want to find Democrats in a position to be prosecuted by them—because of political or religious beliefs. Under this very bad law I can be prosecuted for urging its amendment or repeal.

I have and always will be in the forefront of every fight against totalitarianism under every guise and every name. Just as vigorously will I fight for our American principles of democracy.

ADMISSION OF DISPLACED PERSONS

During my campaign of 1948, I said:

Stop discrimination against Catholic, Protestant and Jewish displaced persons. We want no Nazis here.

I am happy to report to my constituents that Congress finally passed a more liberal DP bill, minus most of the discriminatory clauses of the old DP Act. The number of DP's eligible to enter the United States has been substantially increased, certain preferences were established for orphans and children, while the eligibility date has been moved forward several years making many thousands of DP's eligible for admission. After 2 long years of struggle, our efforts in this matter finally were successful.

Let me add, that on March 15, 1950, I introduced a bill to provide nonquota immigration status for children coming to this country for adoption by American citizens. At a later date, I called the attention of Congress to the work being done by the International Refugee Organization which is caring for and feeding the DP's in the camps. I urged that sufficient funds be made available to this organization to help it find homes for the remaining DP's and thus finally resolve the DP question.

ISRAEL

During my campaign in 1948, I said:

A free democratic homeland is the hope of the Jewish people. It must not be bartered away by imperialistic powers, intent only upon private gain. Extend de jure recognition. Lift the arms embargo. Grant the loan. Stop aggression.

The picture has vastly changed during these 2 years. Israel is today recognized by nearly all the nations of the world, it is a member of the United Nations, the war on its frontiers has been stopped, the United States has granted it a $100,000,000 loan and has removed the arms embargo. Relations between Israel and the United States are most cordial and friendly, and Israel is supporting our efforts in Korea.

Earlier this year, when the Arab countries were arming at a furious pace and threatening Israel with a "second round," many of us in Congress demanded that this country take steps to prevent a renewal of bloodshed and to protest against British arms shipments to the Arabs. I was among the first to warn of "dire consequences" unless the armament race in the Near East is ended. Beginning in February of this year and succeeding months, I spoke on the matter in the House, I contacted personally high officials in our Government, I went with congressional delegations to Secretary of State Acheson. I exerted every effort in my power to gain active American support to secure the existence of the Jewish state. Finally, on May 25 the three-power declaration was issued whereby the armament race was ended and the nations of the Near East were warned against aggressive acts.

I also spoke out against the internationalization of Jerusalem, for peace between Israel and the Arab states, for economic assistance to Israel to help it stabilize its economy and integrate the hundreds of thousands of new immigrants entering the country. In April, when Israel celebrated the second anniversary of its independence, I organized a "Salute to Israel" on the floor of the House and more than 40 Congressmen participated with addresses and statements of greeting to the Jewish state and its leaders. At the request of the American Zionist Council, which includes all Zionist groups in the United States, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a review prepared by the Council of the accomplishments of Israel in the first 2 years as an independent state.

I was privileged to accompany to the White House, Mr. Benjamin G. Browdy, president of the Zionist Organization of America, on two different occasions and participate in conferences with President Truman concerning Israel, its political and economic problems, and its close ties with the United States.

OTHER ISSUES AND EFFORTS

The issues previously referred to were among the most important ones that came before the Eighty-first Congress. There were others, some of lesser importance from the international standpoint, but all of great significance to large segments of our population. In each such instance I took a stand fearlessly and worked assiduously to enact those ideas which I considered constructive and to oppose those which I considered detrimental. Let me enumerate just a few of these:

I introduced a bill to assist cooperative and other nonprofit organizations in the construction of housing for families of moderate income.

I urged loans to needy students to enable them to continue their education over a period of 4 years at the rate of $1,000 per year.

Time and again I brought to the attention of Congress the plight of oppressed minorities all over the world, including that of the Jews in Russia, the true situation concerning Jewish life in that unhappy country, the rise of anti-Semitism there, the refusal to allow Jews to emigrate to Israel, and the extermination of Jewish religious and cultural life there.

On several occasions I protested the revival of anti-Semitism in Germany and the deterioration of democracy there, and our failure to denazify the Germans. On May 23, 1950, I introduced a resolution asking for the appointment of a bipartisan commission to investigate American policy in Germany.

I urged immediate ratification of the Genocide Convention of the United Nations to outlaw mass murder of whole peoples as practiced by the Nazis, and as threatened to be practiced by the Communists.

I protested against the rigged and phony trials of Cardinal Mindszenty in Hungary and of Cardinal Stepinac in Yugoslavia. I repeatedly urged our State Department to remonstrate with these governments against their incarceration.

I introduced a bill to issue a special postage stamp to honor the memory of Col. David (Mickey) Marcus, the Brooklyn hero who died in the fight for Israel's independence.

I introduced a bill to amend the Tariff Act by stabilizing import duties in order to encourage trade relations with foreign countries.

I supported and voted for the various reorganization plans submitted by President Truman to make the executive departments of our Government more efficient.

I protested vigorously to the House Committee on Post Office against the curtailment of the postal service as false economy and urged the reestablishment of the service and introduced a bill to accomplish that purpose.

I supported the President's point 4 program to aid underdeveloped areas of the world. I spoke up for Americanism, for religious freedom and brotherhood, a helping hand to Italy, unity of Ireland, dissolution of the monopolies in order to aid small business, and many other phases of activity in American life.

In arriving at my conclusion as to how to vote on legislation I always had in mind that veterans who had answered the call of their country and their families were entitled to certain rights and privileges which must always be respected and preserved and my vote has always been cast so as to preserve their best interests.

I am not touching at this time on the numerous efforts in behalf of the many constituents who called upon me for help of one sort or another. In every instance, I did everything I could to help them. The voters of my district have been good to me in permitting me to serve them. I have tried to reciprocate in kind.

CONCLUSION

The United States and all the free people of the world are now in the midst of a world crisis. Unity of purpose is the demand of the hour. The whole world looks to this country for guidance and leadership in the days ahead to make life more secure for ourselves and our children and to bring lasting peace to a tortured mankind that has not known the meaning of real peace for many years. I have great confidence in the American people, in their loyalty to the highest ideals of mankind, in their will to uphold and maintain our democratic way of life. With God's help, we will go forward to a better day.

Defense Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, communism is America's most dangerous enemy. It openly announced its intention to conquer the world, destroy all religion and enslave mankind.

Abroad it is feverishly arming and drilling millions of men, and here at home it is endeavoring to establish fifth columns with the avowed purpose of destroying our Government by force and violence.

Every precaution must be adopted and every safeguard provided to protect the Nation against spies and saboteurs and counteract subversive activities which endanger our institutions or our form of government.

This is the purpose of the McCarran bill. But, as laudable as is the objective of the bill, it fails utterly in its intention and defeats the very purpose for which it was drawn.

This is the general consensus of practically every metropolitian newspaper in the Nation.

The following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch is typical:

CALLING FOR A VETO

With the so-called antisubversive bill before him, President Truman has a magnificent opportunity to tell the Nation what the nature of the Communist threat to security really is. It is time for calm analysis in these days of fear.

Externally, the threat of Soviet imperialism is apparent enough. Internally, however, there is not and never has been direct danger from the few American Communists as a political party. It would be absurd to regard them even as a measurable political force.

The important domestic peril today is the possibility of espionage, sabotage, and actual subversive conspiracy. These are illegal and overt acts. And it is such overt acts, and not the propaganda or ideas of communism, which are menacing. Yet the bill before the President deals less with the real threat of illegal action than with the imaginary threat of ideas which have absolutely no appeal to the American people. Because of this the bill is dangerous, of doubtful constitutionality and largely unworkable.

1. The bill is dangerous because of loose definitions and wide grants of discretionary power. For example, the Attorney General would be permitted to cite "Communist action" groups for registration and special restrictions, upon only the vaguest legal instructions.

Hence it is possible that organizations or individuals not in the least subversive might be penalized or stigmatized. Senator DOUGLAS asserted that a party in power could use the bill to smear dissidents and enforce conformity.

2. The bill represents novel and doubtful concepts of fundamental law. In time of war or insurrection, the Attorney General could intern persons on "reasonable ground" that they might commit espionage. Senator FERGUSON stated that this grants power to "convict a man for his capacity to commit a crime." The Constitution does not provide punishment in anticipation of a crime.

Another section would punish conspiracy to perform any act which would "substantially contribute" to the establishment of a totalitarian dictatorship. Under this vague phraseology might not a speech be a contribution toward such an act? The Constitution guarantees any American the right to advocate even extreme changes in government.

3. The bill is virtually unworkable because of its vagueness and because it attempts the impossible. The definitions of Communist groups are open invitations to lengthy court action, and Senator DOUGLAS concluded that it might be 6 to 12 years before any unregistered Communist could be imprisoned.

Aside from this, the bill is based on the assumption that subversive elements would voluntarily step forth and declare themselves. Some Communists might do this, merely as a front, but no spies or saboteurs would do so. Attorney General McGrath believes the measure would drive the most dangerous enemies underground and make the FBI's task more difficult.

What was needed, and what Mr. Truman requested, was a measure strengthening laws dealing with espionage and such overt acts. A few sections of the bill would do this and are thoroughly desirable.

But what the White House finally got was a shotgun wedding of five separate bills, conceived in haste and dedicated to the proposition that Congress had to do something about communism—and do it, apparently, before the November election.

Mr. Truman had already said he would veto one of these five bills. Four had been criticized in Congress as threats to personal freedom, before their sponsors reconsidered and accepted all of them. The result is the most extreme legislation since the abhorrent Sedition Act a century and a half ago.

Congress has the votes to override a veto, and a veto will require courage. President Truman has courage. He also has logic and law on his side. With a veto, he will have an opportunity to tell the citizens that this bill is no way to fight communism. It is a way to damage their liberties.

Similar views are expressed in an editorial from the Minneapolis Morning Tribune:

FIGHTING SUBVERSIVES

The ideal antisubversive law would be easily enforceable. It would scrupulously safeguard the political and personal liberties of our citizens. It would provide every possible protection to the good names of the innocent. It would strike hard and directly at those who might threaten our national security in time of crisis as spies and saboteurs, while still permitting to the great body of our citizens a maximum of freedom of speech, thought, and action.

Such a law will probably never be enacted. But one might have expected something closer to this difficult ideal than the catch-all McCarran bill which the Senate passed and sent to the President Wednesday.

This bill is a disorderly accumulation of many antisubversive formulas. There are parts of it which will unquestionably assist the Government in its war on subversion over a period of time. But other parts can be enforced only with the utmost difficulty, and the bill resorts to such a broad, blunderbuss technique that there will be constant likelihood of hitting individuals, and puncturing freedoms, which should be safely out of range.

The Communist registration sections of the bill offer a conspicuous example of good intentions which may go badly awry when the flinty realities of enforcement are faced. These sections require the registration of all Communists and Communist-front organizations, as well as their officers and financial dealings. Communist organizations are supposed to register their individual members, too, but individuals are liable for self-registration if their organization fails to sign up for them. Penalties for nonregistration run up to a maximum fine of $10,000 and 5 years in prison.

As one Government official remarked, "This will work fine if the Communists cooperate." But if they don't—and their record on noncooperation with the Government is superbly consistent—the stage will be set for a long period of litigation. The machinery for enforcing registration set up by the McCarran bill could be stalled almost interminably by Communist delaying tactics, while the Communists themselves dug more deeply underground.

Likewise in an editorial carried by the Washington Post:

STAMPEDE

Panic and politics—and an irresponsible desire to go home—led the House of Representatives into a stampede late yesterday that overrode not only a presidential veto but a fundamental principle of American life. The President's message on the McCarran bill deserved more conscientious consideration. The exceptional importance he attached to it was attested by his unprecedented action in sending to each Member of Congress a letter which urged that the issue be given sober and searching reflection. This was an appeal which, coming from the President of the United States, no Member of Congress could decently ignore. It deserved the most serious thought. It should have taken debate on the measure out of the mire of politics into which it was plunged during its earlier consideration. It imposed upon the Members of Congress a solemn obligation to review the issue, not as Republicans or Democrats, but as Americans responsible for the safeguarding of the Nation and of the Nation's distinctive and historic values.

The President's message presented, in our judgment, a carefully reasoned and compelling analysis of the McCarran bill. It demonstrated that, on strictly pragmatic grounds, the measure would injure the national security which its sponsors have sought to protect. Every agency of the Government entrusted with the responsibilities of safeguarding the country has informed the President that the bill would seriously impair its operations.

The President showed in detail that the registration provisions of the bill would in practice be wholly ineffective and would produce no information about Communists not already available to the FBI. He showed that so far as Communists are concerned, the bill imposes no penalties not already enforced and that it creates a grave danger that these penalties will be applied to legitimate activities by persons who are loyal citizens. He showed that the attempt to enforce the bill will entail a dissipation of energies needed for more effective internal security precautions.

The McCarran bill has made a tremendous appeal to patriotic Americans because it is anti-Communist in intent and appearance. But it will do no injury to the Communists. It will, as the President observed, "help the Communists in their efforts to create dissension and confusion within our borders." Mr. Truman offered an illuminating analogy to show the ineptness of the bill. "The idea of requiring Communist organizations to divulge information about themselves is a simple and attractive one," he observed. "But it is about as practical as requiring thieves to register with the sheriff."

Most of the message was devoted to demonstrating the disparities between the purposes and the effects of the bill. We are glad, however, that the President chose to lay before Congress the consideration of essential principle which justified his rejection of the measure. He presented as simply as it could be presented the basic American idea with which the McCarran bill is in irreconcilable conflict:

"There is no more fundamental axiom of American freedom than the familiar statement: In a free country, we punish men for the crimes they commit, but never for the opinions they have. And the reason this is so fundamental to freedom is not, as many suppose, that it protects the few unorthodox from suppression by the majority. To permit freedom of expression is primarily for the benefit of the majority, because it protects criticism, and criticism leads to progress."

It is this idea which the House overrode when it voted in such haste last night to reject the President's message.

One of the difficulties which prevented the adoption of a more effective plan of combating communistic subversion in the recently enacted bill was the necessity of harmonizing half a dozen different bills and reconciling the views of numerous able and patriotic Members of the House and Senate who collaborated in the drafting of the bill in the closing days of the session. Time was short and adjournment was pressing and as a result, the bill when finally reported out by the conference committee was a catch-all and a hodgepodge of hastily assembled sections for which no one author or one committee was responsible.

As the New York Times well said:

As it passed the Senate Tuesday evening, the McCarran antisubversive bill is something of a hodgepodge. On the credit side, it now includes as a last-minute addition the Kilgore detention-center bill, which goes to the heart of the Communist problem. And it retains a few useful technical provisions that would strengthen existing security laws. But the fact that the bill embraces some good features does not alter the more important fact that it would impose infringements on the freedom of thought, speech, press, and political association that Americans have always held dear.

Of course it is necessary to protect our country from the menace of Communist aggression, whether in the form of Russian imperialism or of internal espionage and sabotage. But it has been and still is our belief that the principal features of the McCarran bill, far from achieving this goal, would interfere with it. Its registration provisions would ensnare Federal authorities in interminable litigation, while the Communist Party itself would be blithely going underground or making its appearance under a succession of aliases. Its prohibitory language is so broadly worded that there would be danger of involving in the toils of the law perfectly loyal citizens of leftist or radical or even merely unpopular views. Its immigration sections give vent to the peculiar versions of the know-nothingism that was rejected in this country nearly a century ago. This bill would strike primarily at beliefs; the real danger to our country lies far more in actual or potential espionage or sabotage at the hands of Russian sympathizers who may or may not be members of the Communist Party than in the public expressions of Communist belief, however offensive, mendacious and contemptible such expressions may be.

In this connection the St. Louis Globe-Democrat also said editorially:

UNWISE RED BILL

Attorney General McGrath was not altogether right in assailing the catch-all Red measure as evidence of hysteria. The lopsided majorities rolled up for this legislation in both Houses were politically inspired. Some Congressmen honestly believe in this bill. Others about to go on the stump seem to think American voters despise communism so bitterly they want any kind of blunderbuss statute aimed at Red rooting.

This is not as sound a political thesis as such Congressmen hope. American sentiment overwhelmingly fears and battles Red subversion in the United States. But there are millions of intelligent citizens who either have grave doubts about the McCarran bill compromise or oppose it outright.

A cogent argument can be made that this measure constitutes a bill of attainder, barred by section 9 of the Constitution. An attainder means an extinction of civil rights. The legislation does not specifically outlaw communism, its press, speech, or assembly, but it could be interpreted to abridge these rights and set up a thought-control section of Government.

The act of fomenting communism, Red spying, and overt treachery can be dealt with under present statutes. That has been demonstrated by the courts. The idea of communism or any other idea cannot be banned by statute.

But the plainest defect of this bill is its futility. It would force members of the Communist Party to register; also leaders of Red-front organizations. Registration cannot flush Communists. The most menacing Reds have always worked secretly and law will not change that. Communist Party members can simply tear up membership cards and burn CP records. Prosecution would be next to impossible, and they will go underground, as they have publicly proclaimed.

The registration feature of this law just won't work. The section authorizing internment of Reds in time of war could work extreme hardship and injustice. Besides, the FBI will take care of the spy and saboteur hazard if crisis comes. It has done so effectively before. Other provisions of the bill, however, are excellent and needed to bolster existing treason and espionage acts. For instance, the section extending the statute of limitations on acts of spying and betrayal of national secrets.

The President is faced with a dilemma. The Communist-control measure embraces valuable provisions, but other sections are repugnant, dangerous, and impossible to enforce. The bad features outweigh the good. Mr. Truman should veto this bill, then call for a more realistic act that can strengthen the Government's drive to bare and destroy Red cells festering among us.

Mr. Speaker, I fully appreciate the effort which our colleagues on the committee have made to provide a workable bill, and it is a particular disappointment that the composite measure falls so far short of the needs of the hour. I have long urged aggressive action to weed out Communists both in business and in Government. I sponsored the resolution in the first session of the Seventy-eighth Congress under which we dismissed civil-service employees of the Government suspected of being Communists.

Again in the second session of the Eightieth Congress I introduced House Resolution 500 providing for an investigation to make similar dismissals of any Communist found in the Government service. But the political control of the Congress had changed for that one Congress and the committee refused to report the resolution to the House.

In support of that resolution, I said in the course of debate in the House on March 11, 1948:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed within the last 3 years and especially in the last 3 weeks, the destruction of free governments and the subjugation of free people throughout Europe and Asia. In each country it has been an instance of undisguised, unwarranted, and unprovoked aggression, such as can be found only in remotest medieval history.

The pattern followed in the conquest of each of these sovereign states has been identical. First, the foreign aggressors have organized a fifth column on the inside; then they have placed Communists in key positions, and through infiltration have taken over the control of the important administrative offices. Eventually they close in and send all patriots who oppose them to concentration camps or liquidate them before firing squads, or with the assassin's knife. The result is that without a declaration of war, without firing a shot, except in assassination or intimidation, they have subjugated great and prosperous nations and conscripted and sequestered life and property as arbitrarily and as completely as in any ancient despotism.

Now, the feature of this incredible usurpation and devastation which concerns us and which gives rise to apprehension in every civilized country today is that it is all a part of a progressive program. There might have been occasion to think, when they first took over two or three neighboring nations that there was some particular need for the establishment of zones or buffer states which justified their acquisition. But, the deadly and considered method of these rapidly spreading conquests has now become all too evident to leave room for any doubt about their ultimate objective.

All the testimony before our committee corroborates the conclusion that it is a part of a long conceived and carefully planned campaign of world domination, not only of government but of ideologies, of philosophies so alien and so hostile to our institutions and our form of government as to make it impossible for both to exist in the same country. No one can doubt that these series of conquests, the absorption of state after state, have for their eventual purpose the conquest of America.

I do not have to say that the foremost desire of every American citizen, so far as our international relations are concerned, is to avoid a third world war. As a people we would make almost any reasonable sacrifice to establish enduring peace. But here in the third year since the close of the war we are no nearer a treaty guaranteeing the integrity of the nations of the world than we were when Japan capitulated. And as far as we can look into the disturbed and uncertain future there is today no prospect for peace or any agreement of any kind short of armed readiness for any eventuality.

Under these unhappy circumstances and in the light of the tragic experience of a dozen nations which have been destroyed from within, the integrity and loyalty of the employees of our Government becomes our first line of defense. If those employees are not dependable, if disloyalty creeps into the citadel itself we are nearing the beginning of the final crisis. We would then be following precisely the pattern followed in the subjugation of every European and Asiatic state which has been taken over.

There is reason to believe that vast sums of money have been expended and a far-reaching network of espionage has been at work in this country for some time with the purpose of establishing a fifth column which, when the opportune time arrives, will cooperate with disloyal forces on the inside to take over our Government and destroy the very agencies that should protect us. So, any charge, Mr. Chairman, that there is disloyalty among Government employees of the United States, however fantastic it may appear merits our earnest attention. With that in view, I have introduced this resolution.

During every Congress, in which I have served on the majority side of the Committee on Appropriations, including the present Congress, the committee has never failed to report in full the amounts requested by FBI and other Federal agencies charge with the investigation and control of subversive activities.

Accordingly, I voted for the rule to consider the bill and for the bill itself when it passed the House. On the face of the bill it did not promise effective control but I voted for it in the hope that it would be improved in conference.

But, as the President sets out in his veto message, and as corroborated by the overwhelming editorial opinion of the Nation, the bill does not control the Communists. Instead it would help them. In actual operations, the bill secures results exactly the opposite of those intended. It weakens our existing internal security measures and seriously hampers the Federal Bureau of Investigation and our other security agencies. Instead of supplementing the deficiencies of our present laws the bill weakens rather than strengthens them.

The bill has been carefully analyzed by the Department of Justice, of which the FBI is a part, by the Department of Defense presided over by such men as General Bradley, Admiral Sherman, and General Vandenberg, by the Central Intelligence Agency which is in better position to weigh the effect of such legislation than any other Government agency, and by the Department of Defense now under the direction of General Marshall, one of the ablest and best-loved men in public life today. All these key departments report unanimously against the bill and urge its rejection.

And for good reason. Incredible as it may seem, administration of the bill would require publication of every vital defense installation in the country, the location and the function of our A-bomb plants, our munition factories, our navy yards, and every war production center which an enemy would endeavor to put out of commission, either by saboteurs or by surprise attacks from the air. When my committee visited Oak Ridge, during the last war, we came and went by secret plane in the night and the members of our own families did not know where we had gone. During the war, and since the war, spies have constantly sought to locate and map these installations. And now a bill passes the Congress which provides for the publication of location of every such plant in America. Do you wonder that the President vetoed the bill and that Members, devoted to the suppression of communism, could not vote for it?

The bill also provides for the admission and naturalization of aliens and foreign nationals years before they would be eligible for naturalization under our present laws. Under existing laws applicants must wait 10 years before becoming eligible for citizenship but under this bill, subversive aliens become eligible for naturalization as soon as they withdraw from organizations required to register under the law—which might be the next day.

The bill would seriously handicap the FBI in its control of subversives. Not only would it overburden the Bureau with impossible demands upon its time and resources in the attempted discharge of hopeless duties imposed by the law, but it would require the disclosure of information, and sources of information, of the most vital character. An important official of the FBI told members of the committee the enactment of the law would set the FBI back a decade in its work. And FBI, of course, is the indispensible factor in the control of communism in the United States.

One of the most serious effects of the bill would be its interference with the Federal loyalty program. Under this program we have apprehended and dismissed great numbers of disloyal employees, but under this law, for example, the Attorney General could be enjoined, and his designation of subversive organizations held in suspense, approximately 2 years or more.

Incidentally another weird effect of the bill would be the demand for self-incrimination on the part of Communists required to register, who would thereby be required to acknowledge violation of the Smith Act specifically penalizing participation in efforts to overthrow the Government by force, or membership in organizations advocating such doctrine.

Many other deficiencies in the law could be cited but the fatal defect in the law is the opportunities it affords for interminable delay in the administration of the law.

As one advocate of the measure rather quaintly suggested: "Registration under the law requires cooperation on the part of the Communists." And, as the President pungently observed, "It is about as practical as requiring thieves to register with the sheriff."

They would, of course, refuse to register. As a matter of fact the press reports that Roy M. Wood, chairman of the Communist Party of the District of Columbia, said that neither the party or its members would register under the law. "The Communist Party of the District of Columbia will not register under the fascistic law," he said.

Conservative lawyers estimate—and no advocate of the bill denies—that from 2 to 4 years must elapse before the Supreme Court can pass on even the first case. In the meantime defendants enjoy full liberty, and wide publicity, and will be free to carry out any assignment by alien or local Communist leaders against the peace, property, and security of the Nation. Even the minimum of 2 years, would be ample time in which to put into effect any such campaign of espionage, sabotage, death, and destruction, the McCarran law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Even simpler tactics could stall the law and submerge the FBI hopelessly in its futile efforts to administer the law. Under the routine, subversive organizations are notified to submit the roster of their members. When submitted the FBI sends out a form letter to everyone on the list. If anyone so named denies membership in the organization, the FBI automatically makes an exhaustive investigation to determine the facts. Any subversive organization, directed to submit its roster, could file all the names in the telephone books of the city and bog down the FBI beyond hope of extrication.

And, of course, other recourses would be open to the defendant. Change of name, dissolution and reorganization, and other alternatives would all be available to the subversives in the 2-year legal hide-and-seek period allotted them under the law.

And experience demonstrates that the most dangerous and insidious malefactors are far too clever to affiliate as members of the Communist Party and could not be registered under any interpretation of the law.

The law is utterly ineffective and, as the President has indicated, would obstruct rather than contribute to the defense of the Nation in the apprehension of subversives and the control of communism.

In the hurry and confusion which always attends the last days of a long session there was little time for study of the report hastily reported out of conference, and the Members, relying on mass action on the bill, voted conventionally or in the expectation that the bill would be revised when the House returns.

The Christian Science Monitor explains:

Political expediency reached perhaps the highest point in current congressional history when Congressmen overrode the President's veto of the so-called anti-Communist bill and promptly adjourned until after election day.

There may have been a dozen in the Senate and a score or so in the House who sincerely believed that they were curbing communism by this particular means when they voted for the omnibus bill. But these few believers were a small minority of those who voted in favor of the bill.

Most of those who passed it did so with grave doubts that it actually would reduce communism, with an uncomfortable suspicion that on the contrary it probably would be a publicity asset to communism if it ever were enforced strictly, and with a comforting assumption that it probably never will be enforced strenuously.

In short, the vote reflected not the considered opinion of Congress on how best to curb communism but only the considered opinion of most Congressmen on how best to keep out of trouble on election day. The bill is known in headlines as the anti-Communist bill.

Whether it is an effective anti-Communist bill is beside the point politically. The politician figures he can lose no votes by being for something labeled "anti-Communist," but might well be hurt if he had played this one the other way. The great majority decided to play it politically safe.

That the bill actually will curb communism is extremely doubtful. The most responsible and authoritative opinion possible on this matter is certainly that of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has an impeccably anti-Communist record, which is the agency of Government most familiar with communism in the United States, and which must attempt to enforce the bill. The FBI did not want it. The FBI thinks that its operations against domestic communism will become more difficult under the new bill than they were before.

Usually the men of Congress pay respectful attention to the views of the FBI. But this was a case where the legislators didn't feel they could act on the merits of the case.

Thus, there is on the statute books a law which the President says will help communism, which the FBI thinks will make it harder to watch and catch Communists, and which most legislators, irrespective of party, think is unworkable.

Incidentally, Congress was in too much of a hurry to get to the hustings to bother to vote any money for enforcement of the new law. Hence not much is likely to be done about it until and unless this omission is repaired.

The Washington Star corroborates in the same vein:

It is just as well that the current congressional campaign can be concluded in less than 6 weeks. In one respect at least it is not a very edifying spectacle. Too many of the candidates are seeking reelection on a claim that does them no credit. The claim is that on the issue of communism they can be just as hysterical, or more so, than their opponents. Democrats, as well as Republicans, that is the appeal they are making to the voters. They are holding up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to prove that they voted for the Mundt-Ferguson-Nixon-McCarran-Wood bill, despite a 5,500-word Presidential veto begging them not to saddle the Government with legislation so unworkable and potentially dangerous.

But the whole atmosphere surrounding the enactment of this 1950 version of an alien and sedition law was one of political panic. The people's leaders were running from the people, in the mistaken belief that the people had become an unruly, unreasoning mob and that the only way to appease this mob was to prove that you were just as scared, or even more scared, than the next fellow. That seemed to be the case with quite a number of the Senators and Representatives. In private conversation many admitted their grave misgivings concerning the legislation, but said they didn't dare oppose it, that to do so would mean defeat at the polls.

That's how it was with some of our statesmen. They simply closed their ears to reason and ran. It does not excuse their votes, if they voted in defiance of their own convictions. And many admit that they did.

Living, as our democratic system does, by politics, it is unfortunate that politics so frequently brings out the worst in us. Never has it been more unfortunate than in the present instance.

Here we have a Congress whose Members genuinely and wholeheartedly loathe communism, voting to put themselves in the wrong and the Communists in the right. Possibly, in a saner and more courageous mood following the election they will find ways of undoing some of the damage they have done. On the other hand, the campaign being the sort that it is, they may commit themselves so deeply to their folly that it will be impossible for them to take corrective action.

As suggested by the press of the country in a number of editorials, the remedy is a restudy and a redrafting of the bill when the House returns in November.

Among those submitting this suggestion, the Baltimore Sun says:

NEVERTHELESS, THIS NEW ANTI-RED STATUTE WILL HAVE TO BE REVAMPED

The Congress has now passed the new anti-Communist law over the President's veto. But there are significant details in the ballot that should not be overlooked. The House acted by less than the three hundred-odd affirmative votes by which it normally expresses itself on anti-Communist issues. Some of the best (and, it must be conceded, some of the worst) men in the Senate put up a filibuster that was exhaustive in the precise physical sense.

These are signs that the President's long and eloquently argued veto message had some, if not a conclusive effect. For Mr. Truman really outdid himself in this message. Wise in the legislative process himself, he unerringly laid his stress on the bill's greatest weaknesses—its pot-pourri, grab-bag, catch-all character, and the fact that its multifarious provisions duplicate in a less effective way many sound measures already on the books. And the leading one of these measures, of course, the Smith Act, has yet to be tested for constitutionality. Yet if the Smith Act is upheld the need for the new law will be lessened; while if the Smith Act is rejected, whole sections of the new law will fall by analogy.

The President was particularly telling against that provision of the law that would require a published listing of defense factories. Months of work by enemy spies would be saved by this provision, he insisted. He was again strong in his denunciation of the exclusionary immigration provisions of the law. There is no point in making access to America unduly free to those who would subvert it; but the President made a good case for his point that the present law goes much too far.

On one phase of the measure that has especially troubled libertarians, Mr. Truman was unexpectedly mild—and quite confusing. This is the internment camp provision, which, surprisingly, was sponsored by some of the Senate liberals. No doubt Mr. Truman did not wish to offend them. But when he criticized these provisions largely because they did not authorize suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, the President confused many who felt the maintenance of this old safeguard was to be desired even in emergencies.

A particularly troublesome passage in the veto message deals with the registration provisions of the new act. Here the President used two mutually repugnant arguments which canceled each other out. He said (a) the registration sections would be hard to enforce because of legal technicalities and ultimate appeal to the courts; and he said (b) that the registration provisions strike at civil liberty. But they do not strike if technical safeguards exist and if the courts can intervene; and Mr. Truman gave too little notice to the fact that his Attorney General is already doing by mere administrative fiat, without hearings and without appeal, some of the things the registration sections of the law propose to do by something far closer to due process.

On balance, however, and on the whole, the message was a good one. Certainly it was a brave one. Mr. Truman's vigilance on the Communist issue has not always been lively. For him to stand now against extremism in anti-Communist legislation opens him to charges from extremists which could be damaging in an election year.

It is, indeed, the election year aspects of the matter that will strike citizens hardest. The President's own Senate leader, Mr. LUCAS, probably summarized the prevailing legislative motivation when he stated: "The American people are anxious to have an anti-Communist bill placed on the State books." Just any bill, apparently, the Senator thinks.

But he is wrong. The people want a bill that will work—and work only against subversion without pulling innocent libertarians into the line of fire. The Congress could enact such a bill by amending the present measure in the relative calm and quiet of the postelection session. And possibly, by that time, it would have the guidance of a Supreme Court decision under the Smith Act, authoritatively restating the constitutional principles which must be held to in the general anti-Communist field.

The Washington News also suggests that the bill be taken up for revision when Congress reassembles again:

THE VETO MESSAGE

Only time can tell whether Congress has made the "terrible mistake" which President Truman believes it made by passing the so-called Communist control bill over his veto.

But certainly Congress did not give the veto message the careful consideration which it deserved, and for which Mr. Truman had sent a personal plea to each Member.

It was an exceedingly impressive message. Its tone was temperate. Its statement of the principle that this free country should punish men for crimes they commit, but never for opinions they have, was eloquent. Its explanation of the reasons why the President felt compelled to disapprove the bill, after huge majorities of both parties in both branches of Congress had voted for it, was painstaking and persuasive.

Yet, the adjournment-headed House could hardly wait for its reading clerk to drone through the message before starting its roll-call vote to override the veto.

And, though the Senate went into a long night session, there was little more evidence there of open-minded willingness to discuss the President's arguments on their merits.

Mr. Truman may be mistaken in his opinion—an opinion which, he said, is also held by the Departments of Justice, Defense, and State and the Central Intelligence Agency—that the law which now goes on the statute books will help, not hurt, the Communists.

The dangers which he sees in this legislation—dangers to national security, to America's relations with other friendly nations, to the rights of all citizens—may be less than he believes, or may be nonexistent.

Laws previously enacted may be—and, in this newspaper's opinion, are—less adequate than Mr. Truman thinks to protect the country from "the real dangers of treason, espionage, sabotage, and actions looking to the overthrow of our Government by force and violence."

And, unquestionably, the votes in Congress on this bill reflect a heavily predominant belief among the American people that strong and comprehensive new legislation is needed.

But legislation enacted in such times of stress as these can be, and in other such times has been, too comprehensive and too strong to be wise and safe. The people and their Congress cannot afford to be too sure that Mr. Truman is mistaken.

When Congressmen reassemble again, in November, they should give Mr. Truman's veto message thoughtful attention. And then, in the calmer, postelection light, they should be resolutely prepared to enact such legislation as appears to be needed by the situation as it exists at that time.

Mr. Speaker, accordingly, in view of the widely expressed dissatisfaction with the bill, the impracticability of its administration in its present form, and in conformity with the universal demand for an effective defense against communistic and other subversive organizations threatening the peace and security of the Nation, I am introducing the accompanying bill and it is here submitted for study and discussion during the recess of Congress:

A bill to protect the security of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Domestic Security Act of 1950."

SEC. 2. Section 793 of title 18 of the United States Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"§ 793. Gathering, transmitting, or losing defense information

"(a) (1) Whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense with intent or reason to believe that the information is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, enters, flies over, or otherwise obtains information concerning any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, fueling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station, building, air force base, office, or other place connected with the national defense, owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States or under the control of the United States, or of any of its officers, departments or agencies, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war, including items related to nuclear energy, are being made, prepared, repaired, processed, or stored, or are the subject of research and development under any contract or agreement with the United States, or any department or agency thereof, or with any person on behalf of the United States, or otherwise on behalf of the United States, or any prohibited place so designated by the President by proclamation in time of war or in case of national emergency in which anything for the use of the Army, Navy, or Air Force is being prepared or constructed or stored, information as to which prohibited place the President has determined would be prejudicial to the national defense; or

"(2) Whoever, for the purpose aforesaid, and with like intent or reason to believe, copies, takes, makes, or obtains, or attempts to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, document, matter, writing, or note of anything connected with the national defense; or

"(3) Whoever, for the purpose aforesaid, receives or obtains or agrees or attempts to receive or obtain from any person, or from any source whatever, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, matter, or note of anything connected with the national defense, knowing or having reason to believe, at the time he receives or obtains, or agrees or attempts to receive or obtain it, that it has been or will be obtained, taken, made, or disposed of by any person contrary to the provisions of this chapter; or

"(4) Whoever, lawfully having possession of, access to, control over, or being entrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, matter, or noté relating to the national defense, or information relating to the national defense which information the possesor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates, delivers, transmits, or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, or attempts to communicate, deliver, transmit, or cause to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it on demand to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it; or

"(5) Whoever having unauthorized possession of, access to, or control over any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance matter, or note relating to the national defense, or information relating to the national defense, which information the possessor has reason to believe could be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, willfully communicates, delivers, transmits, or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, or attempts to communicate, deliver, transmit, or causes to be communicated, delivered, or transmitted, the same to any person not entitled to receive it, or willfully retains the same and fails to deliver it to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it; or

"(6) Whoever, being entrusted with or having lawful possession or control of any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blueprint, plan, map, model, instrument, appliance, note, matter, or information relating to the national defense—

"(A) through gross negligence permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody or delivered to anyone in violation of his trust, or to be lost, stolen, abstracted, or destroyed; or

"(B) having knowledge that the same has been illegally removed from the proper place of custody or delivered to anyone in violation of his trust, or loss, or stolen, abstracted, or destroyed, and fails to make prompt report of such loss, theft, abstraction, or destruction to his superior officer—

"Shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

"(b) If two or more persons conspire to violate any of the foregoing provisions of this section, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be subject to the punishment provided for the offense which is the object of such conspiracy.

"(c) No prosecution shall be brought under this section or under section 792 or 794, except upon the express direction of the Attorney General of the United States."

SEC. 3. (a) The analysis of chapter 213 of title 18, United States Code, immediately preceding section 3281 of such title, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3291. Espionage and security of defense information."

(b) Chapter 213 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after section 3290 the following new section:

"SEC. 3291. Espionage and security of defense information.

"An indictment for any violation of sections 792, 793, 794, 795, 796 or 797 of this title may be found at any time without limitation."

SEC. 4. The act of June 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 631; 22 U. S. C., 611-621), entitled "An act to require the registration of certain persons employed by agencies to disseminate propaganda in the United States, and for other purposes," as amended, is hereby further amended as follows:

(a) Strike out the word "and" at the end of section 1 (c) (3), insert the word "and" at the end of section 1 (c) (4), and add the following subsection immediately after section 1 (c) (4):

"(5) any person who has knowledge of, or has received instruction or assignment in, the espionage, counterespionage, or sabotage service or subversive tactics of a government of a foreign country or a foreign political party, unless such knowledge, instruction, or assignment has been acquired by reason of civilian, military, or police service with the United States Government, the governments of the several States, their political subdivisions, the District of Columbia, the Territories, the Canal Zone, or the insular possessions, or unless such knowledge has been acquired solely by reason of academic or personal interest not under the supervision of or in preparation for service with the government of a foreign country or a foreign political party or unless, by reason of employment at any time by the Department of Justice or the Central Intelligence Agency, such person has made full written disclosure of such knowledge or instruction to officials within those agencies, such disclosure has been made a matter of record in the files of the agency concerned, and a written determination has been made by the Attorney General or the Director of Central Intelligence that registration would not be in the interest of national security.

"In no event shall the exemptions from registration provided by sections 3 (c), (d), and (e) of this act be available to any person who is an agent of a foreign principal by virtue of this subsection.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of this act, the Attorney General, in his discretion and having due regard for the national security and the public interest, may withdraw from public inspection any registration statement filed by a person who is an agent of a foreign principal by virtue of this subsection."

(b) Add the following subsection immediately after section 8 (d):

"(e) Failure to file any such registration statement or supplements thereto as is required by either section 2 (a) or section 2 (b) shall be considered a continuing offense for as long as such failure exists, notwithstanding any statute of limitation or other statute to the contrary."

SEC. 5. (a) The analysis of chapter 67 of title 18, United States Code, immediately preceding section 1381 of such title, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1385. Promulgation of security regulations."

(b) Chapter 67, title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after section 1384 the following new section:

"§ 1385. Promulgation of security regulations.

"(a) Whoever willfully shall violate any such regulation or order as, pursuant to lawful authority, shall be or has been promulgated by the Secretary of Defense and approved by the President of the United States for the protection or security or military or naval aircraft, airports, airport facilities, vessels, harbors, ports, piers, water-front facilities, bases, forts, posts, laboratories, stations, vehicles, equipment, explosives, or other property or places subject to the jurisdiction, administration, or in the custody of the National Military Establishment, or of any department or agency of which said establishment consists, or of any officer or employee of said establishment, department, or agency, relating to fire hazards, fire protection, lighting, machinery, guard service, disrepair, disuse, or other unsatisfactory conditions thereon, or the ingress thereto, or egress or removal of persons therefrom, or otherwise providing for safeguarding the same against destruction, loss, or injury by accident, or by enemy action, sabotage, or other subversive actions, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine of not to exceed $5,000 or to imprisonment for not more than 1 year or both.

"(b) Every such regulation or order shall be posted in conspicuous or appropriate places.

"(c) In time of war, or national emergency as proclaimed by the President, the provisions of this section may be extended by Presidential proclamation to include such property and places as the President may therein designate in the interest of national security."

SEC. 6. Section 20 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, as amended (39 Stat. 890; 57 Stat. 553; 8 U. S. C. 156), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 20. (a) That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act and all other immigration laws of the United States shall be directed by the Attorney General to the country specified by the alien, if it is willing to accept him into its territory; otherwise such deportation shall be directed by the Attorney General within his discretion and without priority of preference because of their order as herein set forth, either to the country from which such alien last entered the United States; or to the country in which is located the foreign port at which such alien embarked for the United States or for foreign contiguous territory; or to any country in which he resided prior to entering the country from which he entered the United States; or to the country which had sovereignty over the birthplace of the alien at the time of his birth; or to any country of which such an alien is a subject, national, or citizen; or to the country in which he was born; or to the country in which the place of his birth is situated at the time he is ordered deported; or, if deportation to any of the said foregoing places or countries is impracticable, inadvisable, or impossible, then to any country which is willing to accept such alien into its territory. If the United States is at war and the deportation, in accordance with the preceding provisions of this section, of any alien who is deportable under any law of the United States, shall be found by the Attorney General to be impracticable or inconvenient because of enemy occupation of the country when such alien came or wherein is located the foreign port at which he embarked for the United States or because of other reasons connected with the war, such alien may, at the option of the Attorney General, be deported (1) if such alien is a citizen or subject of a country whose recognized government is in exile, to the country wherein is located that government in exile, if that country will permit him to enter its territory; or (2) if such alien is a citizen or subject of a country whose recognized government is not in exile, then, to a country or any political or territorial subdivision thereof which is proximate to the country of which the alien is a citizen or subject, or with the consent of the country of which the alien is a citizen or subject, to any other country. No alien shall be deported under any provision of this act to any country in which the Attorney General shall find that such alien would be subjected to physical persecution. If deportation proceedings are instituted at any time within 5 years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that cannot be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation lines by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If deportation proceedings are instituted later than 5 years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Attorney General to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Attorney General the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, the said Attorney General shall when necessary employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in the same manner as the expense of deporting the accompanied alien is defrayed. Pending final determination of the deportability of any alien taken into custody under warrant of the Attorney General, such alien may, in the discretion of the Attorney General (1) be continued in custody; or (2) be released under bond in the amount of not less than $500, with security approved by the Attorney General; or (3) be released on conditional parole. It shall be among the conditions of any such bond, or of the terms of release on parole, that the alien shall be produced, or will produce himself, when required to do so for the purpose of defending himself against the charge or charges under which he was taken into custody and any other charges which subsequently are lodged against him, and for deportation if an order for his deportation has been made. When such an order of deportation has been made against any alien, the Attorney General shall have a period of 6 months from the date of such order within which to effect the alien's departure from the United States, during which period, at the Attorney General's discretion, the alien may be detained, released on conditional parole, or upon bond in an amount and specifying such conditions for surrender of the alien to the Immigration and Naturalization Service as may be determined by the Attorney General. If deportation has not been practicable, advisable, or possible, or departure of the alien from the United States has not been effected within 6 months from the date of the order of deportation, the alien shall become subject to further supervision as is authorized hereinafter in this section.

"(b) Any alien, against whom an order of deportation, heretofore or hereafter issued, has been outstanding for more than 6 months shall be subject to supervision under regulations prescribed by the Attorney General. Such regulations shall require any alien subject to supervision (1) to appear from time to time before an officer designated by the Attorney General for identification; (2) to submit, if directed by such designated officer, to medical and psychiatric examination at the expense of the United States; (3) to give to such designated officer information under oath as to his nationality, circumstances, habits, associations, and activities, and such other information whether or not related to the foregoing as the Attorney General may deem fit and proper; and (4) to conform to such reasonable written restrictions on his conduct or activities as are prescribed by the Attorney General in his case. Such regulations shall also require that any alien subject to supervision shall be denied access to any area designated by the Attorney General, if in the opinion of the Attorney General the presence of such alien in such area would endanger the national security.

"(c) Any alien who willfully fails or refuses to comply, and any person who counsels, aids, advises, abets, or encourages any alien not to comply, with any requirement imposed by or pursuant to subsection (b) of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both: Provided, That the alien may be released from such imprisonment by the Attorney General if the alien's deportation can be immediately effected at any time during the term of his imprisonment.

"(d) If any alien subject to supervision under subsection (b) of this section is able to depart from the United States, except that he is financially unable to pay his passage, the expense of such passage to the country to which he is destined may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, unless such payment is otherwise provided for under this act."

SEC. 7. (a) The President may, during rebellion or invasion, suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, as he may deem necessary in the interest of the public safety, and is hereby authorized, acting through the Attorney General, to apprehend and detain each person as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe will engage in, or will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage, sabotage, or other activity inimical to the public safety.

(b) Any person detained hereunder shall be released from such emergency detention upon—

(1) the termination of such emergency by proclamation of the President or by concurrent resolution of the Congress;

(2) an order of release issued by the Attorney General.

(c) The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he shall deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this section.

(d) Whenever there shall be in existence an emergency within the meaning of this section, the Attorney General shall transmit bimonthly to the President and to the Congress a report of all action taken pursuant to the powers granted in this section.

SEC. 8. (a) Chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting, immediately following section 1506 of such chapter, a new section, to be designated as section 1507, and to read as follows:

"1507. Picketing, parading, or interfering with administration of justice.

"Whoever interferes with, obstructs, or impedes the administration of justice, or attempts to influence any judge, juror, witness, or court officer, in the discharge of his duty by picketing, parading or other activity in or near a building housing a court of the United States, or in or near a building or residence occupied or used by such judge, juror, witness, or court officer, or uses any sound truck or similar device or resorts to any other demonstration in or near any such building or residence, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

"Nothing in this section shall interfere with or prevent the exercise by any court of the United States of its power to punish for contempt."

(b) The analysis of such chapter is amended by inserting, immediately after and underneath item 1506, as contained in such analysis, the following new item: "1507. Picketing, parading, or interfering with administration of justice."

SEC. 9. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 6 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 555), or the provisions of any other law, the employment of any officer or employee of the Government of the United States (including any corporation or other agency the majority of the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States) may be terminated by, and in the absolute discretion of, the head of the department, commission, board, or other establishment or agency in which such officer or employee is employed whenever the head of such department or other such entity shall deem such termination necessary or advisable in the interests of the United States.

SEC. 10. Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to alter or modify procedures in connection with determination as to loyalty of employees of the Federal Government under Executive Order 9835, or to interfere with proceedings under such order.

SEC. 11. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any circumstance shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of this act and the application of such provision to other circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 12. The Internal Security Act of 1950, Public Law 831 (81st Cong.), is hereby repealed.

Mr. Speaker, summarizing briefly:

First. The bill eliminates impracticable provisions of Public Law 831 such as the requirement of publication of list of defense production facilities which would supply vital defense information directly to foreign governments.

Second. It eliminates unworkable and unconstitutional features of Public Law 831 as, for example, the registration provision.

Third. It is so drawn as to make its provisions clear, concise, and unequivocable, and readily administered.

Fourth. It provides a workable detention provision which can be invoked when needed and permits suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in accordance with the terms of the Constitution as opposed to the cumbersome, impractical provisions of Public Law 831 which fails to authorize suspension of the writ.

Fifth. It gives the President power to designate areas where security regulations may be enforced in time of war or emergency as requested by the President; authority was not included in Public Law 831.

Sixth. It protects the Federal Bureau of Investigation from the necessity of disclosing confidential sources of data as would be required in the administration of Public Law 831.

Seventh. It interdicts interference with the currently operating and effective loyalty program, whereas Public Law 831 leaves doubt as to whether the loyalty program, which functions under Executive order, can continue, pending determination of issues in the courts.

Eighth. It authorizes the heads of all agencies to dismiss employees without delay or interference of red-tape procedures whenever the security of the Nation requires.

Ninth. It strengthens the law with respect to gathering, transmitting or losing defense information and eliminates the statute of limitations on violations of the laws relating to espionage.

Tenth. It strengthens the current law with respect to registration of foreign agents.

Eleventh. It strengthens the laws providing for promulgation of security regulations and deportation of aliens.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to include an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, summarizing the situation and paying a richly deserved compliment to the President of the United States:

A BIG MAN IN DEFEAT

The McCarran thought-control bill is on the lawbooks and Harry S. Truman stands up a bigger man than ever before in his life.

The President from Independence had everything on his side but the votes in Congress.

Yesterday the Post-Dispatch printed every word of Mr. Truman's veto message. We did so because we wanted each one of our readers to have the opportunity to study it for himself.

We wish that every American could have sat in the visitors' gallery in Congress and heard that courageous paper of state as it came from the White House.

We wish that every citizen could have known before final passage what this law does to him or her.

For we believe—as confidently as we have ever believed anything—that this law would not have passed if our 150,000,000 people knew the extent to which it invades their cherished liberties and how far it goes to endanger their security in a time of national emergency.

Congress has put itself up as knowing more than three Federal departments—Defense, State, and Justice—and the Central Intelligence Agency. All these reported that the McCarran bill would damage our security and make our operations against subversive agents more difficult.

These dangers were set out clearly in the President's veto. One muddled provision is enough to show how little thought many Members of Congress gave to what they voted on.

This is the requirement that the Federal Register print a public list of all defense facilities, war plants, laboratories, and other essential security installations—no matter how secret up to now.

As the President said, this hands vital information to the Communists and to the agents of any possible enemy—and "on a silver platter." Many an officer in the armed services has been severely punished for a breach of security inconsequential compared with this one ordered by Congress.

What we have seen is a gross miscarriage of representative government.

Six weeks before the congressional elections—6 weeks before an application of the principle of self-government, our lawmakers collapse under pressure of hysteria, fear, and partisan politics.

The depressed peoples of Asia and Europe look hopefully to America to demonstrate the purpose and scope and strength of the democratic ideal.

Instead, we stage an exhibition that is thoughtless, frightened, partisan, mean, vindictive, shameful.

It is enough to make Jefferson and Madison and Lincoln rise from their graves to join President Truman in his magnificent appeal for a return to sanity.

Mr. Speaker, the accompanying bill is, of course, tentative. It is submitted as a basis of consideration when Congress returns in November. However, it has been carefully studied and has been prepared in collaboration with authorities familiar with the subject and with legislative procedure.

It is to be hoped it will have the attention of all interested in the effective defense of the Nation in this decisive hour.

Daily Worker Attacks Crusade for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, previously I have reported on a check of recent issues of the Daily Worker with reference to the Communist-inspired Stockholm peace petition. There have been three such articles up to September 20 which I want to call to my colleagues' attention. The first appeared in the issue of September 3 under the headline, "Two million in United States sign A-ban: DuBois hits 'foreign agent' slur." The article is as follows:

America's signature of the world peace appeal passed the 2,000,000 mark last week as the administration pressured the Peace Information Center to register under the provisions of the Foreign Agents Act—an action Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, the peace group head, branded as "fantastic absurdity."

The Peace Information Center—formed last April—has been supplying Americans with materials and facts of various groups working to prevent a third world war and atomic catastrophe. In addition to the world peace appeal to ban the A-bomb, it has supplied similar material from the International Red Cross, the World Council of Churches, and others.

Dr. DuBois declared such attacks have but one purpose: "To intimidate those working for peace, whether in support of the World Peace Appeal, the International Red Cross statement calling for banning atomic weapons, or the teachings of the Prince of Peace Himself."

Dr. DuBois made his statement via trans-Atlantic phone from Paris where he has been traveling. "I can state categorically," he declared, "that there is no basis, in fancy or in fact, for the charge that the Peace Information Center is a representative in any way of a 'foreign principal.'"

The Negro leader—a world-famous anthropologist and historian—emphasized that the peace group he heads is an entirely American organization whose sole objective is to secure peace and to prevent a third world war.

He said the fantastic absurdity of the Justice Department's demand is demonstrated in the failure of the Department even to indicate on whose behalf we are supposed to be acting.

Dr. DuBois declared the Department of Justice action will not erase the 2,000,000 signatures already secured for the world peace appeal.

"I am sure," he said, "that these 2,000,000 signers and countless millions of Americans who hate war will defend the right to speak and work for peace."

The work of this peace group has been supported by many thousands of Americans, including outstanding figures in the scientific, religious, and political world.

Dr. DuBois is the only Negro member of the National Academy of Arts and Letters. He is a world-known savant, with three degrees from Harvard and is a recipient of honorary degrees from five American universities.

One of the most revered men in Negro life, he founded the well-known Negro magazine Crisis and was a director of research for the NAACP from 1910 to 1932 and from 1944 to 1948. He was chairman of the peace information group since its inception.

Another significant development on the peace front occurred this week when President Truman and the mayors of 192 American cities were asked by 70 leading public figures to act as one against those who seek to interfere with the right to petition, speak, or act for peace.

Dr. Robert Morss Lovett, former governor of the Virgin Islands, and Dr. John B. Thompson, dean of the Rockefeller Memorial Chapel, University of Chicago, issued the letter.

The signers said they were Americans who differ among themselves on many issues, including a solution to the problems of world survival presented by the threat of atomic war. But they believed, they wrote, that they would be disloyal if they condoned for one moment the subversion of American democracy manifested in these assaults and arrests of workers for peace.

The signers included 1946 Nobel peace prize winner, Emily Greene Balch; Dean Wilner G. Katz, of the University of Chicago law school; Dr. Kenneth Brown, president of Dennison University; Dr. Linus Pauling, of the California Institute of Technology, former president of the American Chemical Society, who was decorated by President Truman and the French Government for his work on atomic research.

Again, I sincerely hope that all those who are mentioned in that article will be as vigorous in their open and immediate support of the Crusade for Freedom which is now being circulated in this country as they are in their sincere interest in the protection of the right to petition, speak, or act for peace.

The second article appeared on September 5. Its sole significance lies in the fact that the editors of the Daily Worker are obviously concerned about the immediate response of Americans to the Crusade for Freedom. Its despicable smear of fine Americans will be recognized by all of us as the kind of Communist slander and libel which every American must expect whenever he challenges Communist propaganda and lies. I hope that it will be possible for every single Member of Congress to lead off in his district or State in signing the petitions in support of the Crusade for Freedom. The article is entitled "The 'Crusaders' Gang Up on the Stockholm Peace Plea" and is by Art Shields. It is as follows:

One well-known name is missing from the list of sponsors of the committee to fight the Stockholm peace pledge that Gen. Lucius D. Clay is launching this week. The missing sponsor is Ilse Koch, the "Beast of Buchenwald," whom Clay pardoned when she was doing time for making lamp shades out of human skin. Clay's committee of bankers and war profiteers will have no firmer supporter, however, than the wife of the commandant of the Buchenwald murder camp.

General Clay's group is called the Crusade for Freedom Committee. It is officially directed against the peace petition campaign that is troubling the war profiteers so much. Clay's "crusaders" are circulating a rival petition, asking Americans to fight against "tyranny and aggression." This means communism, explains Clay.

The new war crusade was given a send-off with a radio address by five-star Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower last night.

Big shots on Clay's committee include Lawrence M. Giannini, the president of the $6,000,000,000 Bank of America, the country's biggest bank. This rich crusader is also a big stockholder in the $5,000,000,000 National City Bank, the second biggest bank. Another rich crusader committee leader is Arthur W. Page, a director in the Rockefeller's Chase Bank, the Mellon's Westinghouse Electric Manufacturing Co., and the Morgan's Kennecott Copper Co. All three outfits are war profiteers.

DULLES GUIDING SPIRIT

The crusaders' guiding spirit, however, is Allen W. Dulles, whose anti-Soviet spy activities have been often advertised. Dulles is also the counsel and former director of the Schroder bank, a notorious Anglo-German-American institution, with many Nazi connections. And he is a brother of John Foster Dulles, the liaison man between the Nazis and Wall Street, who incited the war against Korea.

Another enthusiastic crusader is Cardinal Spellman, who broke the New York gravediggers' strike and who seeks to plunge America into war against the Soviet Union.

Another Clay committee member is George N. Craig, national commander of the American Legion, who called for the atom bombing of the Soviet Union in a recent speech.

CAREY IN CRUSADE

Clay's committee is promising millions of signatures. It hopes to get these millions in big industrial plants and churches and schools. Some elements of the clergy and right-wing labor leaders are expected to help.

AFL President William Green, CIO President Philip Murray, and CIO Secretary-Treasurer James B. Carey have been added to the committee to line up workers for the war crusade.

The crusade committee, however, is controlled by the war profiteers, not by their labor stooges.

Clay himself is a big Wall Street tycoon. The bankers were highly pleased with the general's services in protecting the Nazis and turning Germany over to the American cartelists when he was head of the American military government. So they gave him three financial posts when he retired.

The general is now chairman of the board of directors of Continental Can Co. This is a $200,000,000 outfit that cashes in on war contracts.

The AMG chief, who freed the Nazi beast, is also a director of the billion-and-a-half-dollar Chemical Bank & Trust Co.

IN AFRICA SLAVE TRADE

The Crusade for Freedom chairman is also exploiting thousands of African copper miners at 40 cents a day and less.

Clay (like James F. Byrnes, former Secretary of State) is a director of the Newmont Mining Corp., with large copper mining interests in the Union of South Africa and Northern Rhodesia.

Any genuine Crusade for Freedom should begin by liberating these terribly oppressed African workers, who are flogged or imprisoned if they won't go into the mines. Flogging and imprisonment are the penalties meted out to African natives who lack the money to pay the Government head tax.

To get this tax money they have to work in the mines.

This African slave trade is also of interest to another top crusade committee member, Frank Altschul. He served for years as a partner of the Wall Street firm of Lazard Freres, which has large South African mining interests.

Crusader Altschul is now president of the powerful General Investors Corp., which handles big deals for Lazard Freres and Lehman Bros. It was set up jointly by the two banking houses.

A dozen other big labor-busting Wall Street executives pass before my eyes as I scan the committee's members and sponsors. One notices, for instance, Lt. Gen. Ira B. Eaker, who doubles as vice president of the strike-breaking Hughes Tool Co., and as chairman of the California division of the crusade committee. It is a mockery to think of such men as devotees of freedom.

But America's working people want peace. And the 336,000,000 plain people throughout the world, who signed the Stockholm peace pledge, are determined that the patrons of Ilse Koch shall not bathe the nations in blood again.

The last article I have seen from the Daily Worker on this subject is in the issue of September 20. It is entitled, "Shop Peace Parley To Discuss China." Previously I have reported on the unanimous action by all American labor organizations in denouncing the Stockholm peace petition and those who seek to bring labor organizations into a position of apparent support of their efforts. This group calling itself the New York Labor Conference for Peace undoubtedly is following the pattern used by others who, without the shadow of authority, have stolen the word "labor" to use for their own malicious purpose. I am sure that American labor organizations, not only deeply resent this, but will do everything in their power to expose it and, further, will encourage the members of their organizations, individually and collectively, to support the Crusade for Freedom and to sign the petitions being circulated in its behalf. The article is as follows:

The New York Labor Conference for Peace, an organization which circulates petitions against the A-bomb and favors mediation of the Korean war, will give major attention to United States relations with China at a shop stewards, and delegates, peace conference Saturday at 1 p. m. at 13 Astor Place.

Trade-unionists from the eastern seaboard and the Middle West will attend the conference, according to Samuel Freedman, chairman of the labor group. A national committee meeting of the Labor Peace Conference is also scheduled for Saturday and Sunday in New York.

The Nehru proposals for mediating the Korean war and seating the People's Republic of China in the UN will be presented to the conference by Shiv K. Shastri, director of the Information Division of the Embassy of India. Shastri was designated to attend the conference by Madame Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, Ambassador of India to the United States, Freedom disclosed.

A policy statement on China to be submitted to the conference, warns that a hostile foreign policy toward China can lead to hostilities with China and with those nations on the continent of Asia which, like India, look upon China as the most effective assurance of stability in Asia.

Sharply critical of a policy which places a virtually complete trade embargo on China's 450,000,000 people, the draft statement estimates that if our per capita shipments to China were increased to equal our per capita exports to the Philippines, we would sell China $10,000,000,000 worth of goods annually and add 2,000,000 peacetime jobs at home.

"The Labor Peace Conference has been urging trade-union officials to sign statements for mediation of the Korean war, along the lines of the Nehru proposal," Freedman said yesterday. One such statement, prepared by the New York Labor Conference for Peace, will have more than 500 signatures of trade-union officials by the time of the Saturday conference, he predicted. It is planned to submit these statements to Warren Austin, head of the United States delegation to the UN.

Greece and Korea: Two Victims of Soviet Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, several years ago I made a trip with the House Foreign Affairs Committee which took me through the country of Greece, and during that time I had the pleasure of meeting a young Greek journalist and author by the name of Stephanos Zotos.

Mr. Zotos is a foreign correspondent of two conservative Greek newspapers, the Hestia and the Embros, both published daily in Athens, Greece, and he is an accredited correspondent to the United Nations here in the United States—since February 1949.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I would like to insert the following article written by Mr. Zotos entitled "Greece and Korea: Two Victims of Soviet Aggression." This article, I think, will be of interest to all Members of Congress.

GREECE AND KOREA: TWO VICTIMS OF SOVIET AGGRESSION

(By Stephanos Zotos)

All war stories have an identical start. A few shots are fired somewhere in the immense arena of international disputes. These shots are intensified or silenced according to circumstances. These circumstances are dictated by the military preparedness or unpreparedness of the nations involved, directly or indirectly, in a conflict.

South Korea is the second victim of an armed aggression carefully prepared and launched by the Kremlin. The first victim was Greece. Since her liberation from the German occupation, in September 1944, Greece has been attacked twice by the Soviet-led Communists.

The main resemblance between the aggressions against Greece and South Korea lies in the fact that they were conceived by Moscow which in both cases used its satellites to achieve its aims of conquest.

The major difference between them is theoretical only. Six years ago when Greece was attacked for the first time, west and east, still allies, were fighting together against Germany. Besides, no collective action could have been taken. The United Nations had not been created yet. When the second attack against Greece occurred in 1946, the west was not physically and intellectually mature enough to realize the exact nature of the Greek case—at least not at the beginning. Moreover, 4 years ago possibilities of an understanding between east and west existed.

Today they have completely vanished. We aren't talking or thinking in terms of agreement anymore. Instead it is through equations that we are trying to determine our strength and the might of our Communist enemies. The west has reached the point at which it realizes that only force can meet force. Through this new prism imposed upon our thinking and acting by the evolution of events, the aggression against South Korea has appeared to us in a new light.

The treacherous dagger that was thrust into the backs of the Greek and South Korean peoples at different historical moments was, however, exactly the same bloody dagger detached from the Soviet arsenal.

In 1946 some people were inclined to believe the war in Greece derived its roots from internal factors. Today everyone knows that what Moscow terms "internal dissatisfaction" or "an aggression launched by American imperialism" is nothing else but a poor pretext designed to camouflage the real purposes of an action undertaken by Russia itself. An action that is only a part of the long-range program drawn up by the masterminds of the Kremlin.

The first attack against Greece was launched in December 1944. At that time the so-called Greek Liberation Army, which claimed monopoly of the resistance against the German, Italian, and Bulgarian invaders, almost succeeded to take power. Although represented in the first Greek Government of the liberation period, the Greek Communists promoted a full-scale armed revolution. They were finally subdued, thanks to a handful of British who assisted Greek soldiers and police.

This first assault cost Greece considerable misery and devastation. Sixty thousand people were executed, and 20,000 others were taken as hostages into the neighboring iron-curtain countries where the defeated Greek Communists sought and found cordial refuge.

The second incursion came in 1946, ravaging Greece almost 4 years, meeting elimination only a few months ago. During these 4 years the Greek Communist forces were given full military and economic support from Russia's three satellites, Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia, the last of which finally ceased supplying aid after an ideological dispute with the Cominform. Had it not been for American grants amounting to $1,000,000,000 in military and economic aid, and for the heroic resistance of the Greek people, Greece would have been today just another satellite of Russia's Red empire.

The casualties and destruction resulting from the second aggression were extremely heavy for a country that had been at war since 1940. The Greek Nation suffered the loss of 30,000 soldiers on the front; 28,000 children abducted by the Communists and still in captivity in the iron-curtain countries; and 2,000 villages destroyed by guerrilla raids. In addition, 750,000 refugees were driven from their homes by the Communist bestiality. Only now are they returning to their former villages where they are trying with precarious means at their disposal to rebuild what the hammer and sickle have erased from Greece's soil.

Both the Greek and Korean questions were referred to the United Nations. The Korean issue was placed before the world organism by the United States in 1947 after American-Russian negotiations in Seoul failed because of Soviet insistence that Korean representatives unsympathetic to the Kremlin should be barred from consultation in the establishment of a Korean Government.

The Greek question was brought to the attention of the United Nations early in January 1946. Ironically, it was first introduced by the Russians, and at the very time their Greek Communist mercenaries were standing alert, ready to cross the Greek border. The question was placed before the UN Security Council by a letter of the Russian delegate which, under article 35 of the Charter, charged the presence of British troops in Greece was a threat to international peace and security. Russia's intention was obvious. Moscow was attempting to eliminate the British presence in Greece so that the task entrusted to the Greek Communists might have better chances to succeed.

The Greek question came again before the Security Council in August 1946, with the Ukrainian representative charging this time that the policy of the Greek Government had produced a situation in the Balkans endangering international peace and security. Of course, neither allegation was sustained by the Security Council.

Meanwhile, the war was on in Greece.

In December 1946, the Greek Government placed its case in the hands of the Security Council. Since that time the Greek problem has been under study in the United Nations under the denomination of "Threats to the political independence and territorial integrity of Greece." Two commissions set up at different dates by the Security Council established that the Greek Communist guerrillas were given full support by Russia's satellites. One of these commissions—the "watchdog"—is still in Greece.

An almost similar United Nations commission was established in January 1948, for Korea. It was at work when shooting started in the South Korean capital.

It is worth while to note that until shooting started June 25 on the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea, the United Nations followed an almost identical procedure in the cases of Greece and Korea.

The symptoms which provoked the Security Council's decision to send military assistance to South Korea had prevailed, however, in Greece since 1946. Yet this decision could not have been taken in the case of Greece—although some western diplomats believe it should have been taken—for reasons already explained, and because of Russian presence in the United Nations at the time of the Communist aggression against Greece.

Today we are facing an all-out effort of the United Nations to stop aggression in South Korea. For the first time in its short history, the United Nations has decided to provide military assistance for an attacked country, and this, despite the fact that the victim was not a member of the United Nations. The decision became possible because of the Soviet absence from the Security Council and therefore because of the lack of veto which would have torpedoed any effective resolution.

But there is another fundamental factor that led the United Nations to take such a historical measure.

The international situation is more tense than it was 4 years ago. Today we are closer to the possibility of a world war. A victim of a Communist aggression is more effectively supported than could have been a nation attacked 4 years ago. The world is definitely divided into two adverse camps. The demarcation line has been drawn between freedom and slavery.

The free countries outside the iron curtain are given full support because they belong geographically and militarily to the western alliance. The west cannot afford to repeat mistakes which permitted Germany, before the Second World War, to absorb one country after the other, until there were so many victims and so many prospective targets that world shooting started.

The question now is if there is going to be a third, or perhaps more victims. And if so, which will be the eventual third?

Already alarming reports from the Balkans do not exclude the possibility of a recurrence of what was attempted in the past.

However, the United Nations army is already alerted. It is believed that any new aggression will be faced at least as drastically as the South Korean question was met by the western world.

Since June 25, 1950, Communist activities are not matched with theoretical resolutions only. The western army under the blue banner of freedom and civilization is on its way.

Lee Pressman Lies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I would be less than human if I did not say that it gives me considerable satisfaction to direct the attention of my colleagues to an article written by Dick Reynard in the September 9 issue of the New Leader, entitled "Lee Pressman Lies."

During the course of the 1948 political campaign which he waged against me, some of my neighbors chose to disbelieve the charge that he was the No. 1 Communist of the country. I wonder what they are now saying about his plea of guilty.

The article is as follows:

LEE PRESSMAN LIES—FORMER CIO GENERAL COUNSEL ISN'T TELLING ALL HE KNOWS ABOUT COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES

(By Dick Reynard)

Lee Pressman, one-time adviser to political and labor giants, is a liar. He is a cunning liar.

For, in the past week, he almost convinced four of America's shrewdest newspapermen that he was telling them the truth. He tried separately, in various cities, to give them each the very same story as the exclusive tale of his ideological "break" with the Communist Party.

What he wanted most was to have the country unfold its morning newspapers last Monday, just as he was going on the congressional witness stand, and read in these publications, ostensibly independently, about the virtues of this man. At that moment he would be telling the Capital's assembled newsmen that his high sense of political morality would prevent his disclosing what he knew about the American and international Communist apparatus. Here, indeed, the public would say, was a man of principle.

But this maneuver failed. The newsmen checked with each other. Mr. Pressman made enemies of men who wanted to trust him. Instead, they attacked him.

Lee Pressman got on the witness stand and told the querying Congressmen that no man in CIO had ever asked him if he was a Communist. Since the politically sophisticated world knows that such labor leaders as Walter Reuther would hardly permit a decade to slip by in CIO without protesting Mr. Pressman's loyalty to the party line, Pressman's professing to have been unquizzed on this sensitive subject simply makes a public fool of Philip Murray—if taken as the truth.

However, the truth is that Philip Murray did call Mr. Pressman in no less than 10 or 12 times and ask him directly. The truth is that Philip Murray did call Mr. Pressman and Comrade Juniper, alias Julius Emspak, and Tovarisch Jim Matles, and ask them if they were Communist Party members.

The fact is that Mr. Pressman, frequently with tears in his eyes, energetically denied this each time. The fact is that Philip Murray, not wishing to disrupt his organization, protected this man. And now we hear him go into the national spotlight and deliberately demean the president of the CIO.

Mr. Pressman lies when he says that John L. Lewis never put it to him. The fact is that John L. hated him toward the end of Lewis' presidency of CIO. The fact is that Mr. Lewis has told other labor leaders of this hatred and eventual distrust, and that it was Henry Wallace who recommended that Mr. L. hire Mr. P.—another detail about which Pressman has lied to newspapermen.

Mr. Pressman is a liar of long standing.

For years he told Mr. Murray that his decisions in CIO were intellectually independent.

But he admitted to columnist Victor Riesel that for over 10 years he met secretly with the then Communist Trade Union Commission commissar, Roy Hudson; the Communist Party chairman, William Z. Foster; and the Communist Party secretary and boss, Gene Dennis.

And when Pressman and Murray got into a bitter quarrel over the second-front policies, the lend-lease resolution of the CIO, which virtually came out against lend-lease, and the Marshall plan statement—all of which Mr. Pressman wrote under careful guidance of the party line—Mr. Pressman told his chief client that these were his own objective viewpoints.

Mr. Pressman is autobiographically confused. He gets on the stand and testifies that he quit the Communist Party in 1935. Yet there are those who could, if they would, testify that he was in the party until 1939 and then simply didn't renew his Red card. What difference? Ben Gold has just done that. Does it make him any the less a Stalinist?

Mr. Pressman is chronologically confused. He has said that for 2 years he has been undergoing considerable psychological heartburn over whether to speak or not to speak.

Now that is odd, to say the least.

Until recently he had been handling some legal matters for the Soviet Embassy.

Until recently he was closely associated with Abe Pomerantz' law firm, the legal counsel to Gubitchev, that addict of espionage, international romance, and television.

Until recently he was handling cases for the International Workers Order, an official Communist organization.

Until recently he cooperated with the American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born, the American Labor Party, the American Round Table on India, the Civil Rights Congress, the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, the International Juridical Association, and other pro-Communist fronts.

Only as recently as 1948 congressional campaign, the entire Communist Scratching and Squalling Society converged on his congressional district and ran for him one of the dirtiest congressional campaigns in history.

Until recently he has refused to talk to the FBI. Now it must be understood that the Bureau never betrays any confidences. It would not even report that he had spoken to it. No one need ever have known. There was no moral issue involved—if, as he said privately to one of the newsmen, he really was "ready to fight for his country." (Which he qualified by saying: "If attacked.") He simply could have told the FBI agents what he knew and all Government agencies would have permitted him to drop into the obscurity he deserves.

He could, for example, have told us the whole story about John Abt, the man who helped create the Cominform's World Federation of Trade Unions, now about to launch world-wide, rolling-strike sabotage of United Nations forces in the Orient.

He could have told us how Abt met with international Communists; how Abt wrote the CIO statement on, oh, what a wonderful democracy Russia was (issued when a CIO group returned from Moscow). He could have told us how Abt ran the CIO Political Action Committee. Or how Abt got passports during the war when only the military and its VIP's could get to London.

He could, for example, tell us all about the Communists' wartime activity, for he was CIO liaison man with the White House then, and frequently made decisions in the name of Phil Murray on matters which Murray never heard of.

You get the point by this time!

This piece has been rough on Mr. Pressman, but no rougher than he was on thousands of others when he was riding high in CIO—for Mr. Pressman was a tough, disciplined party liner.

WHY DID HE LIE?

Yet, Mr. Pressman, who undoubtedly will be quite angered by all this, should realize that he brought it all on himself. There is an insensate arrogance about a man who tries so hard to con so many people who were genuinely eager to help this personable chap, this husky, ex-varsity swimming and wrestling champ. Yet he lied to most of these people, including the few newsmen he saw. Why?

What makes Pressman run? Has he broken? Why did he do what he did?

Well, there are those who believe that he wants the respectability needed to continue in law practice, and continue to represent the little steel-fabricating people he has been advising.

There are those who say he would like to get back into the CIO and has been wooing Phil Murray (which he has).

NEW HISS TRIAL?

There are those who believe that by denying he knew Hiss in the four-man cell—at which they sat around and read books, he would have us believe—he was preparing the ground for a new Hiss trial by introducing testimony contradicting Chambers, thus supplying new evidence.

There are those who say he simply doesn't want to be rounded up with other Commies and their friends if war comes.

And there are those who believe he is simply a part of a not very subtle Communist maneuver to get some back into high places in the CIO.

But there are none that I know of who believe Mr. Pressman has told even 1 percent of what he knows.

So it all seems like such a waste of energy on his part—and ours, too.

Mineral's Production and the Public Domain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by C. Girard Davidson, Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Mineral Resources, before the annual convention of the American Mining Congress, at Salt Lake City, Utah, August 30, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secretary Chapman has asked me to bring you his greetings and best wishes for a successful meeting. He is most anxious to take advantage of every opportunity to meet with the minerals industry so that together we can work out the problems posed for us by the current situation in Korea and elsewhere overseas.

For that reason, Secretary Chapman called the National Minerals Advisory Council into special session in Washington, D. C., earlier this month. In preparation for that session he instructed me to hold preliminary meetings with mining executives in Denver, Boise, and Spokane to get first hand their views on our mutual problems. The National Minerals Advisory Council will meet again this week in Salt Lake City and departmental officials have been invited to attend.

We all know that defense agencies will increase their call on many minerals. Civilian demands alone are already equal to or outrunning our current capacity to produce some of these items. To meet total needs, therefore, we shall have to increase our capacity to produce in these fields.

The Congress, in the Defense Production Act of 1950, is now offering specific aids to the minerals industry to expand its production of essential minerals. Although the bill is not yet available in final form, I think we can review its general outlines, always recognizing that there may be some last-minute changes.

Here are the specific provisions which will help the minerals industry to expand exploration, to speed development of new metallurgical processes, and to increase production from both active and inactive deposits.

First, the Government can make direct loans to private enterprise, and loan guaranties to private banking institutions, for expansion of existing capacity, for development of new capacity, for exploration and mining, and for development of technological processes and production of materials. Loans can be made for defense purposes without regard to the usual limitations governing Federal lending agencies. For instance, loans for exploration could be repaid out of revenues, which would relieve the operator of liability in the event that he did not discover usable deposits.

Second, the Government can make long-term procurement contracts which will guarantee a market to the minerals operator for a reasonable period and at a price adequate to cover the cost of production. This permits paying more than the market price to stimulate immediate production from new or inactive mines. The price can also be adjusted to cover costs of exploration and development in search of new minerals.

Third, the Government, through use of its priorities and allocations authority, can channel steel and other materials to the mining industry and the mining machinery industry for essential work, whether it be exploration, expansion of mining operations, or expansion of processing. The Department of the Interior will probably be designated as a claimant agency to assist the industry in applying for its requirements.

Fourth, the Government may have funds made available under supplementary appropriations to step up its own research, exploration, and development programs. The Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey can widen the search for new deposits, either through direct operations, or by contract with private companies. The Bureau of Mines can expand its metallurgical experimentation and pilot plant operations; successful processes developed will be available to industry for commercial operations, aided by Government loans and procurement contracts if necessary.

I know that many of the operators here have already begun to review their own programs to see how they can expand production, with or without the help of these new aids in the Defense Production Act. It is vitally important that you set up speedily a schedule of the specific projects you can activate, revive, or initiate for exploration, for new mining developments, for new processing development, for reopening inactive operations, and for expanding present production of essential minerals.

While concentrating on these new methods for expanding minerals production, the Government is continuing its attempts to clear away impediments which the industry tells us are hampering production.

One long-standing problem is the tax structure as it affects mining operations, according to the reports given us by representatives of the minerals industry. We are told that the tax structure inhibits exploration and production of mi erals and that it discriminates against the minerals industry in comparison, for example, with the oil industry.

In the interest of the minerals industry, Interior Department has been exploring this problem with Treasury Department officials, who, I am pleased to be able to tell you, are giving sympathetic consideration to the characteristics of the mining industry. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury John Graham has, at our request, taken the unusual step of sending one of his tax experts to be on hand at this conference as my adviser. He will sit in with me in your sessions on taxation to learn better your point of view.

The taxation problem, as all of you know, is not a simple one. It will not be easy to solve nor will it be solved in a hurry. Secretary Chapman wants to assure you, however, that we are working on it.

Another impediment which is hindering the minerals industry from expanding production to the utmost is the Federal mining laws, the subject you have asked me to discuss with you today. Discussion of changes in the mining laws has a history equally as long as discussion of changes in the tax structure.

I would like to dispose, frankly, of any misconceptions which may have arisen between us in this history of discussion.

I am very well aware that some quarters of the minerals industry fear that adding a comma or transposing a sentence in the existing mining laws is merely one way of getting the foot in the door in order to change the entire system of mining laws and substitute leasing for patents. Secretary Chapman has authorized me to say that the leasing system is not at issue here. The Department of the Interior is not considering or contemplating any action or legislation which would apply the leasing system to hard-rock mining.

In the last year or so we have reviewed our position with relation to changes in the mining laws. Along with all others who have studied the problems seriously, we believe that the laws could well stand some revision, and that proper revision can remove the impediments the present laws place in the way of legitimate mining operations. But we don't intend to upset the apple cart merely to throw out a few bad apples.

We don't pretend to know the answers or even all the problems connected with revisions of the mining laws. However, numerous discussions with leaders in the mining industry and in other industries have brought to our attention a number of assumptions concerning the mining laws. I am presenting these assumptions to you now, not as conclusions, but merely as bases for further discussion.

First, everyone seems to want the mining laws to be as simple as possible. They should contribute to the finding and producing of minerals on public lands. That means making it easy for minerals producers to operate within the laws.

It is certainly true that the mining laws and accompanying regulations are not simple now. They have made patenting of mining claims both slow and difficult. Industry leaders have objected to the necessity for exactly concurrent posting of notices and advertisements. I have received complaints about so-called nuisance filings on fractional areas adjacent to mining claims and suggestions that these should be subject to patent without discovery.

Conflict between claimants for the same location considerably slows the patenting process. This overlapping of claims for the same land, much of it unintentional, is inevitable when there is no central place for filing all claims. Invariably the only method of settlement is lengthy and expensive court action. Those with mining claims now have no opportunity to file objections if an application is submitted for an oil lease, for instance, on the same land, because the officials granting the oil lease are not aware that the mining claim exists.

Now some of these complications to which there is objection are in our regulations and not in the mining laws. Secretary Chapman has ordered a complete review of these regulations to make sure that we sift out any that are causing us trouble if it can be done. These regulations have been so bulwarked by court decision, however, that we greatly risk our decisions being thrown out of court unless we follow the present rules. For instance, when we have wanted to accept notices of posting and advertising, each running for 60 days but not exactly concurrent, we have been warned that the case would not be upheld by the courts. For that reason some of these regulations in fact can be changed successfully only by changing the laws.

Second, it seems to be generally agreed that the mining laws should be up to date, that they should relate to the facts of mining life today. The mining industry now uses technological processes unknown when the mining laws were first enacted. The industry now operates on a larger and more costly scale than possibly could have been envisaged 75 years ago. Mining claims today are more likely to come in batches than singly because we are looking more and more for minerals that are not exposed on the surface but which can be expected to be found in a zone covering numerous single claims.

Industry leaders have said that the present assessment requirement is something of a joke. Certainly that is a contributing cause to the succession of moratoria. One hundred dollars expended each year on a number of separate claims is often labor and money piddled away. If this money were blocked up in space and time—i. e., if work on one claim could be applied to contiguous and cornering claims, and if work in 1 year could be applied to the few years preceding the following—then it would be easier to show results for the money expended in improvements.

The present mining laws do not reflect the need for geophysical and geological exploration to locate deep-seated minerals. For that purpose the use of fairly large areas for limited periods of time is needed. Mr. Charles Willis, chairman of the public land subcommittee of the National Minerals Advisory Council, says that you need something in the nature of a prospecting permit which can later be developed into a claim after discovery. Instead, we have two cases, for example, from around Silver City, N. Mex., where prospecting by geological and geophysical methods for uranium-bearing ores was hampered by many small claims plastered over the area. As a result, large-scale operation was abandoned.

I understand from industry leaders that the holder of a mining claim wants either to continue development work looking toward production or else to patent it and retain it for further use at another time. The mining laws should facilitate both these objectives. If the miner wants to develop his claim, the law, by its definition of assessments, should allow him to use the most modern methods and give full recognition to his work. On the other hand, if the miner wants to patent his claim, the law should make it possible to do this simply and speedily with a minimum of procedure.

Third, I am told that the mining industry is understandably and properly jealous of the mining laws and is interested in their being used only for the promotion of mining. It is expected that the mining laws will give the full protection for mining originally intended when the laws were passed. It is assumed that the mining laws will provide the miner with all the authority needed for a legitimate mining venture, including all the surface he needs for his operations.

If it is agreed that this is what the mining laws should do, it follows logically that there are some things the mining laws should not do. Certainly the last thing desired is to have the mining laws referred to as the "hot-dog-stand law" or the "gas-station law." Yet that is exactly what it has become in too many places.

Perhaps you know the story—the true story—about the man along the Snake River who established a tourist camp on a gravel bed. He says it is a mining claim, but his income comes from the tourist court. He hasn't been digging or selling any gravel.

In California a man recently sold a garage, a filling station, and a motor court along the main highway. He obtained the land as a mining claim. The very fair price he got when he sold it did not reflect the values of any minerals on the claim, for he had discovered none. The price reflected the thriving tourist business enjoyed by the garage, the filling station, and the motor court.

Our files are full of such examples and I am sure that many of you are familiar with them, too. Mining operators are not responsible for these abuses and misuses in the mining laws. Probably all the operators would second Mr. Willis when he told me, "You should be very much concerned about people filing mining claims in order to use them for hot-dog stands or blocking road rights-of-way; I agree that's wrong."

We in the Department are very much concerned about invalid mining claims. However, these claims don't often come to our attention unless the land is going to be used for a specific purpose. Further, if we don't classify the land and reserve it for another purpose, such as a reservoir site, a military reservation, or a small tract, someone else can file another invalid mining claim as soon as the first one is cleared. We could save the taxpayer some money if the mining laws were changed to make the clearance of invalid claims less cumbersome administratively

Although miners are not responsible for these abuses, the mining industry nonetheless is criticized for the misuses of the mining laws for nonlegitimate purposes. Naturally, people ask how can the mining industry allow its chief legal instrument to be so prostituted.

Fourth, everyone heartily favors the conservation of our natural resources and the optimum use of our public domain. These resources and this land belong to all of us; we all have a vested interest in seeing it properly used and its benefits fully realized.

Since 1872, when the first mining laws were passed, the area to which they were applied—the public domain of our great West—has changed immeasurably. In the early days the western lands were barren of population. Only the miner, in search of precious metals, was daring enough to enter some of the forbidding mountains and to explore some of the arid plains. In time, however, civilization caught up with him. When he made a strike it paid others to follow him. In time the land which seemed useful only for mining became more valuable for other purposes.

Now we manage our public domain on a multipurpose basis. We want to put it to the best possible uses. This might be mining in some places. In others it might be recreation for a greatly expanded population; in still others it might be grazing; in some places its greatest value is in the timber on the land. Some public domain covers watersheds. There we must protect the soil and forest cover in order to guarantee some municipality's water supply, in order to contribute to flood prevention, and in order to store water for irrigation and electric power.

The uses of the public domain, and the attendant problems, necessarily vary from area to area. Each miner usually knows only the uses and problems common to his own area. For instance, in arid portions of the Southwest, the miner is not concerned with conflicts with timber operators over use of the public domain. In the Northwest, however, timber is one of the prime users of the public domain. The mining laws which are applicable to the entire Nation must take cognizance of these special situations in different regions.

The Department of the Interior, along with the Forest Service and Soil Conservation Service, is charged with managing the public domain for all these purposes. In that connection we are responsible not only to the mining industry, but to the grazing industry, the timber industry, the people who live in the flood plain, the municipalities who are dependent for water, the city dwellers who want outdoor recreation, and many others. These are not separate groups of people. The same person falls into several categories and wants the public domain to be available for several purposes. Even the mining industry is interested in recreation for its members, in the hydroelectric power which comes from sites on the public domain, and in water for mining operations that depends on proper watershed management. All of us have a stake in doing our multipurpose job on the public domain and in doing it well.

When someone misuses the mining laws to obtain title to a piece of the public domain, which is more valuable for some use other than mining, it may well be depriving some other better qualified and more deserving citizen of his rights under other statutes. For instance, under the small-tracts law and the Homestead Act, veterans have preference to available parcels of public domain. This veterans' preference doesn't apply in the mining laws. Thus, if the mining laws are used for what are termed illegitimate purposes, it makes it possible for a nonveteran to get a tract for a home site or camp site to which the veteran is entitled.

The timber operators and the highway departments resent paying toll—they sometimes call it blackmail—to those who intentionally establish mining claims across road rights-of-way, not for the purpose of mining, but so that they must be bought out. A lumber company in the Pacific Northwest said that they were afraid to put out a survey party to locate a new road because they knew they would immediately be faced with a spate of mining claims filed across the road. It is cheaper to buy out these mining claims at an average of $500 apiece, whether they be valid or invalid, than to fight them through the courts. The State highway department in California has reported that mining claims were filed as soon as they surveyed a new road and that they were forced to buy out the claimants.

The same complaint is made by livestock men against those who throw mining claims across water holes.

I am sure you recognize that I am not talking about mining claims filed for mining purposes, where the search for minerals is real. Such legitimate claims and the right to file them must be protected. Likewise, the rights of other groups using the public domain under other laws must also be protected. Some way can and must be found to carry out the intents of all these different laws protecting the public domain and the users thereof.

For grazing, for timber, for recreation, and for all the other uses of public lands, the Congress has passed special legislation giving both the user and the public proper protection. Under the Taylor Grazing Act, for instance, monopoly of a water hole on which the surrounding livestock economy depends is prohibited. Under the O. & C. timber management program, logging is controlled to maintain sustained yield of the forest. Under the small-tract law, only a proper area can be set aside for this purpose and it must bring the Public Treasury a price commensurate with its value for this purpose.

Whenever someone uses a mining claim not for mining, but to obtain timber or to monopolize a water hole, or to obstruct a right-of-way, or to get exclusive control of a recreation site, or to obtain a small tract, he is defeating the expressed intent of the Congress.

Legitimate mining operators—rightly or wrongly—are being criticized for allowing their law to be abused in this fashion.

We are grateful to the many individuals in industry who have given careful study to the mining laws. We are indebted to them for bringing these problems to our attention in a constructive manner.

It is obvious that constructive suggestions are to be found on how the mining laws might be revised for better protection of the mining industry and the public as a whole. They have been submitted by miners, by stockmen, by timber operators, by recreation and wildlife enthusiasts, by city officials, by irrigation farmers, and by many others.

All these groups have claims to the public domain, and therefore something valuable to contribute to discussions on the mining laws. This was demonstrated shortly after last year's mining congress, when representatives of these different groups in the Northwest met for 2 days in Spokane. Mr. Donald Callahan, who is on the program here this morning, participated in that Spokane meeting; I hope he is going to tell you about it.

If we are to spell out the answers on how the mining laws should be revised, serious round-the-table discussions by all the interested parties are needed. Since the problems differ from region to region, these discussions might take place in a series of meetings held in different areas throughout the West.

It would be entirely appropriate for the mining industry, as in effect the custodian of the mining laws, to initiate such meetings. Invitations might go out to organizations representing grazing, lumbering, recreation, forestry, farming, health, and sanitation, and other interests. If the Department of the Interior can help you work out a solution, we shall be pleased to join you.

All the different groups concerned, after sitting around the table together, ought to be able to come up with a proposal which all of us together can take to the Congress next January and ask for its enactment into law.

Democracy in our country has gained steadily in strength and effectiveness, through the interplay of diverse points of view. Conflicts of ideas can develop into a unified course of action which is sounder and stronger than any of the component ideas standing alone. Today as democracy faces another rigorous test, we are presented with a fresh opportunity to prove that collaboration between government and industry can once again equip our country to withstand her enemies.

Stephen E. Rice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by me on the services of Stephen E. Rice, Senate legislative counsel.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Before we return the Senate will lose the services of the Honorable Stephen E. Rice, who, since World War II, has been Senate legislative counsel.

Nothing I could say would be more complimentary to Captain Rice than his appointment by the President of the United States as judge on the Tax Court of the United States, the unanimous approval by the Senate Finance Committee of his appointment, and his confirmation by the United States Senate without a dissenting vote.

But personally, and as a Member of the Senate who is not a lawyer, I wish to say that I have regarded his work with and for us as outstanding service by a man endowed with fine personal qualities and distinctive native ability who has demonstrated exceptional professional competence.

Judge Rice has served the legislative branch of the Federal Government for the past 17 years, with time out for distinguished naval service during World War II. He has worked with members of all political parties on some of the most complex and controversial legislation ever considered by a legislative body. Yet I know of no Senator in all that time who did not regard him personally with esteem and accept his work and advice with confidence.

We shall miss him in the Senate, but I am sure that he goes to the bench with the best wishes of all of us, and he has my heartiest congratulations.

Although he is a native of Florida, I am pleased that he has adopted Virginia for residence.

As I express my regret at the departure of Steve Rice from the Senate, I think it is appropriate to add we are further indebted to him for the development of an excellent staff and to invite attention to the fact that he has recommended the promotion of Mr. John H. Simms to succeed him as legislative counsel. Mr. Simms also enjoys the confidence of the Senate, and I endorse the recommendation.

The Vanishing American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. KEM

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "The Vanishing American" which I made before the Kansas City Real Estate Board in Kansas City, Mo., on September 22, 1950.

There being no objection, the address was ordered, to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, my friends of the Kansas City Real Estate Board, ladies and gentlemen, it's good to be with you again.

I congratulate the members of the Kansas City Real Estate Board on your honest, forthright stand on legislation affecting your business and the property owners you represent. I have observed that you, through your national board, say what you mean and mean what you say. You have the courage to stand up and fight for what you think is right. I salute you for it.

In contrast there is the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. It holds annual meetings once a year and committee meetings at frequent intervals. The members pass resolutions expressing their faith in the American way of life. They shudder at the name of Karl Marx, as they ought to do; they talk economy and promote Government spending, such as the point 4 program.

The Chamber of Commerce carries on large operations in Washington. It has a paid staff there which finds it easier to collaborate with those in power in Government than to carry out the political ideals of most of their dues-paying members.

Members of the Chamber frequently visit Capitol Hill. They urge with great insistence and plausibility that this reorganization plan must be disapproved in the Congress or that Senate or House bill must be defeated—all in the interest of free enterprise.

These big-business men talk freely enough in Washington mostly off the record. Their attitude seems to be "Let's you and him have a big fight." In their own States and districts—with a few notable exceptions—they have no part in political organization and even hesitate to express an opinion publicly on what they call a political matter. When creeping socialism is storming their camp, except for occasional trips to Washington, they lie quietly and peacefully in their tents. While the labor unions have their political-action committees working in the townships, wards, and precincts every day in the year—as they have a perfect right to do—these businessmen avoid political discussions as the plague. Some of them even strut and cackle every time a New Deal bureaucrat comes around.

Naturally Members of Congress understand the situation. Nobody in Washington is fooled—least of all the administration or the Congress. I offer the opinion that the influence of this business organization will continue to decline so long as its members fail to fight openly and aggressively for the principles they profess to believe in, and the same fate awaits any other business group that follows a similar policy of supine indifference.

This reminds me that lately in Washington, some people have had the misfortune to say the wrong thing at the wrong time. Perhaps many of us would do well to follow more closely the example of the late Calvin Coolidge, who once remarked, "I don't recall ever getting into trouble for something I didn't say." This is particularly good advice if the subject involved is the United States Marine Corps.

There is the story of how a famous preacher lost his first job. This minister was born and reared in the moonshine district of eastern Kentucky.

His first sermon was a distinct success. He was invited to dinner at the house of one of the deacons. The blessing was said. Everything went fine for a while. The famous minister years later told what happened. "The deacon said: 'Have some corn, brother Smith,' and I passed my glass instead of my plate."

I. WE SHOULD NOT THROW AWAY SOMETHING THAT HAS SERVED US VERY WELL INDEED

I grew up in Macon, in the northern part of Missouri. I remember when Colonel Blees, who had inherited a fortune from his father in Germany, brought the first automobile to Macon, a Studebaker electric. I remember when Captain F———, who lived on a pension broke his back pulling up a turnip in his garden. It was a pleasant town, on the whole; neither better nor worse I suppose than thousands of other towns like it throughout the length and breadth of the land.

I know from personal observation and experience that the United States is a better place to live in, a better place for grown people, and a better place for children than it was at the beginning of the twentieth century.

Yes, I can remember those good old days of the turn of the century very well indeed, and I say anyone who would trade 1950 for 1900 would trade a Cadillac for a handcar. I say without hesitation that the great mass of Americans lead healthier, fuller, happier, lives than they did 50 years ago. I say this abruptly so that no one will think that I am one of those who casts an undeserved aura of glamour and respectability over the past.

Disraeli said, "I am a radical because I want to eradicate that which is bad; I am a conservative because I want to conserve that which is good."

In the process of change that is going on before our eyes, God permit that we may retain that which is good, and discard that which is bad.

I ask you to consider whether in this process of change, we are not about to commit the folly of throwing away something that has served us very well indeed.

What has made possible these gains in the material well-being of our people? No one will hesitate over the answer. It is due to the mass production and distribution of quantities of useful goods.

What has made this development possible? It is the American system of free enterprise that has grown up under the protection of the Constitution of the United States—the Constitution which you have set aside this day to honor.

Sixty years ago, someone asked James Russell Lowell, United States Minister to the Court of St. James's "Dr. Lowell, how long will the American Republic endure?" Lowell responded, "As long as the ideals of the men who made it continue dominant."

Those who made the Republic were independent, straight-thinking Americans, who valued self-reliance, diligence, and thrift. Above all, they entertained a healthy distrust of too much government. The question I wish to discuss with you today is whether this kind of American shall be allowed to take his place with Io—the poor Indian. Shall we call him a vanishing American?

II. SECURITY CANNOT BE ATTAINED BY A GOVERNMENT FORMULA

Today we find our people turning more and more to government—largely to the Federal Government—for hundreds of different types of assistance. They have been lured by the promises of something for nothing by Washington bureaucrats who, in their lust for power, gladly promise what is not theirs to give. Today, nearly 26,000,000 individuals receive regular Government checks—or almost half as many as the total number of persons employed in this country.

A former Congressman from Illinois tells this story to show that we are becoming less responsible.

A very strait-laced lady of the old school was approached by her maid, who said that she would have to quit. Her employer asked why, and the maid sobbed that she was going to have a baby.

The lady replied sternly, "I do not condone this sort of thing, but neither am I going to condemn you. As a Christian woman I conceive it my duty to help you in your hour of trouble. You keep on working here and when your baby is born I will adopt it. You will be saved from shame."

The lady was as good as her word. But a year later the maid came to her again, saying she would have to quit because she was going to have another baby.

"This is shocking," said the lady. "But I am not going to sit in judgment on you. Nor will I let you be held up to shame. You stay on here and have this second baby and I will adopt it, too."

The next year the maid approached her once more, again saying that she was going to quit.

"Good heavens," cried the lady, "not another baby?"

"No, not this time," the maid replied. "I liked working here when there was just you and the mister. But I ain't going to work for a family that has two children."

There is an old saying: "We never miss the water until the well runs dry."

Well, the truth is, our own well is just about dry. We've continued to prime the pump—prime the pump—and the bucket still comes up full—but our heavy spenders in Washington haven't bothered—or dared—to look into the well to find out how much is left.

We all desire security. But not once in the history of the world has security been attained by a government formula. Security cannot be achieved by the simple method of having the earnings of the people spent, not by themselves, but by a spendthrift bureaucracy.

Once the people surrender their initative to the Government, once they agree to turn over their liberties to Washington in exchange for hand-outs, then we will no longer have the kind of Government on which our Nation was founded.

We have not outgrown the Sermon on the Mount in our spiritual progress. We have not outgrown in our political life the wisdom of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Several years ago, a benevolent citizen of Seattle, Wash., provided in his will a fund, the income from which is used for feeding the ducks on a nearby lake. Each day these ducks receive their hand-outs of grain Now it seems that they have become so satisfied with their social and economic well-being that they have almost lost the power to fly with the wings that God gave them. They sit huddled about in the quiet waters of the lake from one feeding to another waiting for the next distribution of free grain. Frank Holman, of Seattle, a former president of the American Bar Association, relates this story as a warning that we cannot build a strong and enduring America by turning our citizens into "sitting ducks."

III. DURING WAR OR PEACE, THE DRIVE FOR THE HAND-OUT STATE CONTINUES UNABATED

Nevertheless, a drive has been under way in this country for nearly a fifth of a century for bigger and bigger government by fewer and fewer people, in order to push more and more people around.

The drive did not slacken during the last great war. It moved right ahead, and after the war was over, those who favored the establishment of a hand-out state fought bitterly against eliminating the police-state wartime controls.

Now again—tragically so soon again—we find ourselves engaged in war. Unfortunately, certain controls are necessary in wartime.

But there are those who would use the Korean war—or any other war that may occur, God forbid—as a smokescreen behind which to shelve constitutional government for once and for all, and to erect a socialist government in its stead.

Once that is done, we are well on the road to communism. Let there be no doubt about that. John Strachey, the present British minister of war, has said: "Like all Socialists, I believe that the Socialist society evolves, in time, into the Communist society." Those were the words of the present Socialist Minister of War in Britain.

The British Socialists have not hesitated to go ahead with their plans to socialize what remains of the free economy there, including the iron and steel industry. Under the Marshall plan, the American taxpayer will underwrite the operation.

It is no secret that Government planners in this country are itching to take over the American iron and steel industry. They must not be permitted to use war as an excuse.

IV. KOREAN WAR MUST HAVE PRIORITY, BUT WE SHOULD NOT IGNORE THE THREAT TO OUR INSTITUTIONS FROM WITHIN

First priority must go to matters connected with the Korean war—and God grant that it may be only that. But we must not forget that the fight against totalitarianism is world-wide. It is far from being a strictly military problem—and we are faced with threats from within as well as from without.

V. CONGRESS MUST NOT GIVE PRESIDENT A BLANK CHECK AND A RUBBER STAMP

There are those who, in wartime, say Congress must surrender substantially all of its powers to the President, that is, give him a rubber stamp, a blank check, and all the red ink that he wants.

This is virtually what occurred during World War II. Too many lump sum appropriations were approved with only the slightest notion as to the purposes for which they were to be used. The result, waste, extravagance, graft, and a much larger national debt than would otherwise have resulted.

Even more tragic was the complete surrender by Congress of its functions in the field of foreign affairs to the Chief Executive.

The Constitution provides that: "He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur."

During World War II, a Chief Executive of the United States entered into far-reaching agreements with representatives of powerful foreign nations, including the Soviet Union, at Teheran and Yalta. His successor entered into equally far-reaching agreements with foreign representatives including Joseph Stalin, at Potsdam.

The calamitous Yalta deal—which sold China down the river to the Reds—was made in secret. The advice of the Senate was not obtained—and apparently not desired. And the world-shaking agreements made at Yalta, as in the case of those made at Tehran, were not ratified by the Senate, or even submitted to it. Today, more than 5 years after the Yalta conference, we still don't know exactly what took place at Yalta.

At Potsdam, in August 1945, the present incumbent of the White House followed the example set by his predecessor. The negotiations at Potsdam were conducted for the most part in secret. The Senate played no part. The agreements made were not submitted to it as required by the Constitution.

Certainly so far as the conduct of foreign relations was concerned, during World War II ours was a Government by men and not by Constitution.

And to use a time-honored phrase, the results speak for themselves. Instead of achieving lasting peace, we find ourselves in greater danger than ever before in history. This is largely the result of Government by guess and intuition instead of by the Constitution.

VI. ARE WE REPEATING OUR MISTAKES OF WORLD WAR II?

Nevertheless, we apparently are reluctant to learn from experience. The outbreak of war in Korea found us making the same tragic mistakes.

As an example of what I mean, consider what occurred when the President ordered our forces into Korea on June 27. As you may recall neither branch of the Congress was consulted. The first the Members of the Senate knew of it was when the President made available on the floor of the Senate a copy of a press release issued from the White House.

I then raised the question on the floor of the Senate as to whether the President had arrogated to himself the power to declare war. The answer was the pretense that our participation in Korea was only a police action. We know differently now. It is war—full-scale, bloody, appalling war.

The Constitution provides: "The Congress shall have power * * * to declare war."

Yet as of this date, 3 months after the President ordered our troops into Korea, the Congress has not passed a resolution recognizing what must be apparent to every citizen—that a state of war exists.

VII. THE ROLE OF THE CONGRESS

I hope that during the months ahead Congress will resume its constitutional functions. There must be no further surrender of them to the White House. You may ask: Just what do you think Congress should do? Specifically, Congress should take these steps:

First, not one dollar should be spared that is necessary to provide the American soldier with every item of equipment he needs. Congress will make those funds available. I shall support the appropriations just as I have supported every appropriation for our national defense since you sent me to Washington. But I shall insist that the Congress exercise its constitutional authority to say how those funds shall be spent.

Second, Congress, and particularly the Senate, should reaffirm its role in the conduct of our foreign relations. There must be no more undeclared wars, no more secret agreements selling our allies down the river. Never again must we permit our diplomats to lose what our fighting men have won.

Finally, the Congress should scrutinize each presidential request for powers to impose controls and regulations. Congress should grant only those necessary to the success of the war. The hand-out state must not be allowed to ride in on the coattails of the god of war.

To talk this way may mean that I am one of the vanishing Americans. If so, I am proud to be a member of the race.

Vishinsky Sees Results

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial which appeared in the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal:

VISHINSKY SEES RESULTS

Andrei Y. Vishinsky, Soviet Foreign Minister, is killing two birds with one stone by attending the United Nations General Assembly. He is not only providing direct service for his government in the United Nations but he is also getting first-hand information on the results of Moscow's blunder in calling for the North Korean aggression.

If Vishinsky were back in Moscow he would have to take the reports as cabled and written by him by Russian representatives here. No one knows whether the Soviet Politburo was surprised or not when the United States and the United Nations jumped to the defense of South Korea. A good guess is that a speedy victory was expected without any intervention.

In addition to the intervention, the Korean affair touched off a rearmament program in the United States similar to that launched 10 years ago after Hitler marched into Poland. United States industrial power is one thing the Russians do not underestimate. Vishinsky can read and see the activity in this country that Moscow stirred up.

Boycotting the United Nations was the first blunder made by Moscow. No Russian delegate was present to halt the United Nations from opposing with arms the North Korean aggression. The second blunder was ordering the aggression, and the third blunder was setting the United States defense into action.

While Vishinsky is here he may read of the crushing of the North Korean Army whose fate now seems sealed unless new forces from outside Korea come to the rescue.

Whether Russia will be much concerned about the North Korean defeat remains to be seen. The Korean affair may have been planned as a starter of several attacks which may now be held back.

The Korean war is not yet over. There will be more bloody battles but eventually the North Korean Army will be cut up or captured. Russia will not only have suffered defeat but will have put the United States on guard with a big preparedness program.

Federal Aid to Education Will Be an Investment in the Training of Youth To Solve the Complex Problems of the Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, toward the end of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress I called the attention of the House to the fact that we had failed to pass legislation providing for Federal aid to education, and urged my colleagues of the House that we pass this legislation before the Eighty-first Congress finished its work.

Now, as the second session of the Eighty-first Congress comes to a close, I regard our failure to pass Federal aid for education legislation as one of the greatest failures of this Congress to respond to an ever growing domestic need.

I sincerely hope that the Eighty-second Congress will make a determined effort to provide aid for our schools, so that the boys and girls from the less wealthy States may have an educational opportunity equal to that of our national average.

We have overcome all obstacles to provide Federal aid to the States, local communities, and individuals, in the fields of housing, hospitals, roads, municipal planning, public health, guarantee of bank deposits, and others.

Yet, to the boys and girls of America in the field of educational opportunity we have failed to respond.

Federal aid to education will mark a great milestone in America's progress. It will be a tangible expression of our belief in our future, of our willingness to sacrifice that our young folks may better prepare themselves to solve the problems of the future, which undoubtedly will grow more complex with each passing year.

Under permission granted, I insert an article from the Monday, January 9, 1950, issue of the New York Times entitled "Statistics of the States on School Teaching and Operating":

STATISTICS OF THE STATES ON SCHOOL TEACHING AND OPERATING

The present status of total teaching staff, emergency teachers, teachers' salaries, range of salaries and operating expenditures for elementary and secondary schools, as reported throughout the Nation is as follows:

Lobbying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of all of the Members of this House to an article which appeared recently in the newspaper, Labor. The article is headed "Register and vote—Big lobbyists gang up on men who stood by people—Propaganda campaign against BUCHANAN illustrates drive to elect reactionary Congress." It follows:

REGISTER AND VOTE—BIG LOBBYISTS "GANG UP" ON MEN WHO STOOD BY PEOPLE—PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN AGAINST BUCHANAN ILLUSTRATES DRIVE TO ELECT REACTIONARY CONGRESS

(By Albert H. Jenkins)

It takes special courage nowadays for a Member of Congress to stand by the people and defy selfish interests. Any Senator or Congressman who does so knows that an unprecedented flood of propaganda will be turned against him the next time he is up for reelection.

For example, take the case of Congressman FRANK BUCHANAN, progressive Pennsylvania Democrat.

Nearly a year ago, the House gave BUCHANAN a mandate as chairman of the Lobby Investigating Committee. That mandate was to uncover the facts about powerful lobby and propaganda organizations, and to recommend ways to make them register with Congress, tell who pays them, how much, and what they do for the money.

BUCHANAN is a courteous gentleman. In his committe hearings, he leaned over backward to be fair. Though some Republican members of the committee were often insulting to him he never lost his temper. Watching how things were going, some of BUCHANAN's House colleagues thought—at first—that he was being too soft with the hard-boiled lobbyists.

OUT TO CRUCIFY HIM

As the hearings continued, however, it became clear that BUCHANAN was pursuing and revealing the facts without fear or favor. His quiet but persistent methods proved deadly.

The big lobbyists, and the powerful interests back of them, did not like it. They set out to crucify the Pennsylvania Congressman in the election which ends next November 7.

Not all their propaganda guns are firing yet, but here is some of the shooting against BUCHANAN so far—in his home district:

A RIDICULOUS LIE

The Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association mailed to druggists and other small-business men a propaganda "piece" entitled: "BUCHANAN Voted Against Small Business."

That is ridicuously false, as any close observer of Congress knows. Moreover, the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Association dominated by big and monoplistic steel corporations—would have loudly applauded BUCHANAN if he really had voted against small business.

A barrage of post cards and other propaganda against BUCHANAN is being sent to the voters of his district by the GOP State and county committees. This propaganda is of the same brand as that used by the power-trust lobby, medical lobby, and real-estate lobby, which are also flooding the mails with vicious lies against BUCHANAN.

The medical lobby is also known as the organized doctors. Its official name is the American Medical Association.

Now this medical lobby is sending to doctors, dentists, nurses, druggists, and others in his district a flood of propaganda against BUCHANAN. Why?

Because the organized doctors fear the Buchanan probe will get around to their huge lobby and propaganda campaign against President Truman's health insurance bill and other measures designed to furnish adequate medical service to the American people at a price they can pay.

RUMELY SEEKS REVENGE

On October 15—about 3 weeks before election day—one of the biggest propaganda guns will open fire against BUCHANAN in his district. This big gun is the so-called Committee for Constitutional Government, headed by Edward A. Rumely.

As labor reported, Rumely repeatedly refused to tell the Buchanan committee where the CCG and other branches of his super-lobby get the big money which enables them to carry on their vast and continuous reactionary propaganda campaigns. For thus defying the committee Rumely was cited for contempt of Congress, and may be sent to jail. So Rumely and the wealthy men back of him are out to get revenge on BUCHANAN.

AFTER OTHER CONGRESSMEN

It is no accident that all these and other powerful lobbies ganged up to pour propaganda against BUCHANAN into his district. The House committee's probe revealed close ties between these reactionary lobby organizations, and many ways they work together.

They are out to get many other Members of Congress in addition to BUCHANAN, and to elect a Senate and House which will betray the people.

But the people, and particularly the workers, can keep BUCHANAN and their other friends in Congress—by registering and by voting on November 7.

Senator Lucas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, about daylight Saturday morning, September 23, the majority leader of the Senate, Mr. LUCAS, delivered a notable speech before the Senate. It was able and courageous. He said he intended to vote to override the President's veto of the so-called McCarran anti-Communist bill. In giving his reasons, he delivered, in my judgment, one of the best speeches made on either side of this question.

I have been associated for a long time with the majority leader of the Senate; and we have differed on many matters of public policy. But disagreeing as I have with many of his votes, I have been impressed with the fact that he has performed his duties as majority leader in an able and honorable fashion. His task has been a difficult one.

The Democratic Members of the Senate have been sharply divided on principles of government, but Senator LUCAS has been fair to all Members. Never have I known him to use his official position to take an unfair advantage of a colleague. Always has he been completely frank in dealing with his associates in the Democratic Party.

Will the Russians Beat Us?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, a recent issue of Liberty magazine carries an article by Mr. Eugene Tillinger entitled "Will the Russians Beat Us"? This article describes the background and personalities of some of the secret figures working under Soviet direcion in the eastern zone of Germany. It should not be a surprise that some of these individuals were prominent in Nazi Germany. I need not stress the dangers inherent in giving power to these Nazis who, under whatever banner, will seek only to serve their own ends and the ends of a militaristic antidemocratic Germany. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILL THE RUSSIANS BEAT US?—THE ANSWER MAY WELL LIE IN OUR ABILITY TO FORESTALL THE RUSSO-GERMAN BLOC

(By Eugene Tillinger)

It was on January 30, 1943. Hitler's armies had been decisively beaten at Stalingrad. In a small room of the Red army's advance headquarters, just behind the front lines, six high-ranking German generals and officers awaited their first interrogation. Just taken prisoner, they still wore their white coats and caps over their uniforms. They did not know what their fate would be; they expected the worst. All of them were nervous—except one.

He was a thin, tall man nearly 6 feet 6. His eyes, cold and hard, looked out of a lean, ashen face, whose left side had an involuntary twitch. He was Maj. Gen. Dr. Otto Korfes, known as one of the best brains of the German General Staff.

Soviet Lieutenant Colonel Chuikov began the questioning. Suddenly everyone in the little room, Germans as well as Russians, looked up in startled surprise. For Korfes, gazing straight at Chuikov, was declaring in loud, clear tones: "It is a tragedy of world history that the two greatest men of our times, Hitler and Stalin, who obviously pursue the same goal, are fighting one another, instead of joining forces to fight together against their common enemy, world capitalism."

Almost 8 years have passed since that memorable scene. Today the very same Dr. Otto Korfes has his headquarters in offices in the Orangerie Palace in the heart of the famous Sans Souci Park in Potsdam, former citadel of German militarism. He is chief of the so-called Central Archive of the Soviet Zone, sponsored and protected by the Russians. Here Hitler's former officers, in close cooperation with the Russians, work on geopolitical and military blueprints for the future Russo-German alliance.

A veil of deep secrecy hangs over this "Central Archive." Only a trusted few secure permission to enter the area. Most of the German officers working there were members of the Free German Committee, founded in Moscow after the German collapse at Stalingrad. This committee—formed of one-time Prussian generals, Nazi officers, and leaders of Hitler's Elite Guard under Soviet sponsorship at the height of the war, was a first step toward Stalin's postwar strategy for Europe.

After Korea, the next place where the Soviets are apt to strike is in Germany. The Communists will try to take over all of Berlin, and then all of Germany. A vital link in this plan is the strange new alliance of ex-Nazis and Communists, a combination of German military and scientific brains with Soviet armed might.

The Soviets launched the Free German Committee among their prisoners of war, to lay the groundwork for converting German militarists to an old idea—the idea of close cooperation between Germany and Russia, an aim that German's Iron Chancelor, Bismarck, first propounded some 70 years ago.

The scheme worked well. Dr. Otto Korfes is not the only high-ranking German officer who has enthusiastically endorsed communism. The role which ex-Nazi militarists now play in the political, economic, and cultural life of Germany's Soziet zone is shown by the following statistics recently revealed by the Neue Zeitung, of Munich, official organ of the United States High Commission in Germany: "Sixty-five percent of all ministers, state secretaries, cabinet heads, police chiefs, mayors, etc., in the province of Mecklenburg are former Nazi officers and members of the Free German Committee. The corresponding figures for Brandenburg are 52 percent; for Saxony, 47 percent; for Thuringia, 39 percent; for Saxony-Anhalt, 61 percent."

The plan does not end here. The so-called people's police, Soviet-equipped and organized along strictly military lines, is the nucleus for a new Red German army. Instead of the swastika, it's now the hammer and sickle. The same goose-step, the same blaring bands, the same floodlights, the same torch parades. All the martial trappings so dear to the German hearts have been given back to them by the Russians.

And who are the chiefs of this Kremlin-inspired so-called people's police? Are they proletarian Communists? Not at all. They are former Nazi officers, Prussian generals, SS leaders, all of them once members of the Moscow Free German Committee, and later indoctrinated in one of the so-called Antifa (anti-Fascist) schools in Soviet Russia. Working quietly for years on this top-secret operation, the Soviets have converted a tremendous number of former Nazi militarists to their cause. They have even permitted them to have their own Soviet-sponsored party in the eastern zone, the National Democratic Party (it might more aptly be called the Red neo-Nazi Party) which has become a rallying point for former Nazis, soldiers of the Wehrmacht, etc. The party's official daily newspaper, the Nationalzeitung, speaks for all former Nazis, who, given the green light, have rallied to the Soviet cause. The chief of the National Democratic Party is none other than Dr. Otto Korfes, who also plays a star role as commander of the people's police. His deputies and colleagues are all graduates of the Antifa Academy at Krasnogorsk; they all have endorsed the Bismarck policy and become key figures in the Soviet pattern.

Who are these ex-Nazis, whom the Russians have entrusted with such high positions in their zone? Why have they stepped out of the shadows to suddenly become powerful figures in Red Germany?

Let's start with Otto Korfes. Long before Hitler came to power, Korfes was one of the leading spirits of the ultrareactionary Stahlheim. In 1934 he joined the storm troopers, while retaining his righly confidential position in the Potsdam Heeresarchiv, the classic planning office of the German General Staff. He left his desk job to become commander of the Two Hundred and Ninety-fifth Infantry Division and was named a major general by Hitler, who bestowed on him the high distinction of the Knight's Cross.

Taken prisoner at Stalingrad, Korfes immediately made himself a favorite with the Soviets. For the record, it should be noted that Lieutenant Colonel Chuikov, who interrogated Korfes after Stalingrad, is presently supreme Soviet commander in Berlin, working hand in glove with the former Nazi general.

Korfes himself makes no secret of his views. Recently he declared: "What we Germans need is a decision for the east." In a lecture at the Soviet Kulturhaus in Berlin he called Stalin's recent congratulatory message to the Eastern German Republic "a moral alliance between Russia and Germany."

Korfes' right-hand man, Vincenz Mueller, chief of staff of the "People's Police," is a typical Nazi general. He once belonged to the personal staff of Gen. Hans von Schleicher, who was assasinated on Hitler's orders during the purge of June 30, 1934; whereupon Mueller promptly rallied behind the Fuehrer. A fanatical Hitlerite, by the time war broke out Mueller was made chief of staff of the Seventeenth Army Corps. In February 1942 he was responsible for brutal mass executions of thousands of Jews in Poland.

Oddly enough, Mueller's army chauffeur was condemned to 25 years in prison by the Russians after the war because he had driven the general's car when the Germans attacked the Soviet Union. But Mueller himself not only was never apprehended, but enjoys high favor with the Soviet leaders. Utterly devoid of scruples, he is today as devoted to Stalin as he once was to Hitler.

Three other ex-Nazi generals, Arno von Lenski, Martin Lattman, and Bernard Bechler, also belong to the inner circle of the "people's police" high command. Von Lenski, turfman and cavalry officer, looks like a caricature of a monocle-wearing Prussian junkers—ice cold, supercilious, insolent. Like Mueller, and the others, when he graduated from the Antifa Academy at Krasnogorsk he took the Antifa oath: "I, a son of the German people, do hereby swear that I will always be a fighter against fascism and that I am willing at all times to sacrifice myself for this cause. May the German people punish me if I ever be unfaithful to this oath."

Martin Lattman was formerly commander of the Fourteenth Nazi Panzer Division. Martin Lattman, also rabidly anti-Semitic, was one of the early members of the Hitler Party. In a speech he made on joining the Moscow Free German Committee in 1943, he proclaimed: "Officers and soldiers of the German armed forces, save for the German people the men of the Wehrmacht. Save the Wehrmacht for the new Germany as an instrument of peace."

When he spoke these words on Russian soil back in 1942, no one took particular notice, but today they have a directive for all the Nazi generals and officers who are working for the Soviets.

Bernard Bechler was a major general commanding the Twenty-ninth Nazi Motorized Division, and also won a Knight's Cross. He too embraced communism by way of the Free German Committee. He got his reward after the war, when the Russians appointed him Minister of the Interior in Brandenburg. Today, chief of the "people's police" training school in Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, he parrots his master's voice. Recently he told his pupils: "Side by side with the Soviet Army we will drive the Anglo-Americans into a super Dunkerque that will stop their meddling in Germany once and for all."

Of special use to the Russians in the work of attracting former Nazis was Stalin's amazing statement made during the last war, even at a time when Hitler was still winning. On November 6, 1942, during the wartime celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution, Stalin declared: "We do not pursue the aim of destroying the entire organized military force in Germany, for every literate person knows that this is not only impossible * * * but also inadvisable from the point of view of the victor."

Thus spoke Stalin in the midst of the war, when the tide of Nazi victories was still running high. And today in the Soviet zone of Germany the former Wehrmacht soldiers are being reminded of those outspoken statements in their favor. Along with the campaign to woo the Nazis, Soviet propaganda now stirs up bitterness against the West. The Germans are told that the Western Allies deliberately bombed German cities during the war to kill German civilians, while the Red Army never used its military against civilians.

The German Communist puppets obediently echo their bosses in the Kremlin. For example, Moscow-trained, Walter Ulrich, chief of the German Communists, gives this big-hearted assurance: "The question of who was a Nazi and who was not a Nazi is no longer open to discussion. At present only one standard counts. Who is a peace-loving person? Who wants a unified Germany? We do not ask what party book he used to carry, or whether or not he belonged to the Hitler party."

The SED, the German Communist Party, in an official decree, states: "We are for cooperation with all German patriots, including the former members of the Nazi Party and the former officers."

Now huge billboards in the main sections of the Soviet zone are emblazoned with this message: "We appeal to all politically persecuted former Nazis to return. Every German who is being politically persecuted in west German capitalist zones should come to us and he will be received as a friend and a brother."

Besides ex-Nazis, noted reactionaries, conservatives and monarchists are now shaking hands with the Kremlin's champions of the proletariat. The most fantastic case is that of Georg Dertinger, foreign minister of the Moscow-engineered eastern German Republic. Nearly every day his name is headlined on the front pages of the German Communist press.

But the Communist press never mentions some interesting facts about Herr Dertinger's past. It forgets that he was an ardent monarchist, a close friend of Franz von Papen and a leading member of the nationalistic Stahlheim. During the Weimar Republic, Dertinger wrote editorials for the extreme rightist Der Tag. Because of his monarchist activities he was refused membership in the Nazi Party, but he maintained close relations with the Hitler regime. Goebbels even made him editor of a press service which distributed daily hand-outs to foreign newsmen.

The Soviets had good reasons for giving Dertinger such an important post, despite his record. Through his first wife, of the von Derwitz family, he has excellent connections with the most conservative army circles, and thus is able to contact those former general staff members who belong to the pro-Russian wing. Through his second wife, Baroness von Neuenstein, he can reach influential Catholic circles in Bavaria.

"Black-white-red Commies"—from the colors of the flag of Imperial Germany—is the name the Germans have given to the ex-Nazis and Prussian militarists who are teamed up with Moscow. And, naturally enough, former chiefs of Hitler's dreaded secret police have also become Stalin's pets. Ahalbert Baumler, who was once on the staff of Gestapo chief Heydrich, is now chief of the SSD, the Soviet-controlled German Security Police. Another former Gestapo boss, Leo Lange, is now in charge of the infiltration of Communist agents into western Germany. Dr. Carl Clodius, Hitler's top-flight economic adviser and right-hand man of the Third Reich's financial wizard, Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, is today economic adviser of the Cominform.

Lenin once said that whoever controls Germany controls Europe and thus the world. Control of Europe may no longer mean control of the world, but the first part of the axiom still stands. This has been a guiding principle of Russian foreign policy. In 1922, after the First World War, the Western World was startled by the announcement of a Russo-German friendship pact. Secretly signed in the small Italian town of Rapallo, near Genoa, the alliance was a bombshell comparable to the Stalin-Hitler Pact of 1939, which ushered in World War II.

As a matter of fact, the Soviet leaders have never made any secret of their true feelings about Germany. A straight line leads from Molotov's blunt statement in October 1939 that "We Russians have always held that a strong Germany is an indispensable condition for a durable peace" to Stalin's congratulatory message to the German people in October 1949, stating that the Germans and the Russians "have the largest potentialities in Europe to complete great actions of world significance."

For their part, the German militarists are realists who have not forgotten that Germany was twice defeated within one generation because Bismarck's successors, Kaiser Wilhelm and Hitler, abandoned the pro-Russian policy. Thus, resurgent German nationalism looks once more toward the east, while the Soviets foster it for their own purposes. Moscow's strategy has given German nationalism a new historic goal, to unify Germany once again with the Kremlin blessing.

What do the Germans expect from the Russians and what have the Russians promised them? This writer is in possession of a document which throws some light on this. It is a letter intercepted by French intelligence, written by an aristocratic German officer from a Soviet indoctrination camp to a relative in Germany. In it the officer significantly refers to the annexation of eastern Prussia and the territories behind the Oder-Neisse line by Soviet Russia and Poland as "unimportant events, if the problem is viewed in its entirety." And he adds:

"What do these new western borders really matter if our being on the side of the Russians opens to us perspectives unparalleled since the days of the ancient Roman Empire? For the historians of the year 2000, the most important historical fact will be that in our time the peoples of the East, led by the Slavs, realizing their historic mission, have installed themselves in those territories which history has reserved for them. The Russians have already advanced their western borders 156 miles, and the same is true of the Poles. Thus it becomes the historic task of the Germans to push our tide of invasion toward the west and to take possession of those territories which history has reserved for us."

In other words, the Prussian militarists and Nazis believe that Germany, allied with Soviet Russia, can achieve what it failed to secure under the Kaiser and under Hitler—lebensraum in the west. This is the price Stalin is willing to pay for the deal. He needs German technical skill, German brains, and German soldiers for his over-all European plans.

The handwriting on the wall is clear. Stalin intends to conclude a third Russo-German pact against the west as soon as all Germany has been reunified under Soviet protection.

The day may not be far off when that new German Red army, the people's police, will march into western Germany with black-white-red flags flying and old military marches playing. Its ex-Prussian generals and ex-Nazi officers will proclaim that they have come to liberate the Germans from the Anglo-American warmongers. Not a single Russian will participate officially and the whole operation will seem to be strictly a German show. But it will be staged, armed, equipped, and blueprinted by the Kremlin.

A Soldier's Hope of a Free World

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by a professional soldier, who does an exemplary job of rationalizing the present anomaly of building up a huge military machine to preserve peace. Like many another American, my heart is heavy that we must engage in this wasteful and unproductive armaments race, but, as General McAuliffe told his audience at Wilmington, to preserve our free society we must mobilize our resources to meet the threat. The text of General McAuliffe's address follows:

ADDRESS BY MAJ. GEN. ANTHONY C. MCAULIFFE, CHIEF CHEMICAL OFFICER, DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY, AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE WILMINGTON CHAPTER OF THE ARMED FORCES CHEMICAL ASSOCIATION, DU PONT COUNTRY CLUB, WILMINGTON, DEL., THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1950

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a distinct pleasure to appear before the Wilmington chapter of the Armed Forces Chemical Association and to discuss with you matters of mutual concern. The Korean situation brings the chemical industry and the Chemical Corps, once again, into a closely knit partnership in fulfillment of our mutual obligations.

The soldier in a fox hole in Korea, the scientist in the laboratory, and the industrialist manufacturing needed weapons and material, are all part of the national defense team. I don't believe that we are being over-optimistic in stating that our joint efforts will eventually drive back the enemy and help to reestablish the sanctity of conference-table agreements.

The decision of our Commander in Chief to commit United States troops in Korea, in execution of our solemn responsibilities under the United Nations Charter, was the result of our belief in the rights of all men to live free lives in a free world. This ideal was the lodestar of our forefathers who asserted its meaning in our Constitution; it is the keystone of our democratic way of life.

In two world conflicts during the past half century, we have committed ourselves to the field of battle in furtherance of this belief. Now once again, we are fighting, in partnership with other members of the United Nations, to help others achieve these objectives.

Now how can we accomplish this mission? How can you men as leaders of the chemical industry assist the Chemical Corps to supply our fighting men with chemical equipment, supplies, and munitions? I will try to clarify this tonight.

I would like to picture, first, the role of Chemical Corps troops on the front lines in Korea and show how some of our weapons are being used; second, the impact of the Korean situation upon the corps from a budgetary viewpoint; third, a brief review of the industrial mobilization program of the Munitions Board and procurement planning within the corps; and finally, how the chemical industry can most effectively fit into the picture.

On the basis of past experience in the recent war and an analysis of combat operations completed to date, we might briefly summarize Chemical Corps front-line activity and its part in the build-up in Korea.

Organic Chemical Corps troops are in action in Korea. Chemical maintenance units are providing front line maintenance service on all items of chemical equipment, including mechanized and portable flame throwers, smoke generators, and decontamination apparatus. A chemical laboratory unit is examining and analyzing captured materiel, supplies, and equipment. Chemical technical intelligence personnel are collecting technical information on types of warfare within the scope of the Chemical Corps mission.

Organic infantry heavy weapons units are supporting combat operations with the well-known 4.2 rifled mortar developed by the Chemical Corps. These mortars are lobbing hot messages over the hills of Korea direct to the Communist aggressors.

We are supplying napalm and incendiary bombs to the Air Force, which is doing an excellent job tactically against the enemy's strategic industrial targets. Colored smoke grenades are being used for ground-to-air signaling.

The Chemical Corps also supplies the Navy with floating oil smoke pots to cover amphibious operations; napalm for fire bombs; and smoke generators for large-scale screening of ship concentrations, port facilities, and dock installations. In addition, the Marine Corps is being supplied with flame throwers.

Although I was not associated with the Chemical Corps during World War II, I would like to assure you that I am familiar with the extent of your assistance. Without it, the corps would have found it impossible to meet the tremendous load placed upon it. Fortunately, we have a fine organization, the Armed Forces Chemical Association, to bring us together, as it is doing tonight, for the discussion of mutual problems and ways of solving them. I know that we will continue these good relationships. As chief of the Chemical Corps, I continue to seek and encourage your advice and assistance. We have a lot of problems to meet during the Korean situation. I know that with your help we can lick them. Many of the Chemical Corps items that I have just mentioned were successfully used on all battle fronts of World War II. Since then, they have been improved by research and development and are now effectively supporting UN action in Korea. But it takes money to accomplish our mission and get the supplies and equipment.

When active Communist aggression broke out in Korea, the annual appropriation bill of the Department of Defense, for fiscal year 1951, was pending before Congress. The over-all budget was based upon keeping defense expenditures at approximately the same level as for fiscal year 1950. Congress has since enacted this annual appropriation, and the Chemical Corps has been allocated $36,300,000 to carry out its normal peacetime functions. Of this, our industrial mobilization program funds are approximately the same as for fiscal year 1950. Our procurement funds amount to approximately $10,000,000. These funds will be used primarily for meeting normal issue demands of the Regular Army, for service testing small quantities of matériel, and for procurement of standard chemical items in short supply.

With the commitment of a United States task force in Korea, the corps was immediately loaded down with requisitions for critical supplies needed for combat operations. Here in the United States there was a serious depletion of normal issue stocks, such as gas masks, smoke munitions, and training matériel. Further demands were made upon the corps by the expansion of task-force troops in Korea, and by the need for equipping replacement units in the zone of interior. It soon became evident that additional funds would be required to meet these obligations and to replace depleted depot stocks.

In his first message to Congress on the Korean situation, President Truman requested $10,000,000,000 in supplemental appropriations for the Department of Defense to support combat operations. A joint resolution of Congress was subsequently enacted from which $31,500,000 has been made available for expanded demands upon the Chemical Corps. Of this sum, over $20,000,000 is required to meet the obligations of the Chemical Corps in supporting the United States task force in Korea. This money will be used principally for the procurement, production, and delivery of chemical supplies and matériel. It will also cover the increased cost of maintenance and operation of active Chemical Corps facilities. These funds will provide for the initial increment of critical items of ammunition and weapons such as fuel for flame throwers, grenades, napalm, smoke pots, and similar chemical supplies.

I wish to assure those of you who have members of your family in the service that we are doing everything possible to supply our troops with the best type of protective equipment and clothing against any eventuality.

Some contracts for these requirements will be placed with large and small manufacturers in the States of Delaware, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Virgina, and West Virginia, which comprise the New York chemical procurement district. Quite naturally you would like to know whether definite commitments can be made on the allocation of these funds through firm contracts with your organizations. For that reason, I would like to make a brief analysis of the industrial-mobilization program of the Department of Defense and the Chemical Corps' procurement-planning program, so that you can get a general idea of our procurement procedures. I hope that some of the questions which arise may be answered in this discussion. I believe that this will be of some assistance to you, for our procurement procedures have been radically changed since World War II.

The major part of our planning, as you know, is based upon procedures established by the industrial-mobilization program of the Munitions Board. This program was established to coordinate and to plan efficiently the industrial-mobilization phase of a national emergency. Basically the plan has been divided into four categories: Maintenance of reserve plants; acquisition and maintenance of essential machine tools and manufacturing equipment difficult to obtain in an emergency; planning studies and industrial-preparedness measures with industry; and planning within the Department of Defense.

One basic aspect of the over-all industrial-mobilization program concerns the allocation of civilian industrial capacity to members of the national defense team on a priority basis. In other words, the procedures established by the Munitions Board are so planned that the responsibility for procurement of specific classes of items will be assigned to a single agency. The Chemical Corps is at present responsible for the procurement of many items of chemical supplies and equipment for all branches of the Department of the Army and, upon request, for the Navy and the Air Force. These procedures, therefore, involve detailed procurement planning between military agencies and industry.

If an emergency is declared by Congress, it is hoped that the Nation's industrial resources will be effectively mobilized without undue loss of time. It is also anticipated that competition, such as existed between the armed services after Pearl Harbor, partly because of prior commitments of industry under the lend-lease program, will be largely eliminated. For instance, procurement representatives of departments of the Armed Forces will not be in your plants outbidding each other for various, and perhaps the same, items. The single-agency procurement also means increased efficiency in developing plans with industry.

Our industrial-preparedness contracts with some of your organizations have already saved considerable "lead" time.

The Chemical Corps' procurement-planning program is based upon requirements for supplies and equipment in execution of the strategic plans of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The basic consideration of this planning is the troop basis for mobilization.

Our procurement-planning agency at Army Chemical Center (formerly Edgewood), Md., analyzes our requirements on the basis of past experience and detailed studies of industrial facilities. Tentative production schedules are then placed on the corps' six chemical procurement districts, with offices in Boston, New York, Atlanta, Chicago, Dallas, and San Francisco. Their mission is to locate potential prime contractors who are qualified to produce desired end items of chemical supplies and equipment. Prime contractors are responsible for locating subcontractors for component parts and raw materials.

Prime contractors will, therefore, be fully responsible for meeting scheduled deliveries of end items. This procedure, I might point out, is a great improvement over that which existed during World War II. Many of you will recall that the Chemical Corps, at that time, was responsible for supply, inspection, and delivery of component parts to end-item manufacturers.

In carrying out our procurement-planning program, the technical procurement districts obtain preliminary allocation of a plant's capacity from the Munitions Board through local armed-services procurement-planning officers, known as ASPPO's. These officers may be members of any technical service or department of the Armed Forces. When further plans are completed between industrial-plant managers and the corps, final allocation plans for end-item production are drawn up. If satisfactory, allocation to the Chemical Corps of a plant's industrial capacity for emergency production is confirmed by the Munitions Board. In exceptional cases, however, where conflicts arise between military departments or where production bottlenecks exist among potential subcontractors, the Munitions Board, rather than local ASPPO's, is the final deciding authority.

It is contemplated, however, that in an emergency these six procurement districts will become active offices authorized to place firm contracts with industry. Some activity in this direction has already been initiated.

The New York chemical-procurement district is planning production schedules at the present time for many items that are procurable in this area. Please contact the commanding officer of this district at 111 East Sixteenth Street, New York 3, N. Y., for information on our procurement plans for these materials.

In this connection, the Department of Defense urgently requests potential manufacturers to contact procurement districts direct and not to waste their time or money in coming to Washington. Our procurement districts have all the necessary information regarding plans for emergency procurement.

Although our workload has increased considerably since the opening of Communist hostilities in Korea, full emergency procurement will not begin until authorized by Congress. I might mention that, in general, the Chemical Corps procurement agency at Army Chemical Center, Maryland, is still the primary center of our procurement functions.

The Department of Defense further requests that all industrialists and potential contractors become familiar with industrial mobilization procedures, which I have attempted to clarify. Munitions Board Manual No. 90–1, known as the Production Allocation Manual, contains these procedures and may be obtained direct from the Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C.

In summing up my discussion this evening, I believe that we are all fully conscious of the implications of Communist aggression in Korea. If we are to have the type of free society for which we are striving, it will be due to the fact that we have mobilized here at home, our military, industrial, political, spiritual, and moral forces to meet the challenge thrown at a free world by a determined and ruthless enemy. In meeting him on the battlefield, we must be prepared to meet strength with strength.

Despite the fact that we are backing up our commitments in Korea and our responsibility toward the United Nations through our military and industrial might, we are always ready to negotiate in appropriate international forums. Our objectives and our determination are clear. We seek to assist in creating situations in which the economic health and political stability of the free world will develop and mature. We have no territorial ambitions. We desire a free world based upon the right and liberty of the individual.

By consolidating our strength and concentrating on the foregoing objectives, we may give Communist imperialism reason to doubt its analysis that the free world will collapse. Eventually this may lead to moderation of the present policy of aggression. We must show that the free world is the world of the future. It has both the resources and the will to resist effectively whatever aggression may confront it. We must be ready and willing at all times to back up our commitments to assist in securing a free world for all members of the society of nations.

Let's Give the Queen of Battles a Better Break

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, recent reports from the Korean front have, I believe, emphasized the great importance of an adequate Infantry component to our national defense. However, based on my experience as an Infantry battalion commander in World War II, I have long felt that the Infantry both as a branch of our Armed Forces and as individuals deserved a consideration, in several aspects, more commensurate to the tremendous job it is called upon to perform in time of war.

In this connection, I believe that certain measures, within reason, could be taken to improve the individual infantryman's lot which would, simultaneously, improve his combat efficiency as well as that of his unit and tend to mitigate somewhat the general impression that the Infantry is the least desirable wartime service.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article on this matter which appeared in two installments in the August and September 1950 issues of the National Guard Man entitled "Let's Give the Queen of Battles a Better Break":

LET'S GIVE THE QUEEN OF BATTLES A BETTER BREAK

(By Lt. Col. Peter O. Ward, Office of the Chief of Army Field Forces)

(Pt. I)

The Infantry soldier in World War II shouldered the greatest burden, measured by whatever yardstick one chooses to use. Some of the yardsticks are chances for survival, general living conditions, physical quality of personnel, mental quality of personnel, replacement of personnel, pay, awards, and a few others.

It is my purpose to show that the Infantry suffered the greatest losses both necessarily and unnecessarily in World War II. It is my purpose to show that there are some things that can be done about the doughboys' lot if there is a world war III.

Compared with other components of the Ground Forces, and to the Air Force and the Navy, the Infantry suffers on all counts. By Infantry soldier, I mean company-grade officers and enlisted men of an Infantry regiment in an Infantry division. Armored divisions, Marine divisions, and other similar or special types of units, are in a somewhat different category, not actually on quite the same basis for comparison. For example: Airborne divisions must engage in flight and in very hazardous fighting behind enemy lines, but they receive more pay and are pulled out of the line for regrouping, etc., more often than are Infantry divisions.

One might say: "All right, the Infantry soldier does have a rough time; so what?"

Possibly, many things cannot be changed. There always has to be a place on the battlefield where there is nothing in front of our men but the enemy, and these must be infantrymen. But those infantrymen should be able to expect leaders who are as well qualified, mentally and physically, as are the small unit leaders of the other Ground Forces and the Air Force and the Navy. That was not the case in World War II.

So much has been written on Infantry casualties in World War II that it can be considered almost axiomatic that the Infantry did suffer the highest casualty rate. But the facts are more terrible and dramatic than axioms.

CHANCES FOR SURVIVAL

In the shocking economy of war the chief supply item of the Navy is ships; of the Air Force, aircraft; of the ground army, guns; and of the Infantry, human beings. The casualty lists represent blood and death, agony of mind and body, and broken homes. Unfortunately in war planning, infantrymen must be considered as a supply item.

If you are a veteran, at some time during the war you must have asked yourself: "Will I come back, and in one piece?"

Any combat infantryman who asked himself this question could not have given himself a very reassuring answer. That was because by the law of averages the overwhelming majority of combat infantrymen could look forward to getting killed, wounded, or captured. Not only had the Infantry soldier slim hopes of survival; his morale was affected by knowing it. Is there an infantry regiment that entered combat that did not increase its rear echelon personnel section substantially just to take care of the clerical work necessary to report the casualties? The T/O. & E. did not provide enough personnel for this purpose.

Have you ever been around a battalion aid station during combat? If you have, you know that—with few exceptions—the happiest group of men you ever saw were those who had been only slightly wounded but were being evacuated. There were some who were anxious to get back to their units, but by far the greater number cracked jokes, smiled, and were plainly delighted to get away from the mess up ahead.

Getting down to facts and figures as to casualties, the Third Division lost 33,547 killed in action, wounded in action, or missing in action; the Fourth, 21,205; the Ninth, 22,135; the Thirty-sixth, 26,718; and the Forty-fifth, 27,207. The average for all Infantry divisions engaged in combat was 9,505.

That is about 100 percent of the Infantry of a division when you consider that the strength of an Infantry regiment was about 3,200, and there are only three Infantry regiments in a division, and the average of 9,505 includes the divisions that saw little combat, such as those committed in the spring of 1945.

In the Army as of July 31, 1945, the Ground Forces had suffered 79.8 percent of the casualties, the Air Force (which was then part of the Army) 12.3 percent, and the service troops 7.9 percent. Of the ground arms' casualties, 67.8 percent were in Infantry divisions. Of the Infantry divisions casualties, 94.25 percent were in Infantry regiments.

The exact over-all figures take on an even greater significance. The Infantry, which comprised only 20.5 percent of the total strength overseas, took 70 percent of the total casualties.

Lt. Gen. Lesley J. McNair reported in March 1944 that, although the Infantry overseas thus far constituted but 6 percent of the Army, it had borne 53 percent of the casualties. He advised that these figures be not made public in the spring of 1944. Now the public may be told, for now the effect of those figures on the morale at home is a thing of the past. The report is no longer classified secret, and now there is an opportunity to remedy the conditions that increased the inequalities for the Infantry.

As for the Navy, the submariner provides a good basis for comparison. Commander Charles B. Carroll, a noted submarine skipper of World War II, has stated that the casualty rate among submarine personnel was 18 percent.

There is literally no approach to equality of danger. It is scarcely too much to say that there was a greater difference in danger between the Infantry soldiers and those in the other branches than the difference between those in the other branches and noncombatants in the communication zone.

Those casualty figures are good argument for equality of treatment of the Infantry. What could have been done to give them this equality? More rest is the biggest item; but other important needs are more men with high I. Q., more men better physically qualified, better trained replacements, more awards, and more pay—and more men. Consider these needs in turn.

REST

It is well known that a single drop of water falling on a man's head can be kept on with relentless, unrelieved monotony until, by that alone, the man will be driven raving crazy. With however honest intentions, there has been too much of treating infantrymen as if they were no more affected by unrelieved strain than robots.

Steel rails have to be replaced because it is a fact that after certain periods of strain a steel rail, suddenly and without warning, will crack. Even to the last day of World War II there was an unnecessary amount of handling infantrymen as if they were stronger than steel rails.

It would have saved them physically and mentally if they could have looked forward to a rest period at the end of some definite period of combat. They fought with no end in sight but the end of the war, a hospital ward, a prison camp, or death.

Had there been a definite rotation policy for Infantry troops in combat, the exhaustion rate of infantrymen would have been remedied materially. Something in the way of a rotation system such as the Air Forces had would certainly be possible. And who can calculate the odds in combat between exhausted men and others? There is surely a difference in casualty figures between men fighting under a rotation system and men fighting as if they went to dig a tunnel through a mountain and no man knowing how far to the place where he might rest. There is no way of estimating such comparisons exactly. But in July 1945, the Army Air Force had lost 12.3 percent, the Infantry 70 percent.

Next to rest, it is an absolute necessity that the Infantry get more of the available top-level brains and brawn.

INTELLIGENT QUOTIENT

By comparison with the Navy, the Air Forces and the remainder of the Ground Forces, the Infantry got the very bottom of the stockpile, so far as I. Q. was concerned. This was changed to some extent during the latter part of World War II, but by then it was too late to have any marked effect. Should another war be begun in haste, and the planning repeat these aspects of the recent war, the Infantry again would get more than its share of dangerously low I. Q.'s.

Prospective inductees were permitted to enlist in the Navy. The Navy could reject them; the Army could not. The Navy could pick and choose to a much greater extent than either the Army or the Air Forces.

Before comparing the figures, it should be noted that the combat crews are a very small percentage of the Air Force, yet prior to June 1944, 75 percent of all ground personnel of the Air Force were classes I, II, or III; those scoring 100 or over on the Army General Classification Test (A. G. C. T.) and mechanized aptitude tests given inductees. And within the Ground Forces, personnel whose A. G. C. T. score was 115 or better, and who were otherwise qualified, were plucked from Ground Forces installations and set down in the Army specialized training program.

In 1944, it was found that the Air Forces and the Service Forces had the highest percentage of classes I and II men; the Ground Forces the highest percentage of classes III, IV, and V. Army Air Forces had 59.4 percent of the class I and II personnel, Army Service Forces 37.1 percent, and Army Ground Forces 27.3 percent.

Of the men assigned to Ground Forces, the Infantry got the dregs. One division went into combat with only 2.5 percent class I personnel. And you can make a pretty good guess as to how few of these found their way to rifle companies.

Generally speaking, the Infantry was the least popular branch of the service. And it is reasonable to assume that many of the most ingenious soldiers, with high I. Q., were those most successful in devising ways to stay out of the Infantry.

Also, there were a number of ways in which high I. Q. personnel were diverted from the Infantry into the other branches.

Army Ground Forces Study No. 5 states: "Not all of the high-grade men assigned to the Ground Forces could be retained. Attrition was highest in this type of personnel. Some were lost as officer candidates who elected to try for commissions outside of the ground arms. In an Infantry division in 1942, of 1,200 enlisted men accepted as officer candidates, 800 elected officer training in Quartermaster, Medical Administration, and Finance. Apart from relative danger, these branches were probably preferred in a belief that they offered opportunities for vocational self-improvement. Election of these branches by enlisted men in the combat ground arms was later forbidden by amendment to the Army regulations."

Throughout the period of mobilization, soldiers of the Ground Forces were free to volunteer for aviation cadet training. If they did not qualify as flight personnel, they were retained by the Air Force for duty with its ground installations.

The Ground Forces had, in addition, to meet its own requirements for officer candidates, service schools, enlisted specialists, parachute volunteers and cadres for new units. After all the picking was done, the Infantry had to "make do" with what was left. Sometimes that wasn't much. It caused Gen. Ben Lear to comment that we were sadly lacking in the necessary material for noncommissioned officers, and that we must pay for this dearly in battle. We did.

The Selective Service System and the classification system were partly to blame. In general, for the Infantry there was no specific vocational preparation in civilian life as there was for the Engineers, Quartermaster Corps, etc. The infantryman's principal occupation is fighting, and (as Maj. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey has put it) that isn't a common civilian occupational specialty. Therefore, in assigning newly inducted men it was necessary to ignore, to a great extent, civilian occupations or to assign to the Infantry men who had no established occupation and therefore were unlikely to be the most desirable human material.

It is an obvious commonplace that men with no definite work are generally men with a definitely low ability to take care of themselves or others. Recent statistics have shown that even morons get along very well in certain types of occupations, and that there are numbers of such morons. One of the jobs they are not fitted for, however, is that of the Infantry noncommissioned officer. But the screening processes sent them to the Infantry by the hundreds, with the even less able who had no definite occupations at all. These men were hazards to many highly intelligent doughboys who fought in the same squads with them.

It might be asked: "Why must the Infantry have people who have a high degree of intelligence? For the type of fighting they do, all we need is a sort of dumb fellow who can hold a gun and stand on the ground. In fact, we don't want a man with too much intelligence, because that type is inclined to be high-strung and will go to pieces under too much stress."

That was a common belief, but nothing could be further from the truth.

The truth is: If you have a man who is brave, strong, and intelligent, you have the ideal infantry soldier. If you have a man who is brave, strong, but stupid, he is going to get a lot of people killed.

People do not grow braver in combat as the war goes on; they are as courageous on the first day of combat as they will ever be. But what does happen is that they grow smarter, learn how to survive—and the higher their I. Q., the quicker they learn.

As a broad general truth, the bright mind that goes all to pieces when faced with danger is a fiction. That has been demonstrated again and again. To choose one specific example, a survey among paratroopers has shown that among those who refused to jump, there is a very high percentage of low I. Q. individuals. If jumping in a parachute is an indication of courage, individuals with a high I. Q. seem to have more courage than their duller comrades. And, at any rate, whatever is indicated by refusing to jump is typical of the low I. Q.

There were many combat soldiers who were brave and strong and who won awards for valor, yet were as dumb as they came. Generally speaking, however, this type got killed, got other people killed, and could not be depended upon. They were erratic. It was the courageous and intelligent type that consistently paid dividends and lived to tell the tale.

Now, what can be done about these things?

Must the Infantry have all class I personnel? No, not that; but a better distribution could be made.

The Air Force did not need men with high I. Q.'s to sweep floors, but it had them in World War II. It had class I men working at jobs that could have been done as well by class V's.

It is reasonable to expect that highly technical requirements of the Navy, Air Force, and other components of the ground arms, must have priority on civilian skills. It appears to me just as reasonable that the infantry, therefore, should have priority on physical and I. Q. qualifications in the proportion that others have priority on civilian skills.

You can teach the section chief of an antiaircraft gun section how to run his section and he will do just about the same thing over and over day after day. You can teach the leader of an Infantry rifle squad certain general rules of thumb and that's about all. It is doubtful if he ever will meet the same set of circumstances twice in a lifetime. His intelligence must control his handling of each situation. His intelligence controls the life or death of the men in his squad.

The Infantry needs more intelligent men than many people are willing to concede. It doesn't take a Napoleon to direct, control, and look out for the destinies of 9 or 10 men, but the squad leader's job has too many responsibilities for a Mortimer Snerd—particularly a Mortimer Snerd under fire.

Thousands of fine, highly intelligent GI's were unnecessarily endangered by being sent to fight side by side with these less responsible men. And millions were endangered, both soldiers and their families 5,000 miles away, because of our relatively small quantity of Infantry.

QUANTITY

The Chief of Staff stated in his report to the Secretary of War at the cessation of hostilities: "It is remarkable how exactly the mobilization plan fitted the requirements for victory. When Admiral Donetz surrendered the German Government every American division was in the operational theaters. All but two had seen action, one had the vital missions of securing the installations in the Hawaiian Islands; the other was an airborne division in SHAEF reserve. To give General Eisenhower the two divisions, already earmarked for future operations in the Pacific, the Eighty-sixth and Ninty-seventh were halted on the west coast in February, rushed across the United States and on to fast ships for Europe. When these troops left the New York port of embarkation there were no combat divisions left in the United States. The formed military forces of the Nation were completely committed overseas to bring about victory in Europe and keep sufficient pressure on Japan so that she could not dig in and stave off final defeat."

And what would have happened had there been 10 or 15 additional divisions?

It is possible that the Battle of the Bulge, with its thousands of killed and wounded, never might have occurred. It is possible that the arrival of more divisions might have ended the war earlier. But it is certain that to misinterpret the closeness of that mobilization economy is to be like a man who has ignored a sign saying "Danger" and gotten across a bridge just as it crashed into a bottomless pit—and who concludes that therefore he can always expect to succeed by walking past signs marked "Danger."

Examine for a moment these statistics. By the middle of 1943 a program had been inaugurated to establish 90 divisions for the Army—a considerable reduction from the original program. Germany's program called for 313, Japan's 120, Italy's 70, Hungary's 23, Rumania's 17, and Bulgaria's 13. The U. S. S. R. had a program for 550; the British, 50; the Chinese, more than 300.

Total mobilization of various nations for the war gave the U. S. S. R. 22,000,000 men; Germany, 17,000,000; the United States, 14,000,000; the British Empire, 12,000,000; and China, 6,000,000.

The Chief of Staff's report continues: "The significance of the facts should be carefully considered. Even with two-thirds of the German Army engaged by Russia, it took every man the Nation saw fit to mobilize to do our part of the job in Europe and at the same time keep the Japanese Army under control in the Pacific. What would have been the result had the Red army been defeated and the British islands invaded, we can only guess. The possibility is rather terrifying."

What would have been the result had we mobilized 10 or even 5 divisions fewer? Or what if we had mobilized exactly as we did but the enemy had mobilized 10 more divisions than they did? Again we can only guess, but it could have meant the difference between defeat and victory. Certainly the war would have been prolonged for some years.

Mobilization of divisions involves timing and a gathering of manpower here briefly described as quantity. This is the business of those who make our strategic plans. It is true that strategic plans must and do change. The original concept was for an invasion of Europe in 1943, so the planners certainly had to consider that in the mobilization of divisions. For future planners, however, this is hindsight that might help: The ground forces were the first to mobilize and the last to be used. No Infantry division, activated in the United States after Pearl Harbor, entered combat until 1944.

The matter of quantity poses important problems. Army Ground Forces Study No. 4, on the mobilization of the ground army, stated, in effect: How much power can the United States, considering all circumstances in its situation, actually deploy overseas on the ground? If the United States with 12,000,000 men in its armed services can produce fewer than 100 divisions, including those in the Marine Corps, this fact must be considered by all concerned in a future global war, and certainly will be considered by any possible enemies.

Our ability to conduct ground operations overseas was limited by a number of factors: National resources needed to control the sea and air, policies of allotting national resources to strategic bombardment and the support of our allies, the need for maintenance of long supply lines and by the effort to provide American soldiers with something corresponding to their normal standard of living. It was the last two factors that accounted in large part for the prodigious growth of overhead and service units. These factors are likely always to be present. The strength of American ground armies always is likely to depend on the degree to which economy in these limiting factors is achieved.

Where did the Army economize when it had to? And economize it did. The Army by the beginning of 1945 was a more economical and leaner organization than in any other year of the war. This is where the Army trimmed off fat: A pool of soldiers on college campuses which was half as large as our entire armored force, comfortable surpluses of aviation cadets, antiaircraft artillery which numbered half as many soldiers as all infantry divisions combined; personnel solely in post-house-keeping duties, and allowances for overstrengths in some tactical units. And where did this fat go? It went to the Infantry, because that was where the critical shortage of manpower existed. But it went only when that critical shortage was in existence.

In the winter of 1944–45, the Army became frantic for Infantry replacements because too few Infantry divisions had been mobilized and too few replacements had been earmarked for the Infantry. It managed to get these replacements, and they came from the source already mentioned without impairing their efficiency.

REPLACEMENTS

The Infantry never had a satisfactory replacement or reinforcement system. Primarily, the trouble lay in the scarcity of men and the planners' basic mistake in underestimating requirements. It is a rule of thumb that the scarcer supplies are, the more tightly they must be controlled and the farther to the rear they must be held. That is why we could not have overstrengths, divisional replacement companies, and various other similar remedies which have been proposed. The new table of organization and equipment does give every Infantry division its own replacement company, but in the future, the same condition will exist again if the total quantity of Infantry is too small a part of the total fighting forces.

There were mistakes which might be prevented, in the event of world war III. The limited quantity of manpower had a definite bearing on these mistakes. It was reflected in the inadequate training of many replacements who went up to combat units; for example, one who tried to fire a rifle grenade with ball ammunition in the chamber of his rifle, at the cost of an ear—and he was lucky it was only that.

Infantry units received replacements who had been transferred in the grade of technical sergeant, staff sergeant, etc., from the Air Force, antiaircraft units, and so on. Our Infantry platoon sergeants were privates and privates first class. The high-ranking replacements, not properly trained, could not take over their new jobs; they had to be reduced in order to provide ratings for those who were doing the job—hardly fair to the men who were "busted" through no fault of their own.

It was quite usual to receive replacements who were poorly trained, particularly those who were trained in the ETO. As a consequence of such inadequate training these later replacements lacked courage, fighting spirit, and confidence.

In World War II the Army ground forces itself underestimated the correct balance of replacements. Training centers had been designed to fill vacancies in new units being activated in the United States according to the T./O. & E. Unfortunately, men died in numbers that did not balance with the plans on paper. Units in combat must have replacements based on statistics of how men actually die. These point up the need of the Infantry.

National policy is another problem to deal with. There were many policies for the employment of all inductees. There was a policy for 18-year-olds; there was a policy for 19-year-olds; and a policy for married men; then a policy for men whose children were conceived before Pearl Harbor and men whose children were conceived after Pearl Harbor. They all caused confusion.

The Chief of Staff reported to the Secretary of War: "Our ground strength was, for the size of our population, proportionately much smaller than that of the other belligerents. On the other hand, it was, in effect, greater than a simple comparison of figures would indicate, for we had set up a system of training individual replacements that would maintain 89 divisions of ground troops and 273 combat air groups at full effective strength, enabling these units to continue in combat for protracted periods. In past wars it had been the accepted practice to organize as many divisions as manpower resources would permit, fight those divisions until casualties had reduced them to bare skeletons, then withdraw them from the line and rebuild them in rear areas. In 1918 the AEF was forced to reduce the strength of divisions and finally to disband newly arrived divisions in France in order to maintain the already limited strength of those engaged in battle. The system we adopted for this involved a flow of individual replacements from training centers to the divisions so they would be constantly at full strength. The Air Forces established a similar flow to replace combat casualties and provide relief crews.

"This system enabled us to pursue tremendous naval and shipping programs, the air-bombardment programs, and unprecedented, almost unbelievable, production and supply programs, and at the same time to gather the strength necessary to deliver the knockout blows on the ground. There were other advantages. The more divisions an army commander has under his control, the more supporting troops he must maintain, the greater are his traffic and supply problems. If his divisions are fewer in number but maintained at full strength, the power for attack continues and the logistical problems are simplified."

As stated before, the most essential supply item of the Navy is ships; of the Air Force, aircraft, of the ground Army, guns, and of the Infantry, human beings. The system of furnishing Infantry replacements, which I have quoted from the Chief of Staff's report, differed from that of the Air Force in this respect: there were no planned rest periods for the Infantry. The Air Force had a definite rotation policy; the Infantry, let me repeat, (and the rest of the ground Army for that matter—had no rotation policy at all. This single factor alone could have made the infantryman's burden more nearly equal. Regarded as a supply item infantrymen should be conserved, and regarded as a human being, every infantryman should have as complete equality as possible. Even economically it should be remembered that he has a mind, a heart, hopes and fears—and nerves. Human beings give better performance by far if the psychological factor is considered, as was done for the Air Forces.

The latter's replacements were not tossed in as they were in the Infantry. A combat crew for a bomber had quite a considerable period of orientation; many an Infantry squad got its first daylight look at its newest members when the squad was under enemy fire. It needs no more than a high school French understanding of the words "esprit de corps" to get a fairly good idea of the inequality in that instance. Possibly some of this welding together might be economically managed by timing the rest periods for veteran units with orienting fresh troops. We lack so much as a field manual covering the operation of a replacement system. In practice, high type personnel frequently were withdrawn from the replacement stream by almost every headquarters through which replacements passed. The leftovers went to the Infantry units in the line, and they and everybody else concerned suffered because of it. A chain is only as strong as its weakest link and it is possible for an Infantry squad in a tight place to be as weak as its weakest member in mind and body.

It is fairly obvious that the infantryman, who is expected to live in a fox hole, make long cross-country marches, and close with his enemy in hand-to-hand combat, should be as fit physically as his comrades of the Navy, the Air Force, and the other ground components.

But was he, in World War II? He was not!

(Pt. II)

The physical hardihood of a soldier should be greater in direct ratio to his potential proximity to the battlefield. Lt. Gen. Lesley J. McNair illustrated this point when he stated, "A cook in an Infantry rifle company should not have poor eyes, flat feet, or bad hearing, because he must be able to fire his weapons, be on his feet for long hours, and hear and understand whispered directions in the presence of the enemy. These requirements are not essential in a rear-area installation."

But how many rear-area installations in the other branches had already grabbed such desirable cooks and sent men to the front-line Infantry squads who could not understand directions whether whispered or shouted?

In August 1943 General McNair proposed that a physical test be given for assignments to the Infantry, and that no selectee, unless of unusually good physique, be assigned to the Infantry if he was shorter than 5 feet 6 inches. In November he recommended that the inductees should not normally be assigned to Infantry if they were below 5 feet 9 inches tall.

In November 1943, 12,000 combat soldiers at the AGF Overseas Replacement Depot at Fort Meade, Md., were examined in an effort to obtain a cross section of the situation in the ground forces. They were inferior in height, weight, AGCT grade, and education to the average for the Army as a whole. General McNair produced evidence to show that the average height of infantrymen was 5 feet 7.74 inches, and the average for all inductees was over 5 feet 8 inches.

Army Ground Forces Study No. 5, dated 1946, states: "Physically inferior men accumulated in the Armed Forces in various ways. * * * Although men not meeting current physical standards for general military service were not supposed to be initially assigned to combat units and replacement centers of the Ground Forces, a considerable number were in fact so assigned."

Army Ground Forces Study No. 5 further states: "Having long failed to obtain from the War Department a policy of selective assignment of new inductees to the Infantry, Army Ground Forces on February 20, 1944, dispatched a confidential letter to its subordinate commanders, pointing out that infantry had scarcity value, that it comprised only 11 percent of the troop basis, that it was nevertheless the decisive arm, that it must therefore be scrupulously conserved and that the strongest and healthiest men should be assigned to it." This clearly indicates that infantrymen were not up to the physical standard of other enlisted men.

General McNair amplified his statement on physical fitness and nearness to combat zones with the statement: "It is desired to point out that Air Force combat units are peculiar in the respect that generally only a certain proportion of a combat unit can be considered as actually engaging in close combat. Dependent upon conditions, ground crews and administrative personnel of front-line combat air units may be from 100 to 1,000 miles from the enemy. Such personnel can be more or less assured of regular meal hours, favorable living conditions, and medical attention."

Medical attention is the only one of those item the Infantry could hope for.

MEDICAL SERVICE

The infantryman who was wounded or suffered an accidental injury got all the physical medical care that was possible and the very best that was available, and no praise can be too great for the personnel of battalion-aid stations. But complete medical service covers a good bit of other ground.

What makes a man ill? The following are major contributions: His mind, his physical surroundings, germs, and physical injury.

We can't do much about the infantryman's physical surroundings, and the medical service did all it could to combat disease germs and physical injury.

But how about the mind?

The most casual reader of newspapers and magazines must know that medicine has now proved effects of the mind on the body.

From hypertension to fever blisters it has been established, at more length than this article can include, that distraught minds cause genuine physical ailments. Overwhelming fear or anxiety not only can throw a good mind into a state of unbalance, but a good digestive system into conditions of ill health. Emotional tension can send the blood pressure soaring. During World War II doctors behind the lines found men suffering from unmistakable liver trouble with no other cause than shock. Shock had not made them imagine they had liver trouble. It had given them liver trouble.

All of these ills happened in other branches of the service as well as the Infantry, but it is exhaustion that works like yeast to increase these ills, and it was exhaustion that was forced on the Infantry in the largest doses with least relief.

Preventive psychiatry is the attempt to keep the mind from making the mind or the body (or both) sick, by helping the individual to achieve inner strength. Profound mental poise grows from profound belief in a purpose, combined with the abiding conviction that one is working toward its achievement. Will power to put purpose into practice is strengthened through discipline. Thousands of men needed, and could be given in the future, more of these vital steadying forces.

Quicker and less profound aids to mental stability are a feeling of personal importance (morale), identification with an admired group (esprit de corps), and attachment to a strong personality. Before the words "preventive psychiatry" were heard of, these were in common use every autumn by football coaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The medical service, of course, has in this field only the adviser's role. The medical service and the Infantry failed through no fault of their own, in administering the proper preventive psychiatry. The reasons are an accumulation of many things. The infantryman's intellectual functioning was injured through ignorance because of the inadequate replacement system and scarcity of replacements, which made it necessary to place men in the line who were not properly educated for the task. His emotional balance and his will lacked discipline as a result of inadequate training. This lack was indicated by the higher incidence of straggling and desertion; and, again, combat exhaustion was caused by mental stress and mental stress was inestimably increased by combat without rest. The rifleman seldom had a feeling of personal importance, or that he was one of an admired group, or that he felt attachment to a strong personality in his squad leaders.

All of this did not apply to all outfits at all times, but to paraphrase Lincoln's saying, it did apply to all outfits some of the time and to some outfits all of the time.

Maj. Raymond Sobel, who was on duty with the Thirty-fourth Division during World War II, has written in Combat Psychiatry about "good soldiers" under the name of "Old Sergeant Syndrome" who broke down after prolonged combat stress. He states that the most striking cases occurred among those commissioned and noncommissioned officers who had considerable combat experience. The syndrome, he writes, "occurred in well-motivated, previously efficient soldiers as a result of the chronic and progressive breakdown of their normal defenses against anxiety in long periods of combat. It was seen only in those divisions that had experienced prolonged combat commitments without relief."

Ninety percent of these cases occurred in Infantry soldiers, Major Sobel reports, many of whom had received citations, awards, and medals. Nevertheless, in spite of their efficiency, training, and discipline, "they eventually developed abnormal tremulousness, sweating and a tendency to be the first to get in and the last to get out of a foxhole."

Kipling, in a less precise language, noted the general subject:

"It was not in the open fight
We threw away the sword,
But in the lonely watching
In the darkness by the ford.
The waters lapped, the night-wind blew,
Full-armed the fear was born and grew.
And we were flying ere we knew
From panic in the night."

There are notable examples of the use of preventive psychiatry to good advantage. These were found in the airborne divisions, to some extent in the armored divisions, and in the Air Force. The Air Force probably made the greatest stride in making this type of medical service available to its personnel because it had a rotation policy. Infantry divisions did not; they lacked the means.

Related to the problem of the infantryman's morale is the system of tangible recognition of service, valued by most of humankind.

AWARDS

Did the infantryman get his just share of awards?

Well, infantrymen got 70 percent of the total casualties and 11.6 percent of the total awards. These figures are exclusive of the Purple Heart, hardly a decoration to encourage soldiers to try for.

In World War II, as of January 1, 1946, there were awarded 228 Congressional Medals of Honor, 3,799 Distinguished Service Crosses, 67,957 Silver Stars, 831 Distinuished Service Medals, 122,357 Distinguished Flying Crosses, 10,931 Legion of Merits, 10,905 Soldiers Medals, 323,160 Bronze Stars, and 1,156,615 Air Medals. Exclusive of the Purple Heart the infantry received 11.6 percent, the Air Force 76.2 percent, others 12.2 percent.

The Bronze Star for the Armed Forces was intended to be like the Air Medal for the Air Forces, but was it? Compare the statistics again—323,160 Bronze Stars, versus 1,156,615 Air Medals.

Many persons contend that the Air Forces awarded far too many medals while the Ground Forces kept their awards within reason; I contend the Ground Forces should have awarded more, not the Air Forces fewer. Even when the Combat Infantry Badge is considered, it is not enough. By comparison with the Air Forces it is no more than the various categories of wings that are awarded to bombardiers, navigators, pilots, and others.

The infantry should have had a medal which a man should get just for being subjected to artillery or small-arms fire; just for being present on the battlefield. This is about what the Air Force did—and its morale did not suffer from having too many medals awarded.

These are some interesting figures for comparison as of January 1, 1946. The number of men killed per 100 medals awarded was:

Air Force	2
Medical Department	12
Field Artillery	12
Coast Artillery	28
Engineers	29
Cavalry	36
Infantry	67

As of March 20, 1945, Infantry had received 6.9 percent of the awards, and all others 93.1 percent. The Infantry received 14 medals for each 10 men killed; the Air Force 431. These figures are exclusive of the Purple Heart.

Apart from statistical comparisons, it should be kept in mind that the conditions under which infantrymen received their awards were, generally speaking, far more severe than prevailed for personnel of other arms and services. And many deeds of heroism that were exceptional for other arms and services were, by comparison, a matter of course to the front-line infantryman. Many an infantryman's courageous act was performed without witnesses, or in the presence of witnesses who were killed or wounded before a lull in the action provided the opportunity for a formal report, and the man himself often was killed, too.

The principle illustrated further by the award for battle credit without distinction among units; for example, General Order No. 102, War Department, 1945, gave battle credit to the First Infantry Division, the Thirty-third Machine Records Unit, the One Hundred and Forty-seventh Army Postal Unit, and the Twenty-ninth Infantry Division.

PAY

Close to the question of awards is the award of regular pay for regular service.

In 1943 this was the average annual pay of enlisted men:

Air Forces	[1] $1,152
Ordnance	875
Signal Corps	780
Armored Force	760
Quartermaster	750
Antiaircraft Artillery	730
Field Artillery	730
Engineers	720
Medical	707
Infantry	700

[1] Exclusive of flying pay.

Later, grades and ratings were added which increased the average annual pay for the Infantry to $743, but the ratio remained unequal, as the other branches were increased, also. The point is: Was the infantryman compensated for hazardous duty in proportion to other branches which were so compensated—the airman, the paratrooper, the submariner? The casualties would seem to indicate that he was not. True, the infantryman received $10 extra pay per month if he had earned the Combat Infantry Badge, but this did not make up the difference.

The pay basis is due in part to the fact that in peacetime it is necessary to attract volunteers by paying more money for the more skilled positions, and not the more dangerous. An infantryman's job is not particularly dangerous—until war comes. Then, the higher pay should go to get good men for the more dangerous jobs.

Further pointing up the disparity of pay is this comparison of wartime pay of enlisted men:

Type unit	Average monthly pay	Average monthly pay, including overseas, flying, submarine, and all extra compensation
Infantry rifle company	$92	$120
Combat crew, aircraft	112	201
Submarine	102	153
Parachute rifle company		170

There are many other ways in which the Infantry came off second best, compared with other components. Some were little things, seemingly unimportant, but still, aggravations that made the infantryman feel no better about his lot.

STRAWS ON THE CAMEL'S BACK

In the Navy and the Air Force, one usually had shelter over his head; he was dry, and he got a bath once in a while. His food usually was fresh and hot. In the Air Force, combat crews got special rations. Other branches of the Army, being relatively farther from the front, did better as to material comforts than did the infantryman on the line—the rifleman who thought of the company CP as being "rear echelon"—the man who had the sky for a roof and rocks for his bed, who ate cold K rations and considered it a treat if he "liberated" a fresh egg.

The infantryman, compared with his comrades, had less opportunity to attend church, to write letters, to see a movie, sleep between sheets, to attend to his personal hygiene in relative comfort, to sleep with his shoes off.

In peace and in war, when there is an undesirable job to be done, it usually is the infantry that gets it. Others often are considered too valuable.

Instead of a plan for Infantry rotation, it might be said there was only a plan for Infantry exhaustion. If a man could just look to some time in the future when he could go home, it helped tremendously, no matter how distant that time might be. But the infantryman could only look forward to getting killed, captured, or wounded.

General Marshall wrote to the head of the Bureau of Public Relations in February 1944, "Men will stand almost anything if their work receives public acknowledgment. They are inclined to glory in its toughness and hazards if what they do is appreciated. There has been so little glamor in infantry work that the public is little aware of the requirements. On the contrary, if you will recall, I was opposed vigorously in the early formation of the Army for my attitude regarding the Infantry soldier and his importance in our war Army. It was to be all tanks and air, maybe a little artillery, with everybody motorized, etc. Now (in February 1944) the picture is being completed in accordance with the fundamental requirements of waging a successful war. The haphazard theorizing is found to be without solid foundation, and the influence of the more glamorous methods of making war is found not to be sufficient for the purpose of successful operation. • • •

"It might well be charged that we have made the mistake of having too much of air and tank and other special weapons and units and too little of the rifleman for whom all these other combat arms must concentrate to get him forward with the least punishment and loss. I don't want to discourage the rifleman and yet I want his role made clear and exalted. I don't want to unduly alarm the families of riflemen and yet it is important that some action be taken."

Let us remember this if there is a world war III.

What can be done about it?

Many things obviously never can be bettered. There always will be a place in war where a man is and there won't be anything in front of him but the enemy; and that man will be in the Infantry. His will be a dirty, nasty job.

But some things can be helped.

The most important item from an infantryman's standpoint is a definite rotation policy. Here is one: Members of Infantry battalions, after a certain number of days in contact with the enemy, should get a certain number of days out of the line. If people in other branches don't like this, let them transfer to the Infantry.

This brings up the question of quantity. The quantity needed must be clearly understood. Train every man basically as an infantryman. To solve this problem we need universal military training now.

Next in importance comes the question of mental quality. As the only acceptable minimum, Infantry must receive mentally qualified personnel, at least in the same ratio as all others.

The Infantry must be given priority on physically qualified personnel.

The system for getting properly trained replacements, physically and mentally fit, to the right place at the right time, must work.

A system for converting Air Force, AAA personnel, and others to Infantry must be planned well in advance and must be clearly understood.

Start initially with young leadership. Battalion commanders shouldn't be over 32, regimental commanders 38, and division commanders 48. That's the way you'll end up.

The infantryman's esprit de corps must be built up. One way is to borrow a leaf from the Marines' or the Air Forces' book and give the infantryman a public relations build-up comparable to that given our comrades of the wild blue yonder.

The Infantry should get a better break financially. Why not give fighting pay for combat zone service to members of arms in which the monthly casualty rate reaches a certain percentage?

Why not give the Infantry a distinctive uniform?

After these things are accomplished for the Infantry, don't make the tragic mistake of pampering. Work the hell out of 'em and particularly during training.

These are practical ways to improve the lot of the infantryman.

Now is the time to do it.

Congress Disregards President Truman's Veto by Big Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, President Truman has on several occasions lately vetoed legislation passed by both Houses of Congress by almost unanimous votes. On each occasion both Houses of Congress have overridden his veto by tremendous majorities.

What does this mean? It means that hundreds of leading Democrats in the House and Senate have rejected the President's pleas and have indicated that they have no faith in his opinions or in his judgment.

If this would happen in the congress of some of the leading nations of the world it would mean that the President should immediately step down and relinquish his high office.

I should think that he would learn that there are three coordinate branches of the Government and that each of these branches has its duties and responsibilities and that no one branch has the right to usurp the powers of any other branch.

The President's training under Boss Pendergast must have taught him that since the boss of Kansas City controlled the action of the three branches of the municipal government that the President of the United States should be the "big boss" over the three branches of the Federal Government.

Common sense should teach any person that it is for the best interests of our Government that the three branches—the legislative, which is Congress; the judiciary, which is the Supreme Court; and the Executive, which is the President, to work together in harmony if possible.

The Democratic and New Deal friends of President Truman cannot long claim that he is a man of sufficient judgment or common sense to fill the position of President if he continues to issue such statements as he did when he compared the Marine Corps to Stalin and if he continues to put his judgment as to what is the duty of Congress against the judgment of intelligent and patriotic Democrats with long honorable service in Congress.

The President evidently has no appreciation of his responsibility toward the making of our laws. He has no appreciation of his power to use the veto on the work of Congress.

The Constitution gives the President the right to veto any bills passed by Congress and the Congress may override any presidential veto if two-thirds of the Members of both Houses of Congress vote to override his veto.

It was not the intention of those who wrote the Constitution that the President should veto a bill passed by both branches of Congress just because he did not agree with the action of Congress. He should not veto a bill for capricious reasons. He should not veto a measure which has been passed by both branches of Congress acting freely and without any improper influence unless it is clearly an infringement upon the rights and jurisdiction of one of the other branches of the Government or unless it is clearly repugnant to the policies and principles and best interests of the Republic.

The President's actions in his numerous vetoes indicate petty, personal reasons of a little man and not the broad statesmanlike actions of a person worthy to be President of the greatest Nation in the world.

Of course, the President cannot be expected to write all his own state papers himself without the aid of assistants. It is clear that Harry Truman did not write the veto message which was read to Congress yesterday, September 22. This message indicates clearly that it was written by a lawyer well versed in legal verbiage. The language and the arguments suggest to me that one of the Frankfurters might have had a hand in the preparation of this message. At any rate, whoever wrote it must have felt that the bill was anti-Red and that the best way to favor the Reds would be to support the President in his efforts to defeat the bill.

In the list of those who voted to support President Truman in his veto can be seen the names of practically all of those who consistently vote against all legislation that has for its purpose stamping out un-American activities.

The bill that the President vetoed was prepared by stalwart Americans and was supported by stalwart Americans. No Reds or pinks had anything to do with the preparation or passage of the bill that the President vetoed.

The Senate also rejected the President's veto by a tremendous majority. Only 7 Members of the 96 Members of the Senate supported the President. These seven were practically all New Deal Democrats. But, in spite of a filibuster conducted by these seven Senators, the Senate by an overwhelming majority rejected the President's wishes. It is reported that Senator LUCAS, the majority leader of the Senate, refused to follow the President in his request that the Senate vote to sustain his veto.

The President and those who favor his views in the House and in the Senate argued persistently that the proposed legislation should not be passed and that it would finally work out to the advantage of the Communists. These arguments are absolutely unjustified and the proof of this falsity is that practically every Red and pink individual and organization in our country is opposed to the action and is supporting the President's veto. Can it be that these opponents are and have been giving aid and support to those enemies within our gates, who are numbered by the thousands and who all want to undermine the institutions and our great country.

I voted to override the President's veto and am well satisfied with my vote. There is no doubt that the people of the country are patriotic and favor any legislation that curbs the actions of the Communists who are within our country, most of them illegally.

The press of this country is patriotic and the large majority of the newspapers have been very critical of the President and vigorously support the Congress.

The Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch, one of the leading newspapers in the country, sets forth its opposition to the President's position in a very positive editorial, which is as follows:

VETO UNMASKS THE REAL TRUMAN

The President's veto of the bill to control Communists at home is a political betrayal of the country's sacrifices in lives and money to fight Communists abroad.

It is a desperate effort to protect those Communists and fellow travelers in his own party who carry on sabotage against American institutions, who undermine American freedoms, who confuse us in social and economic matters and who betray our military secrets.

It is the political pay-off to every Communist and Communist sympathizer from Klaus Fuchs to Alger Hiss and to all the thousands of Reds and Red followers in between who have supported his regime in return for the Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, and China appeasements.

The requirements of the bill vetoed by the President are few.

Communists, Communist organizations and Communist-front groups are required to identify themselves to the Department of Justice.

In time of war, the Department of Justice would be empowered to round up and hold, but not in criminal prisons, spies and saboteurs.

It denies Communists jobs on the Federal payroll or in defense plants or public transportation facilities.

It increases the punishment for spies and saboteurs.

The President is given wide discretionary powers in applying the various measures in the bill.

To veto it on the basis that it is dangerous to American liberties echoes the Communist whine against a restriction of constitutional rights whenever a Communist toe is stepped on.

Politically the veto will be taken as a gesture of support to all the fringe radicals in the Truman camp. It will be accepted as the cloak to cover the countless numbers of Communists and fellow travelers suspected of still being active within the administration itself.

The veto was made not for the protection of the American people but of the administration itself which cannot afford politically to allow its fringe of Reds or their hangers-on within the Government to be exposed in their full strength.

It signals again the decision of the President to stand at all costs behind the Acheson-Hiss-Lattimore policy of appeasement for the Chinese Communists who threaten the very area where our own boys are fighting and dying in a war whose purposes are far from clear.

Congress, by its overwhelming vote in favor of the Communist control bill has, on the other hand, accurately reflected the feelings of the American people about Communists. This feeling has come to an explosive head after months of exposures and disclosures by Congressmen themselves who are opposed to the Truman-Acheson foreign policy maneuverings.

This feeling demands that something be done to protect the Nation.

The voters will have a chance to confirm this feeling November 7 when America goes to the polls to elect a new Congress, a Congress which will have a new opportunity to reexamine our foreign policies in the light of every American family's sacrifices. And in the light, too, of the Truman administration's efforts to bring these sacrifices to naught by such political betrayals as this veto.

FEPC and Civil Rights Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an address which I delivered at a large civil-rights rally at Tindley-Temple M. E. Church, Philadelphia, Pa., stressing the need for strong, enforceable FEPC legislation and early enactment of President Truman's civil-rights program:

Ladies and gentlemen, friends, I welcome this opportunity to come before you because I not only believe that it is the duty of every Congressman to report to his people, but also that such occasions as this help create an atmosphere of understanding about the issues before us.

You and I know, in a brief address, one cannot hope to discuss all, or even a small portion, of the enormous number of legislative proposals now under consideration. But there is one great issue with which we all are familiar, and which commands our attention and our active support. I, of course, refer to the need for strong, enforceable FEPC legislation. I say strong because I want to emphasize the fact that some very well-known reactionaries in Government are deliberately attempting to push the enactment of a watered-down bill which is an insult to every intelligent man and woman. These reactionaries give lip service to FEPC, but avoid it like a hot potato in the showdown. I want to stress the necessity of enforceable FEPC legislation because, if legal sanctions are lacking, such legislation isn't worth much more than the paper it's written on. I demand effective FEPC legislation that is acceptable to the great body of people who are in need of it, who look to it as a living symbol of hope which will erase a smudge on our reputation as a freedom-loving people.

Fair-employment-practices legislation has been talked about long enough. It's time to do something about it.

It's time to strengthen and fortify our liberties, not sacrifice them to the whims of selfish reactionaries. It's time to actively support President Truman in his fight to enact a wise and a far-reaching civil-rights program. He can't win the fight alone. He needs your help individually and collectively, just as your United States Senator and Congressman need your help. Talk about FEPC. Have your friends talk about it to their neighbors, and have them all send letters of protest to the reactionary Members of Congress who are constantly obstructing the passage of praiseworthy FEPC legislation.

During my two terms in Congress I considered it an honor and a privilege to introduce legislation designed to contribute to the betterment of human welfare and to support every measure which in any way fostered the expansion of civil rights so that all minority groups may enjoy all of the rights as set forth in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. I am profoundly disturbed by the attempts of bigoted persons who cast aspersions on the necessity of FEPC legislation. They were best characterized recently by individuals who sought to endow educational institutions with immense sums of money provided the schools taught white supremacy or denied benefit of the funds to Catholics and Jews. Such actions are intolerable and must be stamped out, otherwise the ideal of human rights and freedom will eventually be lost, as they were in Germany and Italy and as they are denied in the Soviet Union.

The importance of FEPC action on the local level is pointed up by the fact that the commission in Philadelphia handled 294 charges of discrimination between January 1948 and October 1949. It was reported that 254 of these cases were settled and that 40 were still under investigation. Ladies and gentlemen, I do not believe that those figures tell the whole story. Many hundreds of cases go unreported, and I contend that it is therefore logical to conclude that many others are forgotten or hushed up because of machinery that is inadequate to serve the needs of a city the size of Philadelphia. I do not question the good intentions of the local commission, but I am convinced that there is room for vast improvement. Moreover, there still exists a crying need for effective State-wide FEPC legislation. This, too, should be coordinated with national legislation in order that the people of all States would know where they stand.

We need unity on every level of our society if we are to endure as a strong nation. The denial of rights which we profess to hold to be inalienable to any one group is a road block in the path of progress. It helps breed disunity, scorn, and even utter disrespect for our fellow human beings. That certainly is not the way which we, as a whole, can ever hope to reap the fruits of our democratic system of government. Our national welfare and the future of the United States as a leader in the community of nations makes it imperative that we recognize that fact now.

It is estimated that the forthcoming census will reflect a sharp increase in population figures throughout the country, and particularly in urban centers. As our population rises our problems will likewise increase in virtually every field of human activity. It inevitably calls for greater police protection, improved fire-fighting facilities, more playgrounds, more schools, and more homes. I have mentioned these few things because they are highly important in maintaining a high standard of living. When people have the opportunity to enjoy a fair measure of personal security and live up to their responsibilities as citizens, they tend to become more tolerant and understanding of the rights of others. We know from recent history that in times of depression and poverty there is a pronounced upswing in the direction of intolerance as manifest by an increase in crime and other violations of the law.

Having lived through the most turbulent years in history, we have a pretty good idea of what does, and what does not, contribute to industrial progress and economic security. Unfortunately, however, our forward steps in understanding the needs of the individual as a member of society have not kept pace with our industrial achievements.

During the past 50 years we have come a long way toward recognizing that fact as evidence by liberal legislation enacted by Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and now Harry Truman. But the job is far from completed. There is much that remains to be done in the field of social science. In this respect, the enactment of national FEPC legislation is of paramount importance. I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, I am doing my utmost to see President Truman's civil-rights program voted into law. I consider it a moral obligation to help remove the obstacles which beset minority groups at every turn. I need your help and your active support to do the job. By working together to achieve a common goal we can stem the tide of the die-hard reactionaries who, in my opinion, are making a political football of one of the most important legislative propos 's in the short, but glorious history of our country and mine.

Ladies and gentlemen, you and I have a deep responsibility to make the most of the golden opportunity exemplified by President Truman's fair-employment-practices bill.

Thank you very much for the privilege of talking to you.

A Book on Mining That Every Western Miner and Prospector Should Have on His Bookshelf

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the illustrated book containing the hearings on the Conference on the Revision of United States Mining Laws is now obtainable from the Superintendent of Documents, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.

This book contains much valuable mining information including compilation of existing mining laws taken from the United States statutes; also the Department of Interior's Manual of Mining Laws with Departmental Rules and Regulations.

Included in the volume is a Forest Service map of the national forest wilderness areas together with a description of the primitive and roadless areas.

The book also contains the prescribed forms for making locations of mining claims on public lands and in the national forests, together with copies of forms for making and filing proof of labor on mining claims, or when the requirements for mine assessment work is suspended by law, there is a form for making an intention to hold mining claims—all of which have been made part of this volume.

This compilation of mining laws and mining forms is intended to be useful as a handbook for citizens who may discover valuable ore veins in isolated and faraway places, which may even be in the mountain fastness of Alaska, and will enable anyone to write on the spot and post notice of mining locations.

That this book is in demand is indicated from a few of the letters received which are inserted herewith:

ARIZONA SMALL MINE
OPERATORS ASSOCIATION,
Phoenix, Ariz., September 21, 1950.
Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMPTON: This will acknowledge your letter of September 16.

The copies of the Spokane conference arrived today. I certainly do appreciate getting the copies you sent me. This is going to prove to be a very valuable book. We also appreciate your taking over this hearing and making it a matter of record with Government backing.

This book has a tremendous amount of data in it that is extremely valuable.

Thanking you again, and with kindest personal regards, I am,

Very sincerely,

CHARLES F. WILLIS,
State Secretary.

MOSCOW, IDAHO, September 21, 1950.
The Honorable COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Recently you presented me with a copy of Conference on Revision of United States Mining Law, Serial No. 24. This I greatly appreciated, and even more so now as I am able to well use it in my irrigation and mining law class at the college of law. There are no available textbooks for this course and the students of the course as well as the law library could use a couple dozen copies of this publication as well as any other that you might have in relation to our course. Would greatly be appreciated by all, anything you could do for us in regard to these publications.

Very truly yours,

WAYNE L. LOVELESS,
Student of Law, University of Idaho.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE,
September 22, 1950.
Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
Old House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMP: I have been very interested in reading the hearings before the House Special Subcommittee on Public Lands on Revision of United States Mining Laws. May I compliment your subcommittee on its zeal in conducting the hearings and compiling this valuable document on the development of our natural resources and the administration of laws relating to the public lands of the United States.

Many Idahoans have asked me to mail copies of this publication to them, and I find that I am unable to comply with all of their requests because the committee's supply is practically exhausted. If you have any copies available for distribution, I shall be happy to receive them. Can you tell me whether it is expected that additional copies will be printed for distribution by Members of Congress?

With warm personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

HENRY.
(HENRY DWORSHAK.)

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., September 21, 1950.
Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WHITE: Our supply of committee hearings on Conference on Revision of United States Mining Laws, serial No. 24, is practically exhausted. I am wondering if you could supply us with additional copies of this hearing for distribution to the various libraries throughout the United States.

Sincerely,

CLAUDE E. RAGAN,
Clerk.

UNITED STATES
GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
DIVISION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1950.
Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WHITE: This office has placed on sale to the public, Conference on Revision of United States Mining Laws, and now finds the demand heavy enough to investigate sources of additional copies provided they are needed.

Our purpose at this time is to determine if you or the Committee on Public Lands have a surplus supply that could be released to the Superintendent of Documents and avoid the possible expense of printing additional copies.

Please address your reply for the attention of the Procurement Section.

Sincerely,

ROY B. EASTIN,
Superintendent of Documents.

Democratic Administration Fails To Provide Needed Financial Aid to Flood-Stricken Areas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, September 20, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress are well aware of my efforts to secure financial assistance and relief to the distressed citizens, as well as financial aid to the townships, counties, villages, and cities in the flood-disaster area of northwestern Minnesota.

It may be recalled that I introduced quite a number of bills and I want to mention them again. They were as follows:

H. R. 8278: To provide an appropriation for the reconstruction and repair of roads and other public facilities in the State of Minnesota which were destroyed or damaged by recent floods.

H. R. 8435: To provide for the authorization for an appropriation for the reconstruction and repair of roads, bridges, and other public facilities in the States of Minnesota and North Dakota, which were destroyed or damaged by floods in the spring of 1950, and for building necessary road dikes and levees and dike and levee protection, and

H. R. 8461: To authorize Federal assistance to States and local governments in major disasters, and for other purposes.

However, because of the opposition by every Democratic administrative agency and bureaucrat, it was not possible to get favorable action on these bills in the House Committee on Public Works at this time.

There was but little sympathy and cooperation from these agencies, before and during the time hearings were held before the House Committee on Public Works on my bills and similar bills. The agencies and departments even opposed the national disaster bills, introduced by Representative Lemke and myself, namely H. R. 8396 and H. R. 8461. They opposed the very heart of these measures, namely, section 6, which would provide that in any major disaster the President is authorized to make grants of funds to local governments for restoring, reconstructing, or replacing their public facilities "damaged or destroyed in such major disaster. Such grants shall not exceed 50 percent of the estimated cost, as determined by the President, of the restoration, reconstruction, or replacement of such public facilities without enlargement of service capacity or other betterment, excepting that the grant may exceed 50 percent of such estimated cost in the case of a local government with respect to which the President specifically finds and declares that the damage to public facilities resulting from such major disaster is of such magnitude and extent that the fiscal resources of the local government are insufficient to defray 50 percent of such cost: Provided, however, That in determining the fiscal resources of the local government consideration shall be given to (1) the extent and probable duration of any impairment of the taxing base and borrowing authority of the local government as a result of the major disaster, (2) the existing or prospective availability of aid from State and other sources, and (3) the eligibility of the particular local government project for Federal financial assistance under other laws. Grants made under this section may be used to enable the recipient thereof to qualify for other Federal financial assistance which is conditioned upon State or local participation in financing the work."

The best part of the measure was taken out.

In my opinion it is time for a change in the Federal agencies and departments and time for a change in leadership, which presently expresses more interest and gives more support for assistance to the people of Africa, Europe, and other parts of the world, even though they are not suffering or handicapped by serious flood disasters or other catastrophes.

The best bill we could get out of the committee was the revised Hagen-Lemke bill, which will provide for some financial aid to financially distressed civil agencies, including townships, villages, counties, cities, and so forth, for the temporary or emergency rehabilitation of roads, bridges, culverts, and so forth. However, in view of the unfriendly attitude of the administration, I am fearful that the distressed townships, counties, villages, and so forth, will get very little consideration under this national emergency disaster program, which now has been passed by both branches of Congress, the Senate only yesterday—Tuesday, September 19. I am presuming, of course, that the President will sign the bill which authorizes but does not provide $5,000,000 for emergency disaster aid. However, the President has over $1,000,000 in his emergency disaster fund which can be used to supply funds for approved applications for aid until the $5,000,000 is actually appropriated by Congress.

I will urge the officials of the townships, villages, counties, cities, and so forth, to immediately make application for assistance, if they feel that they can qualify.

If the law and program is properly administered, some assistance can be secured. If the administrators fail to cooperate, then we should make an immediate effort in the Congress to pass more definite and direct legislation, requiring and directing that financial aid be given to distressed townships, villages, counties, and so forth, in emergency disaster areas.

There will be little opportunity until January to get any new legislation. During the special session, to be called about November 27, excess-profits-tax legislation and a few other matters will be considered. The chairman of the Committee on Public Works in the House has indicated that he will not take up any further legislation of this kind before his committee during the special session of Congress, and the same situation perhaps exists in the Senate.

I am very sorry that the Senate did not improve the Hagen-Lemke disaster bill. It was passed in the House in somewhat of a rush because of the emergency situation in northwestern Minnesota and North Dakota. However, the Senate delayed in taking action on the bill until the last week of the Congress. Having been delayed that long, the measure could not have been improved and amended without endangering passage of the measure, since only a few days of the session remained.

The aid which will come to the townships, villages, counties, cities, and other civil agencies is just a drop in the bucket compared to what they will need. I charge the Democratic administration with complete lack of interest, sympathy, cooperation, and support for the distressed flood-stricken areas of Minnesota and North Dakota.

Even in spite of assurances given to Members of Congress and the public at the time of the flood disaster and immediately thereafter, we again have a situation of too little too late.

It will be our job to continue our efforts and try to get the Democratic leadership to see the error of their ways and to join us in getting much improved and more desirable flood-aid legislation. You can be sure that this will be my purpose and aim as long as I am the Ninth District United States Representative in Congress and if I am returned to the Congress by the vote of the people on November 7.

Senate Bill 784 Failed To Receive Fair Consideration in the House—In Fact, It Never Reached the Floor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, when House Resolution 818, the rule to bring Senate bill 784 before the House for consideration, came up, I was prepared to speak in support of the Senate bill, which was a bill to return $384,256.26 in bond money wrongfully withheld from the First, Second, and Third National Steamship Companies.

Much of the time for debate on the rule to bring the bill to the floor for consideration was consumed by members permitted to speak out of order on issues entirely irrelevant and foreign to the provisions of the bill. The arguments of the opponents of the rule went far afield, and did not deal with the issues in the bill.

A study of report No. 2135, dated May 25, 1950, of the House Judiciary Committee, on S. 784, will readily disclose this. No credence can be given to any of the objections raised, which were unjustified and unjustifiable objections evidently made to confuse and obscure the issues, and prevent a fair and full presentation of the facts concerning the rights of the claimants to the return of the bond money wrongfully withheld by the Maritime Commission.

As the Members of Congress will well recall, this Government agency has recently been abolished by a terse directive of the President, who followed the recommendation of the Hoover Commission. This action was approved by Congress.

S. 784 states in plain language what its purpose is; namely, to return to the depositors "$384,256.26, being the balance of certain sums deposited by 'the companies' as a security." The objectors would make it appear that no such balance exists. They have either allowed themselves to be misled by the groundless contentions of the Maritime Commission, or they are acting as belated spokesmen for the Commission.

Mr. Speaker, the contention that this claim is stale is unfounded. This case has had the continued, serious consideration of Congress since 1936. Eight successive congressional committees have analyzed the evidence in the case, and have brought to light the facts and the motivation for the delays. The committees have evidently recognized this deliberate pattern; to wit, the endless procrastination with the apparent objective of tiring the companies and their owner by the endless, time-consuming and expensive legalistic subterfuges which the Maritime Commission has carried on in the name of the Government, and at public expense.

The congressional committees evidently recognized the tactics of the Maritime Commission; their endeavor to confuse the issues, the fallacy of their contention that sales were involved in the transaction and that the companies had breached the provisions of a sales contract, and the attempt to support this contention by lifting a short sentence out of the context of the testimony, thereby seeking to justify a plea for forfeiture of the funds as liquidated damages. The Maritime Commission failed to support their contention in court. It is evident that the congressional committee became thoroughly aware of the injustice of these delaying tactics.

The House Judiciary Committee in its report on S. 784 dated May 25, 1950, on pages 17 to 19, joins previous congressional committees in emphatically denouncing these unjustifiable attempts to alienate the companies' cash property as liquidated damages.

The companies were forced to go all the way to the Supreme Court in this case, and the Court affirmed the companies' claim that the status of the Government was not that of a sovereign, but merely that of a liquidator of the assets and obligations of the Fleet Corporation—see page 6 of House Report No. 2135.

The claim has not been before Congress since this determination was made.

This is the first time that these claims have been before the House since 1940, and since all the relevant evidence has been assembled. All of the evidence now in the record was not collected or presented when the forerunner bills were vetoed by the late President Roosevelt. In vetoing the previous bills passed by Congress for the relief of these claimants, President Roosevelt was misinformed; his veto was obtained through the assertion of the Maritime Commission that "It decided there had been a sale and refused to return the money." President Roosevelt's Attorney General, after reviewing the facts concluded and so advised Congress that the President's veto was obtained through the aforesaid groundless and invalid contention of the Maritime Commission.

As a result of the Senate's inquiry to the court in 1940, the United States Court of Claims determined in 1946 in its findings of fact, based on unrebutted evidence before the court, that "there were no sales," that "the companies breached no contracts" and that they "did not damage the United States to the extent of $384,256.26, or any part thereof."

S. 784 provides for the return of this $384,256.26. It does not provide for the payment of interest for the time of withholding these private funds.

On April 13, 1950, Hon. Peyton Ford, Assistant to the Attorney General, on behalf of the Department of Justice, reported on S. 784 to the House Judiciary Committee as cited on page 30 of the report—that the Department of Justice has "no further objection to the passage of this bill," and Mr. Ford further pointed out, in the aforesaid report, that—

> I desire also to call the attention of your committee to the fact that the Attorney General while a Member of the Senate reported the bill favorably on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary and actively supported the measure on the floor of the Senate.

On page 34 of the official House report, No. 2135, is an accurate and precise summary of the account concerned. It shows $384,256.26 as the unreturned balance of the companies' cash bond funds, after allowing to the Fleet Corp. and its successor—that is, the Government—all due credits versus offsets. These figures have never changed. As cited on page 22, in his statement in support of S. 784, the Honorable SAM HOBBS, of Alabama, attests as follows:

> There has never been any dispute as to these figures, or any of them.

The unrebutted evidence in this case supports this accounting as correct. The companies have proven to the Court by point-for-point evidence, the errors in any accounting other than that above.

The following excerpt from page 19 of the House Judiciary Committee report is pertinent thereto:

> The attempt by adverse expression of opinions, by negation of the facts, by complete disregard for the evidence in this case, to evolve a "framework of accounts" by retroactive bookkeeping, contrary to all evidence accounts and their status, to thereby just exactly make claim for the confiscation of the $384,256.26 now that the heretofore alleged contention and reasons have been proven as thoroughly invalid, appears unworthy of consideration; it would be the opposite of fair dealing, justice, and equity.

Every objection and every contention contrary to the purpose of S. 784 has been proven invalid, and apparently have been repeated for the sole purpose of beclouding the issue and obscuring the truth.

Such attempts, however, cannot extinguish the public records showing the receipt and the retention of the moneys in question, nor can they change the title and ownership of the moneys; and it is regrettable that such questionable tactics have been used to delay the return of the balance of the companies' cash bond. Unrebutted evidence now of record has proven that the companies fully performed and faithfully carried out the agreements which they had guaranteed by their cash bond.

With the exception of the objections which were suddenly raised on August 22 and August 31, no Member of Congress has heretofore, after a study of the evidence, done otherwise than approve the purposes now provided for by S. 784.

As stated in House Report No. 2135, on page 2:

> It is evident that the published reports of exhaustive investigations by congressional committees have recorded a full exposition of the facts, and have cited their judgment that the funds herein concerned must be returned to the citizen companies as provided for in S. 784.

It is pointedly cited on page 4 of the Committee on the Judiciary report, under the title of "Conclusions," that—

> It is noteworthy that up to this time every Member of Congress has recognized the equity and morality of this demand of the companies for the return of their cash property herein involved. Reference is made to page 1 of Senate Report No. 548, to wit:
> "After this case came to the attention of the Congress and was fully investigated by members of the Senate and of the House committees, and reported on to Congress, Congress has consistently endeavored to provide the relief due to these companies, which common sense and justice, honorable and equitable consideration of the facts do require."

Realizing the injustice that has been done these claimants and the equity of their claim, I was prepared and intended to speak in support of the bill. I was surprised at the incomprehensible type of objections voiced by the opponents of the rule on S. 784, in light of the facts available to the objectors in the evidence in the exhaustive reports of the House Judiciary Committee. It is regrettable that the rule was voted down as a result of the misinformation asserted by the objectors, and because the supporters of the measure were given no opportunity to be heard.

There is no justifiable excuse for the objections. The conscience of the objectors ought to urge them to withdraw their objections as a matter of good faith, and out of respect to their fellow Members of the House who were misled by their unwarranted contentions.

S. 784 is justified and proper legislation. The honor of the Government requires that it be enacted into law.

The Republican Record of Promise and Performance for the American Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, between the closing of the eighty-first session of Congress and the morning of next November 7 when the election booths of the Nation open once again to American voters, the farmers of my district, and of hundreds of other districts throughout the country, are going to do some serious thinking about a number of problems facing them as citizens of our great Republic. They will want to know—and they have a right to know—how I voted and how Republicans generally voted.

First of all, let me say that no one knows better than I, or appreciates more, the magnificent role played by the American farmer in the history of this Nation's progress to world leadership. The well-being of this country's agriculture is the foundation stone of the Republic's strength. Without a healthy and stable farm population there can be no real and lasting stability in America.

Our farmers have not made their major contributions down through the years of war and peace without sacrifice, and I, for one, am deeply appreciative of the unending struggle waged by our men and women of agriculture against the vagaries of nature, against drought, flood, and pests, and against the sometimes cruel twists of economic fate.

In times of peace the Nation's farm families have toiled long, hard hours to keep America the best-fed nation the world has ever known. But even more impressive have been the American farmers' achievements in time of war when they have been called upon to do the near impossible in wringing from an often reluctant Mother Earth food not only to supply our needs at home but to bolster our allies around the globe with the necessities of life. They have done this with curtailed manpower and in spite of shortages of equipment and materials. And while doing it many have given their sons and brothers to the fighting front.

Now once again the time is drawing near for American citizens to make decisions in the voting booth. These decisions, shaping our destinies, merit a period of careful study of issues by all our people.

One of the issues farmers will think about and discuss with their typically hard-headed approach will be the farm program. They will, I am certain, give careful consideration to past party promises. These American farmers will also, you may be sure, give sober thought to party performances. And they will take a long and careful look at future prospects.

Even a casual check of the records down the years will convince any fair-minded observer that the Republican Party is the traditional friend of the Nation's farm population.

As representative of the Second Congressional District of Indiana I was among those members of the party who supported the soil-conservation program of 1935 and 1936 in the Seventy-fourth Congress. I again voted for the welfare of the American farmer in the Seventy-fifth Congress when a measure providing Federal aid to farmers for soil conservation came before the House.

The Republican Party was quick to recognize the need for emergency action when farmers in many parts of the Nation suffered disastrous crop failures because of adverse weather conditions and hordes of insect pests. Here again I was among those who backed a measure in the Seventy-seventh Congress providing Federal funds for crop-failure relief.

In the Seventy-eighth Congress two major bills concerning agriculture which received Republican support, including mine, were one providing incentive payments and another which continued the Commodity Credit Corporation. On this latter measure it was Republican aid which enabled the bill to pass despite an overriding veto.

Moreover, it is a matter of record that I have consistently supported all general agricultural appropriation bills to come before the House.

But what of more recent legislative history?

Without question our farm friends will compare the records of the Eightieth and the Eighty-first Congresses as those records bear on the problems of agriculture.

WHAT WILL THEY FIND?

When the farmers of the Indiana Second Congressional District make that comparison what will they find?

I will tell you what they will find. They will find that solid, enduring farm progress was made under the leadership of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress. As House majority leader of the Eightieth Congress I am proud of Republican accomplishments on behalf of American agriculture.

These farm friends of mine will consider that in the Eightieth Congress they were given the Agricultural Act of 1948—the first permanent farm bill ever written.

As majority leader in the Republican Eightieth Congress, I know it was drafted only after the closest consultation with farmers and leaders of the great farm organizations, including the American Farm Bureau.

They will remember that the Republican Eightieth Congress authorized $800,000,000 in loans for rural electrification—twice as much as any previous Congress, with REA electricity extended to nearly a million farm homes during fiscal 1948 and 1949—again more than double the previous figure for any similar period before World War II.

The farmers of my district will also consider that the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress appropriated more than $500,000,000 for soil-conservation activities on American farms. And another $262,500,000 for soil-conservation payments for 1949.

Not to be overlooked among the beneficial legislation passed by the Eightieth Congress on behalf of the American farmer was an act amending the Federal-Aid Road Act of 1916. This amendment authorized $900,000,000 to be spent during 1950 and 1951 on highways of the Nation, with a major portion earmarked to improve America's vital network of farm-to-market feeder roads.

How does this performance stack up with the pledge in the Republican declaration of principles for 1948?

We said:

We have pledged stability of farm prices during the reconversion and readjustment periods. We will carry out those pledges. We will support sound, permanent proposals to give farmers expanding markets and their fair share of the national income. We reaffirm our long-standing support of soil and water conservation. We shall support measures designed to protect better rural living.

Did the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress keep that pledge? The record speaks eloquently for itself.

PROMISE VERSUS PERFORMANCE

What of the Eighty-first Congress—the Democrat-controlled Congress under a Democrat administration which had promised to be all things to all people?

Now that we are closing the books on the activities of the Eighty-first Congress the farmers in my district can consider that record.

They can, and you may be sure they will, consider how, after fiddling and fussing for months, the Democratic-controlled Eighty-first Congress, in the closing days of the first session, finally rushed through, in desperation, a "new" farm law which, when it becomes operative after 1950, will resemble closely the very Agricultural Act of 1948 passed by the much-maligned Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress.

The farmers in my district will also discover that the Eighty-first Congress could do no more than modify, under impetus of a bipartisan group, the charter of the Commodity Credit Corporation, an agency, mind you, that was given its first permanent Federal charter by the Republican Eightieth Congress.

The farmers of America will find, moreover, that the Crop Insurance Act of 1949 is legislation which continues the crop-insurance program on an experimental basis—again as begun in the Eightieth Congress—provisions for gradual expansion of crop insurance to additional counties and containing other modifications of the law pursuant to the new program initiated in 1947.

Farmers comparing the accomplishments of the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses will notice that legislation authorizing the REA to make loans to financial expansion, construction, and operations of rural telephone service was introduced by a large bipartisan group of Republicans and Democrats.

Having thus considered the actions of the Democrat-controlled Eighty-first Congress, citizens in agriculture may fairly ask what happened to the grandiose promises made by the Truman administration. Again the record speaks eloquently, and I do not believe my farm friends will be fooled by this Democratic attempt to put laws given to them by the Eightieth Congress in new wrappings, tied with new ribbon, and passed to them as gifts of the Trumanites.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

Hoosier farmers always look a gift horse in the mouth. In this, I suspect, they are no different from their neighbors in other States.

My friends of the Indiana Second District have been closely scrutinizing a Democratic gift horse, which might better be called vote bait, known as the Brannan plan. They want no part of the spavined critter.

The farmers I know want no part of a scheme spawned by the CIO that would reduce the traditionally free and independent American farmer to a shackled serf chained to a system of socialized agriculture, bedeviled with bureaucratic red tape, and haunted by the fear of heavy punishment for failure to properly fill out a Government form.

They want no part of a Federal law which provides that all farmers must keep such books and records and make such reports as may be required by the Secretary and that if they fail to keep these reports and records they will be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than a year, or both.

They do not want to be dependent for a considerable share of their income upon annual appropriations out of the Federal Treasury which one day might not be appropriated, and which surely, if appropriated, would be in large measure paid by the farmers themselves in increased taxes. That is just what the Brannan plan seeks to do.

They want no part of the Brannan plan and neither do I. Neither did a lot of Democrats of the Eighty-first Congress.

But the farmers of the Nation know only too well that the Socialist-minded planners want it desperately. And they know that the peril of this preposterous, two-faced Janus which makes the false promise of high prices to farmers and low prices to consumers—with the difference presumably coming from thin air—will always be an ominous cloud on the American farm horizon as long as the radicals are in power. The Brannan plan and all that it implies constitutes the future prospects for the American farmer under leadership of the Trumanites.

What, then, do my farmer friends find to consider for the future under Republican leadership?

For the part I was privileged to play in helping to draft the 1950 statement of Republican principles and objectives I am proud to point to these pledges to American agriculture:

A. A program to provide a fair price for the farmer's products in the market place aided by a system of price supports and by protection against the dumping of competitive commodities produced by underpaid foreign labor, to the end that the farmer's standard of living will be in line with the contribution he makes to the national economy.

B. Continue and enlarge programs of research and education, both in production and marketing, with particular attention to cheaper and more effective production, a better and more effective marketing system, especially for perishable commodities, sound cooperative marketing, and the development and expansion of industrial uses for agricultural products and by-products.

C. Continued development and restoration of our soil and water resources through soil conservation and reclamation.

D. Expansion of animal agriculture as a means of reducing surpluses, rebuilding of the soil and providing a better diet for our people.

E. Special encouragement for the development and ownership of family-sized farms, improvement of rural living conditions, and completion of the rural electrification program.

F. Development of export markets for the surplus crops which can be efficiently produced in this country.

Here is a Republican program not master-minded by the CIO but worked out only after long consultation with leaders of our great national farm groups. It is the blueprint for building a prosperous and enduring farm economy based on sound principles, tested and proven by the experience of men who know—men who have wrung their livelihood from the land as sons of agriculture. It offers no fantasies, no double talk, no false promises, no sleight-of-hand, and no economic witchcraft.

It is not a program that is "too good to be true," but one which is geared to reality, reasonable and workable in its many parts.

MEN OF COMMON SENSE

I have faith in the sound common sense of the American farmer. I believe he wants and expects a reasonable return based on the extent of his production efforts. I do not believe he can be taken in by will-o'-the-wisp schemes, of which the Brannan plan is a typically shocking example.

The records of the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress and the Democratic-controlled Eighty-first Congress are now on the books for the farmer to examine carefully in the weeks that lie ahead.

On the Republican side of the ledger he will find sane and effective pledges backed by a record of sound performance. On the Truman Democratic sheet he will find held out to him nothing but the dismal specter of the Brannan brainstorm.

My Report to the Railway Employees and Other Workers of the Ninth District

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 21, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, as we all know there has been very little legislation of direct or vital concern to labor, which was considered by this Democratic-controlled Congress.

Of course, the average workingman, railroad employee, or white collar worker is just as much interested in all legislation considered by the Congress as any other citizen. Nevertheless, he is perhaps more especially interested in legislation which would more directly concern him, his job and the welfare of himself and family.

There has been little opportunity in this Congress to vote on so-called labor legislation for the reason that the few bills that were desired by the labor organizations were bottled up in committee and never came out on the floor of the House for consideration or vote.

Therefore, in making this brief report to railway employees and other labor people of the Ninth District, I desire to go back to my record of previous Congresses, following the President's policy, to show to them that I have been friendly to and on the side of the workingman.

My record in behalf of labor speaks for itself. I quote from the official records to show how I voted on legislation which was of special interest and concern to railroad employees and other workers. The record shows the following legislative acts and my vote in behalf of labor in every instance:

Crosser amendments, railway retirement bill, H. R. 1362; House voted July 3, 1946. I voted for labor.

Venue bill, railway suit bill, H. R. 1639, HAGEN's office in Washington, D. C., was Capitol Hill headquarters for union representatives fighting venue limitations; House voted July 17, 1947. I voted for labor.

Full Employment Act, prolabor legislation, H. R. 4437; House voted February 7, 1946. I voted for labor.

Smith-Connally bill, vicious antilabor bill, S. 796, Seventy-eighth Congress, June 4, 11, and 25, 1943. I voted for labor.

Case bill, antistrike legislation, H. R. 3908; House voted February 7, 1946. I voted for labor.

May-Smith-Arends bill, another antistrike bill, H. R. 3937; House voted December 11, 1945. I voted for labor.

As many labor leaders understand and believe, the vote on the Taft-Hartley bill was not a fair test as to which Members of Congress were friendly to labor.

In the first place, the Taft-Hartley bill does not affect railroad labor. In the second place, the law is not what some union labor leaders represent it to be. Many features operate to the benefit of the workingman and should be retained. On the other hand, a few changes will undoubtedly be made during subsequent sessions of Congress to rectify possible inequities.

An effort was made in this present Congress to improve the Taft-Hartley bill, but administration leaders wanted no improvement in the bill but worked for its complete repeal and the repeal of all labor provisions as set forth in the Taft-Hartley law. Many members of unions did not want all labor laws repealed insofar as the Taft-Hartley provisions are concerned. I felt as they do, improvements could be made in the law and therefore I voted for a measure which would improve the Taft-Hartley law.

As a former railroad employee, myself, and as a farmhand at one time and one who has done a lot of manual labor, I just want to assure the railroad employees and other labor people of my district that I will never vote for legislation which would be contrary to their best interest. I will always work, vote for, and support the welfare of the working people of the Ninth District and Nation.

In closing I want to insert at this point a letter which I have received from the Government Employees' Council, of the American Federation of Labor, expressing appreciation for my interest and support of legislation desired by workers. The letter follows:

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES' COUNCIL OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., October 25, 1949.

Hon. HAROLD C. HAGEN,
Member, House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HAGEN: As we turn through the pages of the legislative history of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, we find that Federal and postal employees' working and financial conditions were improved.

Legislation was enacted into law improving the Federal retirement system, the Employees' Compensation Act, salary adjustments for all employees, classification laws were amended, and several other laws enacted improving the service and for the betterment of all Federal and postal employees.

We of the Government Employees' Council of the American Federation of Labor are delighted to express to you our heartfelt thanks for the major part you played in writing the legislative history of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress.

This is considered a thank-you note and does not require an answer.

With kindest personal regards and every good wish, I am,

Most sincerely,

THOMAS G. WALTERS,
Operations Director.

"In Bad Taste"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave previously granted me, I would like to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following editorial taken from the Daily Times published in Mamaroneck, N. Y., entitled "In Bad Taste":

"IN BAD TASTE"

Gov. Thomas E. Dewey, speaking at a public dinner in New York City on Thursday evening, had the courage to speak forthrightly in the presence of the heads of the Soviet delegation to the United Nations on the subject of Soviet concentration camps.

Thereupon, the Soviet's representatives ostentatiously arose and stalked from the room.

While the large majority of the audience, and we believe a preponderance of the American public, applauded the remarks of Governor Dewey, reliable newspaper reporters at the occasion recounted that some American guests at the head table expressed the view, privately, that the Governor's action was in bad taste.

That is more than surprising. It is astounding. And if these guests had even a portion of the courage which actuated Governor Dewey in his plain talk they would have allowed the use of their names instead of making their remarks privately.

In bad taste, indeed!

What about the taste in Korea where the subsidized armies of these same Soviet representatives are murdering in cold blood wounded American prisoners?

It is our firm opinion that we have had entirely too much of this namby-pamby, kid-glove treatment of Communists, both foreign and domestic brands. Why not recognize the enemy for what he is, and treat him accordingly?

And while we are at it, let's line up the critics of patriots who speak forthrightly with those in whose behalf they offer these excuses.

For too long we have been calling a spade a garden tool for cultivation. Now let's call it a spade, whether Moscow likes it or not. And let's take off the kid gloves and put on boxing gloves.

McMahon's Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "McMAHON's Campaign," published in the Hartford Times of September 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

McMAHON'S CAMPAIGN

The man who is being picked both within and outside the State as a likely winner this fall is Senator BRIEN MCMAHON. If the Senator, himself, has any doubts as to his reelection, they did not appear in his opening campaign speech the other night. In fact he made no special appeal for votes. But he gave his listeners an accounting of his activities and record in Congress the past 6 years in an address that for statesmanship, forthrightness, and candor struck a high note in a State campaign badly in need of such a lift.

There was no partisan appeal, no reference to his opponent, Joseph E. Talbot, no catering to special groups, racial, labor, or business. It was a summation of his efforts in behalf of world peace, of defense, of control of the atomic bomb, all of which have already been recognized in the Nation and in other parts of the world as outstanding. This record will stand the closest scrutiny and, the Times believes, entitles him to continue his services in the United States Senate for another 6 years.

As chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, the Senator has become an authority on the peacetime and wartime uses of atomic power. In this field, he is a pioneer as well as an experienced, responsible leader. He has had the opportunity of working closely with the White House, the State and Defense Departments, and all the other units of government into which the variety of national and world problems are channeled for policy and action.

While preferring to work for world disarmament and peace, the Senator said he supported every measure, including Korean defense, that would help prepare us in our conflict with Soviet Russia.

"If I've been wrong, I've been terribly wrong," is a statement that could come only from one whose conscience is clear and who is content to leave the final judgment to the electorate on voting day.

So far, however, Senator MCMAHON's performance in Washington, both in behalf of the Nation and his State, has been highly creditable and his opponents will have no easy time trying to belittle it. There is no sense in replacing him, especially in these critical days when experience and leadership are a prime need.

Greek Concentration Camps at Makronissos

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VITO MARCANTONIO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, September 22, 1950

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, 3 years ago when I opposed the Truman doctrine I predicted that the hundreds of millions of American dollars being sent to Greece would not be used to feed the people, restore a stable economy, and institute a democratic government for that country. I warned that it would lead to disaster for the Greek people and arm a reactionary government against its own people.

Three years later we can see the results. The average Greek worker lives in a paper hovel, earns less than 60 cents a day when he is lucky enough to find work, and pays more than a day's wages for a pound of potatoes. The budget of the Greek Government today faces a deficit of billions of drachmas, while scandals about misappropriation of funds by corrupt politicians and generals continue to rock the Nation. One-third of the children of Greece have no schools to go to while American dollars are building airstrips and military roads. Democratic trade-unions have been all but wiped out and government officials replace the elected leaders who have been imprisoned and exiled by the thousands where they have escaped execution.

These are the fruits of the Truman doctrine, which has maintained Greece as a military base, impoverished its people, and maintained hundreds of anti-Fascist fighters in concentration camps in order to terrorize the people. The United States mission in Greece, by countenancing these brutal concentration camps—surpassing even Dachau in atrocities—is making of America a hated symbol of terror.

Our State Department would have us believe that these concentration camps are health resorts for rehabilitation purposes. That is pure "bunk." There is an enormous amount of documentary material that refutes this idea. The Greek-American Committee for the Abolition of Makronissos has made available authentic documents to prove the falsity of the State Department's window-dressing statements.

Some of these documents have been published by the Daily Compass, a New York newspaper, in a series of articles exposing the actual conditions on Makronissos, the largest and most hideous of these death islands. I should like to insert some excerpts from these articles into the RECORD:

Last fall and winter, ships carried to the rocky island of Makronissos, 3 miles off the Greek coast in the Aegean Sea, thousands of inmates of the Greek Government's network of prisons and concentration camps.

Here, according to an act of the Greek Parliament, these Communists and leftists, these captured rebels and persons of dubious loyalty, were to be reeducated. Alexander Diomedes, then premier, told New York Times correspondent C. L. Sulzberger: "We wish again to make them good and useful Greeks. They will be received and treated as people who are lost sheep returning to the flock."

Sulzberger described this, in August 1949, as the "first experiment in mass decommunization."

Now the experiment is over, and the gray rock of Makronissos is again being left to the birds and fishermen. The prisoners are being loaded on ships and taken to Ai-Stratis, Trikkeri, and other islands even smaller and more remote than Makronissos.

The prisoners who are leaving are fewer in number than those who came. Thousands have been reeducated to the satisfaction of the Government; they have been released to their native places on good behavior. Many others have died, their bodies thrown in the sea, and others have been transferred to hospitals or insane asylums on the mainland.

No first-hand survey of the Makronissos experiment is likely to come from the United States mission which is so busily engaged in "rehabilitating" Greece. But pertinent data exist in the form of items in the Athens press, reports by foreign correspondents permitted to visit Makronissos, and letters from prisoners smuggled off the island.

Even a second-hand survey permits conclusions. It indicates that the educators of Makronissos did not spare the rod. It indicates that to purify men's minds they broke men's bodies. The education of Makronissos was education by fire.

The spokesmen of the Liberal and Populist Parties remark with satisfaction on the number of graduates from Makronissos, a barren, gray island baked all day by a blazing sun and swept at night by chill winds. They quote the statements of repentance published almost daily in the press:

"I, John Kourtis, * * * declare that I condemn with disgust the Communist Party, ELAM, ELAS, and EPON, and, in general, all their offshoots, because they have proved that they had as their aim treason, arson, deception, and adventurism."

"I, Nicholas Selimos, * * * dissociate myself from the Communist Party * * * and take as my life's compass the ideals: faith, fatherland, family."

But what arguments were employed by the teachers on Makronissos to convert Selimos to the ideals of faith, fatherland, and family? What facts were marshaled for his benefit—what texts did he study?

Basil Davidson, a former lieutenant colonel in the British Army, who visited Makronissos last December and reported his findings in the New Statesman and Nation, wrote:

"While on Makronissos I could not discover any of the normal apparatus of education. There were no classrooms; the library contained less than 50 books, some of these being duplicates. I was introduced to no educationalists of any degree, even the lowliest."

Last January, A. Venidicoglou, president of the Woodworkers' Union, told a court in Athens:

"Before I signed the statement I had been subjected to almost incessant torture for 59 days on end. Only when I stood a hair's-breadth from death and I realized that I could not hold out any longer did I sign the paper. * * *"

In a letter published June 18 in Democratikos Typos, organ of the anti-Communist Democratic Alliance, George Kustekis, a soldier, wrote:

"Before that tragic dilemma, life or death by torture, I could not do what so many heroes, simple and great, have done. But if, in a moment of weakness under the most brutal pressure, the men of darkness tore a 'recantation' out of my soul, they have not crushed my faith."

From those who, having signed no statements, remain prisoners letters have made their way to the outside world. Toward the end of last year an intellectual, whose name obviously cannot be disclosed, wrote:

"Every few days new groups arrive. All those who are pronounced 'reeducated' are immediately sent to groups organized into companies. Those who resist 'reeducation' are dispatched to the Sixth Company for further indoctrination. * * *

"The second group which came numbered nearly 800, among whom were intellectuals. They were beaten with particular viciousness. Nearly 170 did not sign. * * * One prisoner from the second group committed suicide by severing his veins with a fork. Another tried to swallow a broken spoon and a third slashed his wrists. * * *

"There have been acts of courage which left the Fascist soldiers speechless. When one prisoner was ordered to undress and lie down, all of those present did the same thing in solidarity."

The data contained in such letters come from men who presumably are Communists or leftists. But substantial information is also available from anti-Communist sources.

The newspaper Democratikos Typos reported in March that the Makronissos authorities "have extended their 'reeducation' measures to women as well. Evangelia Skevafilaka Triandafilia Giumkel and Pipsta Marangu have gone mad as a result of torture. * * *"

Mahi, organ of the Socialist Party, the Greek equivalent of the British Labor Party, reported in its issue of April 5:

"Marinos and another man were hurled from a height of 20 feet onto the rocks. Ballas was spitting blood, Kiourdzis vomited blood, and nobody escaped unscathed. Those who could not stand it any more and signed from despair were transported to the convalescents' section. The others were thrown back into the cages of the solitary confinement section where they were left for days without care, food, or water."

On April 14, Mahi reported:

"One exile, whose name we have in our possession, had not only been tortured most brutally, but when he persistently refused to sign, had one of his eyes gouged out. Finally he signed, and read a speech: 'In this miracle-working Lake of Siloam, I have recovered my sight. I was blind, and I have seen the light.'"

In the files of UN Secretary General Trygve Lie is the shabby original of the most detailed description extant of what has taken place on the Aegean island of Makronissos, which since 1947 has served as a reeducation center for Greek political prisoners.

Its author is Manolis Proimakis, himself a prisoner on Makronissos, former member of the Greek Parliament, veteran leader of the Democratic Alliance Party, a non-Communist party of the left.

It was written in secret, dated January 24, and smuggled off the island. Proimakis asked that his name be signed to it and that it be titled, "J'Accuse."

He declares that he has restricted himself to describing the camp guarded by the Second Special Armed Battalion, where 7,000 prisoners were then undergoing reeducation. "All that I relate forms part of my own experience. I have seen these things happening with my own eyes," he writes.

"At nightfall they take us to a deserted place behind the tents of the Eighth Company. There the process known as 'fishing' begins among the new arrivals. Soldiers who have been well rewarded for the part they are to play are sent among us, seeking out men from their own locality, acquaintances, and old men who do not look as if they would have great powers of resistance. * * *

"Those 'fished out' are separated from the crowd and the soldiers describe to them the tortures to which they will be subjected. * * *

"In a state of extreme terror this mass of human misery waits, and, as soon as the soldiers' bugles have given the signal, the next phase of operations begins. It continues till 5 a. m. the following day."

THREATS AND SCREAMS

"It is dark, the soldiers advance on the ranks of the prisoners, they shine their torches on men shivering with cold and sleeplessness, choose from 5 to 10, and lead them to the confession room, one at a time. * * *

"The officers begin their work by bringing intense psychological pressure to bear on the prisoners. Promises and threats are characteristic of this stage, while the victim hears the cries and screams of suffering which shatter the stillness of the night. * * *

"The man subjected to this psychological pressure is alone and at the mercy of his armed jailers. While he awaits his fate he sees some of his comrades carried away on stretchers, others dragged along the ground by two or three men, others with whom he has lived for months, with whom he has discussed a thousand things and whose sanity he could not doubt, he sees mad, driven completely out of their minds and capable only of inarticulate cries. * * *

"Those prisoners who still refuse to sign are taken by military police into ravines where they are subjected to an even more inhuman beating. The soldiers, armed with truncheons and knobby wooden clubs, beat them until a number fall to the ground with broken limbs and try to crawl away moaning with pain. These are then thrown into nearby tents with other prisoners."

SIX HUNDRED REFUSE TO SIGN

"Is it necessary to add that after such treatment a large number of prisoners sign in order to end their sufferings?

"The treatment described above was meted out to those who arrived on Makronissos on December 2, 3, and 5, 1949. The majority of them were elderly, sick, sufferers from TB and ex-officers of the Greek Army. Out of 1,900, 600 were able to stand up to this torture and refused to sign the 'declaration.'

"These 600 men are isolated in the Eighth Company. There they spent the terrible night of December 8, a night of blood and horror.

"At 10 o'clock at night, when all the prisoners were lying down, worn out by the suffering of the past days, they were wakened by wild shouts and a crowd of savages burst upon the recumbent men, pulling them and beating them unmercifully to force them out of their tents. * * *

"As soon as we were all gathered outside, they divided us into groups of 100 and led us to different parts of the camp. There a new questioning took place, even more cruel than the first, at the end of which we were again delivered to our tormentors who, after making us undress completely, beat us savagely all night long. At 5:30 a. m. the groans of hundreds of men rose to heaven.

"At this stage 106 more signatures were obtained. * * *"

The testimony of Proimakis, together with that of scores of others, has made the name of Makronissos a Greek synonym of Dachau. Now the agonies of Makronissos, which have lasted 1,000 days, are drawing to a close. But the torment of its inhabitants is not over; they are merely being transported to smaller and more distant islands of rock, where, perhaps, their voices will not rise above the wind and sea.

SIX GROUPS DESIGNATED

Last October, as a substitute for the decrees of martial law, the Greek Parliament enacted a law designating Makronissos as the national reeducation center, and directing that prisoners be transferred there. A council of five ministers was set up to supervise it.

The law defined six categories of persons subject to arrest and internment on Makronissos:

1. Military personnel "considered dangerous to the security of the armed forces."
2. Anyone "exiled by the security committees as dangerous to public order."
3. Anyone arrested by the military authorities for "having committed suspicious actions" threatening the armed forces, provided that the local security committee concurred.
4. Bandits who are captured or who surrender.
5. Those condemned or awaiting trial and those "in exile for participation in antinational activities."
6. Those "preventively arrested by the Ministry of Public Order or the military authorities."

Persons released from Makronissos as satisfactorily reeducated were to be rearrested if the local security committee determined that they had resumed antinational activities.

UP TO THE POLICE

On October 16, the newspaper Mahi, organ of the Socialist Party, the Greek equivalent of the British Labor Party, commented:

"The categories subject to reeducation on Makronissos include everybody—except those whom reaction does not want out of the way. * * * Everyone is covered, because it is the police who will, in fact, decide, since it is the police files which are behind the security committees."

Two months later, the Ministry of Public Order further clarified the law by officially defining a "nationalist" as one who has had "no dealings with the police" since 1945 and who voted in the 1946 elections—which were boycotted not only by the Communist-led EAM, but also by the anti-Communist Socialist Party, the Left-Liberals, the Progressive-Republicans, and the Agrarians.

The working of the Makronissos system was illustrated by the elections of March 5, from which the EAM parties were excluded. Makronissos itself was the central issue; the liberal candidates led by Gen. Nicholas Plastiras and the candidates of the Democratic Alliance, a non-Communist organization of the left, campaigned on a platform of amnesty of political prisoners and reconciliation.

Despite official paring of the electorate, liberal and leftist candidates received 415,000 votes, electing 70 deputies to Parliament, whereas the Populist Party, the bulwark of the right, polled only 274,000, or 18 percent of the total—a sharp decline from the 55 percent it received in 1946.

Observers agreed that the electorate repudiated the Government as far as it could; it was prevented from doing so completely by the very system it was seeking to end.

"Martial courts are still operating and people under detention have not been released," the Socialist Party declared in mid-February. "Except in some great cities, the left-wing and democratic masses do not dare to express their political opinions."

Representative JACOB K. JAVITS, Republican, of the Twenty-first Congressional District, investigated the charges against the Greek Government, however, and reported his findings to a constituent on May 19:

"I find that in the detention camp on Makronissos there are civilian detainees being held under the charge that they are unreliable with respect to their loyalty to the Greek Constitution.

"These civilian detainees are being requested to subscribe to a standard declaration abjuring communism and the guerrilla movement and affirming loyalty to the Greek state—* * *.

"United States investigators, however, state that they have found no evidence of atrocities though there are complaints of mistreatment by those who have not signed the declaration. It is charged that atrocity stories are being circulated as Communist propaganda."

THE OFFICIAL TOURS

Presumably JAVITS and his informants were guided by the reports of correspondents and others who have made tours of inspection of Makronissos under official auspices.

How such visitors were deceived was explained recently by the newspaper Mahi, organ of the Socialist Party, the Greek equivalent of the British Labor Party:

"A twofold effort was made to deceive visitors. First, to keep out of sight all those who should not be seen. Secondly, to compel the rest to speak and act in accordance with the orders of the administration; to assist it, under compulsion, to present to the outside world a 'magic screen' * * *."

One visitor who saw through the magic screen of Makronissos was Basil Davidson, correspondent of the New Statesman and Nation (London) and former lieutenant colonel in the British Army. He wrote:

"In the course of several hours we were shown upward of 20,000 prisoners. I saw young boys undergoing intensive nationalist indoctrination. And I saw, at the other end of the scale of experience, and in living conditions which are a disgrace to Greece, famous leaders of the wartime resistance such as General (Stefanos) Sarafis (commander of ELAS) * * *.

"While on Makronissos I could not discover any of the normal apparatus of education. There were no classrooms; the library contained less than 50 books. * * *

What is this 'reindoctrination'? I kept asking the army officers who escorted me. And for answer they pointed to the ubiquitous Greek flags, bade me listen to the everlasting repetition of the national anthem, talked enthusiastically about the singing and the speeches. That is good enough perhaps for the foreign visitors who normally land on Makronissos. It can obviously convince no one who knows anything of life and politics in Greece."

In its issue of April 21, Mahi suggested that visitors go to the Daphni Mental Asylum, where former inhabitants of Makronissos were being treated:

"The asylum is dirty and overcrowded, and the sight of so many other mental cases and maniacs, with their fits, cries, and screams, the semidarkness of the wards, the filth on the floor and tables, the gray unchanged linen, are not calculated to lead to recovery."

Mr. Speaker, the American Government is now cutting its funds to Greece. Why? Is it in order to force a basic change in the Greek economy, to help the people of Greece achieve stability and security? Quite the contrary. The Truman doctrine now seeks to inflict further punishment on the people of Greece. The Truman doctrinaires demand more arms from Greece, not more bread—they demand less freedom, not more, for the Greek people.

For the fact is that the concentration camps and prisons have not proved an answer to the demands of the Greek people for bread, security, and freedom. The Greek people, despite the armed-camp atmosphere that prevails in this ancient home of liberty, are answering the terror of their government backed by American funds and occupation forces, with growing demands for the abolition of the concentration camps and a general amnesty for political prisoners.

The collapse of the Plastiras government in Greece was brought about when the Greek people, protesting nationally, succeeded in making Plastiras declare his desire for a general amnesty for the 70,000 political prisoners in Greece. In the New York Post of September 3, 1950, William Attwood, its foreign correspondent, wrote:

The fall of Premier Nicholas Plastiras' centrist government came about because it called for a policy of leniency toward former Communist sympathizers and a reduction of the armed forces from 150,000 to 80,000 * * * it promised a reform economy, civil liberties, and social progress * * * it recognized that Makronissos was infamous.

Now note these words:

The United States Government, rather than grant general amnesty, put a new government into power—a new government which is Fascist-minded. * * * Plastiras has been replaced by a less liberal government under Sophocles Venizelos.

This is the verdict of an anti-Communist correspondent. It places the responsibility for reaction in Greece where it belongs—on the American officials in Greece—and behind them the Truman doctrine which is supported by both Democrats and Republicans. The votes that have been cast for the Truman doctrine and its appropriations are now clearly seen to be votes for reactionary governments, for concentration camps, for the deaths of labor leaders and liberal editors, for the impoverishment of the Greek people and the loss of their freedom. These are the fruits of the Truman doctrine. But the Greek people will not eat those fruits—and the American people, when they learn the truth, will repudiate the Truman doctrine.

Tribute to Senator Lucas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tribute to our majority leader, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with my colleagues in paying a few words of tribute to our majority leader, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

The Senator from Illinois deserves our appreciation for the excellent record he has made as majority leader under trying circumstances. He has shown patience, industry, courage, tolerance, and tact, and under his leadership and his understanding of legislative and parliamentary procedure, the record and the accomplishments of the Eighty-first Congress have been outstanding. I join my colleagues in congratulating the majority leader on a job well done.

British Comments on World Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, appended hereto is a letter from the distinguished American lyricist and author of such favorites as Oklahoma and South Pacific, Mr. Oscar Hammerstein II, giving some comments by outstanding British parliamentarians on the subject of world government:

WRITERS BOARD FOR WORLD GOVERNMENT,
New York City, September 7, 1950.

The Honorable JACOB K. JAVITS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN JAVITS: When I was in London a few months ago I was invited to talk to a group of the Members of Parliament about the progress of the Federalist movement in the United States. They know that from my association with the Writers Board for World Government I had some information and great interest in the subject. In my informal speech I mentioned the resolutions pending in both the House and the Senate, stressing the strong backing for these bills, both in numbers and in the caliber of the sponsors.

There was much enthusiasm when I finished, and hope was expressed that communication could be started and maintained among the interested legislators in the two countries.

Because of my great concern about the present situation, and because more than ever the events in Korea have proved to me that the only alternative to world law is world war, I am taking the liberty of sending you a few excerpts from a report that was sent to me by Gilbert McAllister, Labor Member of Parliament for Ruthergien. All of the members of Parliament who were present at the meeting on May 25, backed the motion stated in the enclosure.

I trust you will read the news from Great Britain with as much interest as I did.

Sincerely,

OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN II.

Quotation from a letter from Gilbert McAllister to Oscar Hammerstein II:

"Since I saw you I introduced a motion in the House of Commons calling for the amendment of the United Nations constitution to make it an effective world government. This attracted the signatures of over 40 members of Parliament of all parties. They were mainly Labor, but it was supported by Conservatives such as Mr. Isaac Pitman, the head of the great publishing firm; Lord Douglas-Hamilton, brother of the Duke of Hamilton; and Mr. John Tilney. Then, I was able to get in on the Korea debate and make a speech. As a result, Mr. Clement Davies, the leader of the Liberal Party, declared in favor of world government; so did Mr. Anthony Eden."

Text of motion introduced in the House of Commons by 40 members of Parliament on June 28:

"World government: That this House, regarding with deep concern the situation which has developed over Korea, call upon His Majesty's Government to instruct their representatives at the United Nations to move a resolution under article 109, calling for the reform of the United Nations in such a way as to make it an effective world government able to make and maintain world law and thus give to the peoples of the world the freedom from fear which was one of the major aims of the Second World War."

Clement Davies said:

"For many years I have desired a world government. I am perfectly sure we shall never get permanent peace until all of us are prepared to surrender part of our sovereignty and have an international body that will lay down the laws all of us shall obey. That is one great fault of the United Nations organization, that some were put above the law and some below the law. I only wish, and so do my party—who were the only ones who protested against it—that that right of veto had never been inserted. We desire that there should be only one army, the international army, to maintain the law."

Anthony Eden said:

"I am sure myself—I have been sure for many years—that the only alternative to war or international anarchy is the establishment of the rule of law. Efforts have been made to do that in the past. They have failed. I have seen them fail. I have had my share of responsibility in those events. I do not think there is much object to be served in examining those failures, except to try to learn from the mistakes of the past."

Winston Churchill, speaking at a dinner in London on June 28, 1950, said:

"What hope can there be for the future of the world unless there is some form of world government which can make its effort to prevent a renewal of the awful struggle through which we have just passed?"

Tribute to Senator Lucas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a tribute to our majority leader.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, for the fight against communism, nothing is more important to success than wise, courageous, unswerving leadership in the legislative chambers where policies are debated and decided. Fortunately for the United States and the cause of freedom, SCOTT LUCAS has supplied that indispensable high caliber of leadership. Senator LUCAS has a keen understanding of our defense problems, our veterans' problems, and our great problem of defeating communism. Both before and since the outbreak of aggression in Korea, SCOTT LUCAS' understanding of our defense needs and his sure-footed, determined leadership in the Senate have contributed enormously to his country's success in turning back the Communist aggressors. The Nation needs more men like SCOTT LUCAS in places of leadership—to lead America's fight against Communist imperialism.

Bill Benton: Idea Man on the Run

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, pursuant to the general order entered into September 23, I ask leave to insert an article written about me in Coronet magazine in September 1948, long before it ever occurred to me that I would be running for election to the Senate. I insert this article because of the many inquiries that come to me about my record prior to my appointment to the Senate. I cannot of course take credit for all the statements in the article, particularly the more flattering ones, and I insert this particular piece in part because it is the most up-to-date piece about me written before my appointment.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BILL BENTON: IDEA MAN ON THE RUN

(By Arthur Bartlett)

WILLIAM BENTON used to be an advertising man. He was, in fact, so sensationally successful as an advertising man that most people still think of him as such. Which just goes to show how hard it is for a man to live down his past.

When the New York Herald Tribune recently referred to BENTON as a publisher, he was as elated as a teen-ager being addressed as "Mister." For 12 years he has been in the unusual situation of a man struggling to rise above his own success. In the process, he has been an educator, a radio impresario, a film producer, a music dispenser, an economist, a patron of the arts and a publisher.

BENTON has probably stirred more cultural pots to a boil than anyone else in America—and he has also made several million dollars. But he does not consider the money-making important, for he could have done that as a top-flight advertising man.

Part I of the BENTON saga is a fabulous Alger success story. He was the poor boy from the West who came to New York. He was the $25-a-week beginner who skyrocketed to $250,000 a year. He was the young man who started a business on a shoestring 3 months before the 1929 crash—and pushed it to the top while all old and established companies found it difficult to hold their own. Finally, the Alger story has an O. Henry ending.

It came in 1936, when BENTON was still only 36. He had made money—reputedly a million—but bigger and easier earnings lay ahead. He had become one of the great men of advertising while he still had half a lifetime in which to enjoy his commanding position and profit from it. Instead he sold out and retired from the advertising business. It was time, he announced, to start reaching for higher things.

Currently, he is chairman of the board of the Encyclopedia Britannica, of Encyclopedia Britannica Films, and of the Muzak Corp. He is special consultant to Secretary of State Marshall on matters concerning the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), which BENTON was largely responsible for vitalizing during a recent term as Assistant Secretary of State.

He is vice chairman of the Committee for Economic Development, a group of long-range planners in the higher brackets of American economic life, which he helped to form. He also has numerous other interests, but none whatsoever in the thriving advertising firm of Benton & Bowles, from which he retired in 1936. From 1937 to 1945 he was vice president of the University of Chicago—a longer time, as he points out, than he spent with Benton & Bowles. Yet, people still insist on thinking of him as an advertising man.

This insistence is not difficult to understand. Now 43 years old and well-groomed, assured and almost professionally affable, BENTON might well be picked by the student of occupational types as an advertising man. Moreover, he is still by nature the archetype of American advertising man—eager, intense, bubbling with ideas, and always under such mental steam pressure that he invariably makes trains with only seconds to spare, and long since stopped using his middle name, BURNETT, because it took too much time to write a middle initial.

Characteristically, BENTON spent his first day as vice president of the University of Chicago in preparing a presentation aimed at selling the Rockefeller Foundation on investing $4,000,000 in an educational-film project which he had dreamed up for the university.

At 11 o'clock that night, with an assistant, BENTON put the finishing touches on the presentation; then was ready to drop into a night club for a bite of supper. (Incidentally, he didn't get the $4,000,000, but he later launched the educational-film project anyway.)

BENTON considers the Ediphone an indispensable tool to record instantly the ideas that are constantly effervescing from his mind. On his first day as Assistant Secretary of State, he indicated where he wanted one of these instruments placed in his office.

"Oh, we never use Ediphones in the State Department," he was told.

"You do now," said BENTON.

This was only the first of many shocks experienced by the staid old State Department during his hectic sojourn in its hallowed halls. In that job, he was officially in charge of Public Affairs, but even this high-sounding phrase failed to convince people that he was not an advertising man. His task was to sell America to the world, and when he resigned, the New York Times rubbed it in with well-meant praise:

"It needed an advertising man of Mr. BENTON'S energy and persistence to tune up and get this new organ going, and to persuade and browbeat a reluctant Congress not to cut the whole overseas program * * * out of the budget."

BENTON is obviously proud of his triumphs as an advertising man, but his friends think he is also secretly embarrassed by them. He is a man who likes to be called BILL, and his urge to associate himself with things on a higher plane than soap and breakfast food, they explain, carries with it no parallel urge to wear a high hat, but comes from a feeling somewhat akin to guilt; for BENTON comes from a long line of poor but high-minded clergymen and educators, and he was the first in his family for generations to devote any time or effort to getting rich.

BENTON was born in Minneapolis in 1900. His father, an ex-minister who had become a college professor, could write three degrees after his name. His mother had been superintendent of schools in Otter Tail County, Minn., when she married Professor Benton. After his death in 1913, she filed a claim on some free land in Montana, and mother and son lived there 4 years, proving up the claim. Thus BENTON is one of those rare men in America today who experienced the pioneer struggles of a homesteader in his youth.

By 1917, the homestead had been secured, and Mrs. Benton, going back to teaching, set her son's feet firmly on the academic path. A good boyish voice helped him get a scholarship at Shattuck School in Faribault, Minn., which had a choir. From there, he went on to Carleton College, also in Minnesota, and then transferred to Yale, where his father and grandfather had preceded him.

Unlike them, he failed to make Phi Beta Kappa; yet as chairman of the board of editors of the Yale Record, he demonstrated his own kind of talent by developing an editorial campaign which boosted the Record's circulation and profits to a new high, meanwhile earning $1,200 for himself.

One of his classmates was Robert M. Hutchins, a serious-minded young man who later was to become president of the University of Chicago. Three years after him, in 1924, was a young man named Chester Bowles, whom BENTON did not know at Yale but who was to become his partner in Benton & Bowles before heading the OPA during World War II.

After BENTON retired from Benton & Bowles, the legend grew that he had vowed, while still a Yale student, to make a million by the time he was 35 and then retire. Today he smiles at this story, but admits that by the time he was graduated in 1921 he was thinking definitely of a big business career.

Upon departing from New Haven, BENTON'S first job was selling cash registers, which he carried from store to store in up-State New York in a truck. His mother, however, was still not reconciled to the idea of his becoming a mere businessman. If he was determined not to be a teacher or preacher, like his forebears, she wrote him in 1922 from St. Louis, where she had become head of a girls' school, he could at least be a lawyer—and she had taken steps to enter him at Harvard Law School.

Until she died in 1942, BENTON was devoted to his mother, and her firm view as to his proper future swayed him—at least temporarily. He took a train and started for Cambridge. But when he reached New York, ambition again overcame his sense of family tradition, and he walked into an advertising agency to apply for a job. He was hired—at $25 a week.

From this point onward, the success story moves rapidly to its unusual ending. He began his climb, while still an obscure novice, by offering to talk at the regular weekly conference of the creative staff. By 1928, having had a constant stream of ideas about everything in the advertising business, he was a junior partner in another firm, making $12,500 a year. Then he met one of the seldom-mentioned hazards in the standard success formula. He stepped too hard on the toes of the president, and was fired.

With the self-assurance of the perfect advertising man, he went back to the first agency for which he had worked and landed a job as general manager of the Chicago office. Within 6 months he was making $25,000 a year.

By this time, BENTON, only 28, was looked on as a 9-day wonder. Devising questionnaires to be submitted to women all over the country as the basis of sales campaigns for household items, he had given the advertising business a new concept of the value of what has now come to be known as product research.

He helped sign up beauty-shop operators all over the world to endorse Palmolive soap, and assembled so many charts, statistics, procedures and plans for a proposed advertising campaign that it took all day for BENTON to explain them to Palmolive executives—and made old-fashioned advertising methods look amateurish.

Chester Bowles, whom BENTON had hired as his assistant at the George Batten agency (later Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn), had also come up fast in the business; and now the two young men decided to form an agency of their own. BENTON was then with Lord & Thomas, whose boss offered him $50,000 a year to stay. He declined. It was the summer of 1929, and America was booming.

Benton & Bowles started on $13,000 capital. Three months later the stock market crashed, and business—including the advertising business—began its long dive. BENTON, however, ignored the depression and went after new business with techniques that made even advertising men marvel. He was not interested in small accounts, he announced. Benton & Bowles would take only accounts with a lot of money to spend. This attitude frightened off many prospects, but it worked with some.

"BILL was always a good salesman with about 10 people out of a hundred," Bowles reminisced recently, "and that is what counts in the advertising business—to knock 1 guy over, even if you lose 10 others."

It is a point of pride with BENTON that the agency took on fewer than 20 clients during the years he was there, yet business kept going up and up. By the time he quit, the firm was doing a business of $18,000,000 gross billings per year, and he was drawing $250,000 a year.

The agency's first account was Certo, and BENTON went to New Jersey and Bowles to Connecticut, to ring doorbells and ask housewives pertinent questions about jelly making. After 4 months, the partners had compiled 533 pages of data, which they used to such good effect that General Foods, which owned Certo, gave them a dozen more products to handle within the next few years.

Benton & Bowles put most of their clients heavily into radio, starting such stars as Fred Allen and Gladys Swarthout on the air. The elaborate hour and half-hour variety shows which the agency pioneered seemed fantastically expensive—until business got used to the idea and other agencies began doing the same thing.

When BENTON suddenly quit the agency after its meteoric rise, his business associates—and competitors—were openmouthed in wonder. In explanation, BENTON said he didn't want to get into a mental rut, and saw no reason to go on merely piling up money.

"I was never interested in yachts, or things like that," he declared.

Whether he had made a round million or not, he had enough so that money no longer seemed urgently important. In the $25-a-week days, he had paid $10 for room rent, and had stretched the remaining $15 so thin that his regular breakfast was a chocolate bar, bought on the way to the office. As he grew more prosperous, he drove the agency so hard that copywriters sometimes muttered about its being a sweatshop. Yet he became more and more liberal with salaries, and thought nothing of sending a secretary abroad when he decided she had been overworked.

Old friends who found the going hard during the depression could always look to him for a stake; and he started his present sizable collection of paintings by his college classmate, Reginald Marsh, by buying them on a picture-a-month basis for a time during the depression.

In the best-seller, The Hucksters, author Frederic Wakeman has his hero express a superbly cocky and contemptuous attitude presumably peculiar to advertising men: "It's only money!" BENTON, although he has always had a keen grasp of finances, displays a measure of this confident unconcern. In fact, his wealth has been considerably enhanced by his lack of hesitancy in writing a check when he has confidence in a man.

Some years ago, a friend decided to go into the shoe-manufacturing business. BENTON put up $5,000 to help him get started. The Joyce Shoe Co. became so successful that BENTON eventually sold out his interest for $125,000.

When the newspaper PM was being started in New York, editor Ralph Ingersoll persuaded BENTON to serve as consultant, and gave him $7,500 in stock as payment. After the paper had been launched, BENTON found himself in disagreement with its policies, and asked that his stock be taken up. Meantime, another friend, Emory Thomason, had asked him to invest in the Chicago Times, which he was trying to build up. BENTON transferred his PM check—amounting, with increment, to $7,825—to the Times, agreeing, as he had with Joyce, that his friend could buy him out whenever he wished. His interest was eventually taken up for $55,000.

Such investments, however, are not purely casual with BENTON. He decided, when he withdrew from Benton & Bowles, to invest in small businesses rather than in the stock corporations. "Big business did not build the wealth of this country," he wrote in a 1944 magazine article. "It was individual, hard-hitting and hard-working men who started small, independent, competitive businesses."

As if to emphasize his break with his past, one of BENTON'S first investments of this sort was in Muzak, a company which pipes recorded music, without advertising, into restaurants and other subscribing institutions. When the company was still in the idea stage, BENTON bought a one-third interest for $30,000. Later he bought another third, and then the rest of it, raising his total investment to $132,500. He has since expanded Muzak into record-making and allied activities, and has been offered more than 20 times what he paid for it.

When he quit the advertising business, BENTON told friends that he didn't know just how he was going to occupy himself, but that he might go into missionary work—a field in which some of his forebears had been active. Instead, his Yale classmate, President Hutchins of the University of Chicago, persuaded him to join the university as vice president and overseer of public relations.

Promptly, BENTON asked for a comprehensive report on research activities, and when he was handed a sheaf covering about 50 projects, his mind started popping ideas faster even than had his questionnaires about jelly making. Plans for magazine articles, news releases and radio programs came forth in a steady stream.

BENTON'S chief aim was to broaden the university's services as a cultural and educational force in the national community. The making of educational films was one way to achieve the goal, and although the Rockefeller Foundation failed to respond to his $4,000,000 appeal, he arranged the purchase of the Western Electric Co.'s film facilities and also persuaded the Eastman Kodak Co. to donate its collection of classroom films to the university.

BENTON also exploited the radio, receiving a $50,000 grant from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation to build up the University of Chicago Round Table, in which world-famous authorities tackled political, social, and economic problems. To dramatize research work at the university, he also developed a science program called The Human Adventure, which was so popular with the public that he was able to turn it over to a commercial sponsor and make money for the university, instead of sharing its production cost.

The program managed to interest radio audiences in such unlikely subjects as chlorophyll, cosmic rays, Pavlov, and blood; and a program on the Einstein theory of relativity, of all things, had to be a broadcast by popular demand.

Probably BENTON'S most effective coup in making the university, and himself, a more powerful cultural force was the taking over of the Encyclopedia Britannica. Many years before, when the Britannica had seemed doomed, Julius Rosenwald, the Chicago philanthropist, had bought it as head of Sears, Roebuck & Co. When he offered it to the university the trustees declined. Under new management, it became a paying property, even though Sears had little interest in publishing or academic research.

After Gen. Robert E. Wood took over the direction of Sears, BENTON characteristically reopened the subject of the Britannica with the abrupt query, "Do you think it appropriate that a mail-order house should own the Encyclopedia Britannica? Why don't you give it to the university?"

Wood looked startled, but a few hours later formally offered to do so. The trustees, however, again balked at using university funds for what they considered a risky venture. BENTON, quick as ever with the checkbook, offered to put up an amount said to be $100,000, under a stock deal acceptable to the university. Today BENTON owns all the company's outstanding common stock, and has built the company up so that it now pays the university several times as much every year in royalties as he originally invested in working capital.

The educational-film project was incorporated as a subsidiary, Encyclopedia Britannica Films, into which BENTON put a million dollars of Britannica money. He has also branched out into allied publishing fields, with the result that Britannica has a series of educational picture-story books for children, as well as the Britannica Junior, the Book of the Year, and the Britannica World Atlas. Soon to appear is a 54-volume set, the Great Books of the Western World, on the preparation of which the company has spent $1,400,000.

In 1945, BENTON was appointed Assistant Secretary of State. Since then, he has said that he went to Washington thinking that he was to do a job that everybody wanted done, and found out that hardly anybody was interested. The job involved the liquidation of the old Office of War Information and the Office of Inter-American Affairs, neither of which was popular with economy-minded Congressmen, and the integration of their functions into the State Department.

BENTON had to spend most of his time selling his ideas to Congress and, to some extent, to the State Department itself. When he resigned a year ago, President Truman wrote him a "Dear BILL" letter, saying that he knew "only too well the difficulties and frustrations which you have encountered," and praising him for the "solid foundation" which he had laid.

BENTON was characteristically busy in Washington, using luncheons, cocktails, dinners, and frequently breakfasts as occasions for conferences, and keeping his Ediphone busy far into the night. It came nearer to satisfying his urge to be a high-powered modern missionary, his friends think, than anything else he ever experienced; and many predict that he will soon be back in public service, one way or another.

An indication of his inclinations in this respect took form last March after he left for a 3-month vacation at his winter home near Phoenix, Ariz. Unhesitatingly he abandoned his vacation when he was asked to become chairman of the American delegation to the UN Conference on Freedom of Information, and hastened east to catch a boat for Geneva.

Just how much he would have relaxed, even had he stayed in Arizona, is questionable. His usual routine when sojourning there is to start the day with a swim, then spend most of the rest of it dictating into an Ediphone installed at the edge of the pool.

BENTON has been married since 1928, and has four children, and when his mind is on family affairs, it is the same effervescent mind which has created so many sales ideas. Not long ago, he was visiting the home of a friend where the family cat had just had kittens. "What a wonderful way for children to see nature reproducing herself," he said; and his little black notebook came out of his pocket for a notation: Get a pregnant cat.

The cat acquired by his secretary next day turned out to meet the specifications so thoroughly that it had kittens even before it could be introduced into the BENTON home. "Perhaps I shouldn't have been in quite such a hurry to put the idea across," said BENTON.

It is a habit, however, which the ex-advertising man shows no signs of breaking.

REA, a Great Help To Minnesota Farmers, Should Be Further Extended

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, September 18, 1950

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my high honor and privilege to represent a great and thriving agricultural district comprised of the northwestern Minnesota Counties of Becker, Beltrami, Clay, Clearwater, Kittson, Lake of the Woods, Mahnomen, Marshall, Norman, Otter Tail, Pennington, Polk, Red Lake, Roseau, and Wilkin. The world-famous Red River Valley on the United States side of the International Boundary and the Minnesota side of the North Dakota boundary line is wholly within the Ninth Congressional District.

The people of my district and the citizens of Minnesota are truly appreciative of the great benefits and the many advantages and conveniences they have derived from the splendid accomplishments of the Rural Electrification Administration program.

The REA is an agency of the United States Department of Agriculture. It was created on May 11, 1935, by an Executive order of President Roosevelt, under authority of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, approved April 8, 1935.

The Norris-Rayburn bill followed which provided permanent status for the agency and authorized a 10-year lending program upon its approval on May 20, 1936—that legislative action is now known and referred to as the Rural Electrification Act of 1936.

The Pace Act was approved by the President on September 21, 1944, and among its several provisions it provided that the lending program be extended indefinitely and that the Congress annually determine the amount of funds the Rural Electrification Administration may lend.

The REA is under the direction of an Administrator who is appointed by the President for a 10-year term, with the advice and consent of the United States Senate. In his official actions he is responsible to the Secretary of Agriculture. The present Secretary is Hon. Charles F. Brannan, of Colorado, who is the author and sponsor of the Brannan plan for agriculture.

The present Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration is the Honorable Claude R. Wickard, of Indiana, who assumed the duties of his office in July of 1945. Mr. Wickard is a conscientious, capable, and efficient Administrator and exceptionally well-qualified by education, training, and experience to discharge the many duties of his office.

In the field of rural electrification, the REA is employed to make loans to qualified borrowers, with preference to nonprofit and cooperative organizations and to public bodies. The loans are made to cover the full cost of constructing power lines and other electric facilities to serve persons in rural areas who are without central station electric service. The loans are repaid over a maximum period of 35 years and bear a 2 percent interest rate.

The REA program involves no grants or subsidies, and it operates no rural electric facilities. The loans approved by the REA are repaid from the operating revenues of the locally owned, locally managed systems it finances. A part of each consumer's monthly payment for electricity is set aside to pay off the Government loans. It therefore follows that in the field of finance the REA serves principally as a banker to local systems and its main functions from an over-all viewpoint are to lend money and give technical advice and counsel where needed in the construction and operation of the borrower's facilities.

Farm electrification in the United States had advanced very slowly during the 53-year period from 1882, when the first central control generating system went into service, to 1935 when the REA was created.

A survey of the REA discloses that a few farms were connected to power lines prior to World War I. During the early twenties there was a short-lived spurt in the field of electrical engineering, which progress was reflected by a small increase in the number of farms served with electricity. However, it is significant that only 10.9 percent of all farms in the United States were receiving central power electric service by 1935 and few power lines had been built beyond the immediate vicinities of cities and towns according to REA statistics.

It was because of this slow rate of progress that farmers and farm organizations presented a solid front in their demands for Government action in the field of rural electrification. The result was the establishment of REA, with a program designed to make electric service available to farm people without electricity.

The establishment of the REA greatly increased the extension of electric service into the rural areas. Between 1935 and July 1, 1949, more than 3,800,000 additional farms had been connected to central power lines by all agencies, both public and private. More than half—about 57 percent—of the farms connected to central station lines since 1935 received electric service from REA-financed systems. The remainder were on lines of other suppliers, many of which were stimulated to greater activity in the rural field by the accomplishments of the REA program.

It has been estimated by REA that 4,582,016 farms, or 78.2 percent of the Nation's total, were electrified by June 30, 1949. There are still approximately 1,275,000 of the Nation's farms, or more than 21 percent, still unelectrified as of that date according to their statistics. In addition, there were hundreds of thousands of rural churches, nonfarm dwellings, schools, crossroads businesses, and other rural establishments without electricity.

Many of these unelectrified units are located in isolated areas, or in areas of relatively low farm income. It therefore follows that one of the most difficult jobs in the rural electrification program remains to be completed. The REA program, however, has succeeded in establishing a pattern which eventually can provide virtually every unserved farm in the country with electric service.

The REA has informed me that as of June 30, 1950, they had approved $2,205,470,314 in loans to 1,070 borrowers. It includes 980 cooperatives, 41 public power districts, 24 other public bodies, and 25 commercial power companies. As of that date the REA had on file or in process of investigation in the field additional loan applications totaling $308,748,500 for new system construction and various line improvements. Most of these applications, I am informed, are for expansion of existing systems financed by the REA.

I have also been informed that some 999 of these REA borrowers had rural electric facilities in operation as of June 30, 1950. The facilities included 1,018,336 miles of line serving more than 3,251,787 farms and other rural consumers in about 2,500 counties of 46 States, Alaska, and the Virgin Islands. This clearly indicates that additional lines are being built more rapidly now than ever before.

Thus far, of all the loans approved by the REA, over 81 percent have been for electric distribution facilities, to borrowers who buy power at wholesale rather than generate it themselves. Generation and transmission loans are made only when borrowers are unable to purchase an adequate supply of power or a saving would result. It has been estimated that approximately 17.5 percent of the rural electrification loans have been for construction of generating plants and transmission lines. Approximately 1 percent of the entire amount of loans have been made to power system operators for relending to their consumers to finance installation of wiring, plumbing, and electrical equipment and appliances.

The rural electric cooperatives do not limit their membership to farmers. It is open to all people in a rural area who can be reached and who want electric service. As of June 30, 1950, the REA had advanced $1,553,887,178 in loans to its borrowers. The REA loan contracts provide that advances are made as the borrowers need the funds with which to pay for construction that is under way or completed. The difference between the amount of loans approved and the amount of funds advanced represents loan funds that are obligated to borrowers. Most of it has been further obligated by the borrowers to pay for materials or contract services and will be advanced as construction proceeds.

As of June 30, 1950, the borrowers had returned to the Government $244,795,307 in principal and interest payments on their REA loans. This included $22,967,195 in payments on principal ahead of schedule. Only $774,458 was reported more than 30 days overdue. Only one REA loan foreclosure has been necessary to date on an operating power system; it was on a loan that had been made to a commercial power company.

The REA has made more than 95 percent of its loans to cooperatives organized under State laws by rural people seeking electric service. These groups, which make up about 92 percent of all REA borrowers, are local independent private business enterprises. They are controlled by their consumer-members through boards of directors elected annually by and from the membership.

The rural electric cooperatives have proved the most effective instruments for carrying out the REA program because of their advantages as a method of making reasonable-cost electric service available to farmers in rural areas. These advantages include:

First. REA-financed cooperatives operated on a nonprofit basis. This enables them to provide electric service at cost to their members.

Second. Directors of REA-financed cooperatives are elected because of their known interest in making electric service available to rural people at reasonable rates. They serve without compensation and keep operating expense at the lowest possible level consistent with good service.

Third. Members of REA-financed cooperatives also are interested in keeping costs at a minimum. For example, they help reduce operating expense by voluntarily reporting potential causes of service interruptions such as tree limbs touching the lines. Most of them read their own meters, and many make out their own bills.

Fourth. Previous experience of farmers with other types of cooperatives helps them to organize and operate rural electric cooperatives on a sound basis with a minimum of effort and expense.

The lines constructed by REA borrowers are built to serve entire areas, including less densely settled sections as well as those of greater population. This is known as area coverage. The test is no longer whether an individual line or section will be self-supporting, but whether the entire system as a whole is feasible. This policy has become increasingly important as the rural electrification job has progressed. Only through area coverage can electric service be extended to many of the more isolated farms, and to groups which are remotely situated in pocketed areas far removed from any established source of power.

In every region in the United States rural electric cooperatives have demonstrated that farm electrification, far from constituting an additional cash drain on low farm incomes, actually brings more business into rural communities. It encourages new local enterprises which come about when low-cost power is available. It stimulates private business, both locally and nationally. Surveys indicate that for every dollar invested in rural power facilities the farmer invests an additional $4.50 in wiring, plumbing, and electrical appliances.

The use of electric power in farm production and processing is constantly expanding. To date about 400 farm uses for electricity have been reported. Electric power on the farm is an economic necessity which can pay its way with handsome profits for the farmer. REA encourages its borrowers to give their consumers guidance as to which uses are the most efficient and the most profitable in these times of power shortage.

In the State of Minnesota, at the time REA was established, only 13,783 farms, or 6.8 percent, were receiving central station electric service. REA estimated that 149,500 farms, or 79.1 percent of all farms in the State, were served by June 30, 1949. An estimated 39,452 farms in the State still were without service.

The first REA loan in Minnesota was approved in September 1935 and the first REA-financed line placed in operation on October 31, 1936, by the Mille Lacs Region Cooperative, of Aitkin.

Up to June 30, 1950, REA had approved $122,092,806 in loans in the State to 54 borrowers, 52 of them cooperatives. The loans will enable these borrowers to finance the construction of 74,233 miles of line and other rural electric facilities to serve 175,332 rural consumers. Some of these facilities already are in operation, and additional lines are being built as rapidly as possible.

By June 30, 1950, REA had advanced $93,174,598 as loans in Minnesota, and the State's borrowers were operating 65,623 miles of line serving 157,557 farms and other rural consumers.

The average monthly farm consumption on REA-financed lines in Minnesota increased from 86 kilowatt-hours in December 1941, to 225 kilowatt-hours in December 1949. This increase reflects greater use of electrical equipment to save time and labor in performing farm and household tasks to help bring about a more comfortable way of rural living. In the same period the national average went from 61 to 141 kilowatt-hours per farm.

The latest REA debt-service summary, covering all transactions to June 30, 1950, shows that the Minnesota borrowers have paid $16,689,507 in principal and interest on their Government loans.

This includes $1,622,680 paid on principal in advance of the date due. Thirty-four borrowers were ahead on their payments and none were behind.

I was elected to the House of Representatives in November of 1942 and took my seat as a Member of the Seventy-eighth Congress, which convened on January 6, 1943. The REA and its program always has had my wholehearted and active support. The following listing gives the date and the subject of roll calls since my election to Congress which had direct bearing on the REA and its program:

June 23, 1943: Vote on a motion to concur in a Senate amendment to the 1944 Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, to increase REA loan funds from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000. Motion defeated 168 to 193.

May 28, 1947: 1948 Department of Agriculture appropriation bill: Motion to recommit bill with instructions to restore committee cut of $25,000,000 in REA loan funds. Motion defeated 174 to 180.

July 18, 1947: REA appropriation, 1948 Department of Agriculture appropriation bill: Motion to recommit conference report with instructions to increase rural electrification loan funds from $225,000,000 to $250,000,000. Motion defeated 196 to 206.

February 24, 1948: Urgent deficiency appropriation bill 1948: Vote on Representative RANKIN'S amendment to add $300,000,000 for REA loans. Amendment defeated 151 to 181.

April 1, 1948: First deficiency appropriation bill, 1948: Motion of Representative CANNON to recommit with instructions to increase REA loan funds from $75,000,000 to $175,000,000. Motion adopted 199 to 154.

June 16, 1948: Second deficiency appropriation bill, 1948: Vote on motion to recommit bil with instructions to appropriate $450,000 for REA administrative expenses, for fiscal year 1949. Motion defeated 199 to 204.

July 13, 1949: Rural telephone amendment to Rural Electrification Act. Vote on passage of bill. Bill passed 282 to 109.

In every instance I voted for the REA program and for REA members, and the official record shows this.

The following is a list of REA-financed systems in northwestern Minnesota, together with the names of the managers:

Lake Region Cooperative Electric Association, Pelican Rapids, Minn., Albert R. Knutson, manager.

Red River Valley Cooperative Power Association, Halstad, Minn., Gerald A. Thalacker, manager.

Red Lake Electric Cooperative, Inc., Red Lake Falls, Minn., O. J. Overmoen, manager.

Wild Rice Electric Cooperative, Inc., Mahnomen, Minn., Kenneth R. Martin, manager.

North Star Electric Cooperative, Inc., Baudette, Minn., Gordon M. Farel, manager.

P. K. M. Electric Cooperative, Inc., Warren, Minn., Robert A. Graham, manager.

Beltrami Electric Cooperative, Inc., Bemidji, Minn., Earl H. Larson, manager.

Roseau Electric Cooperative, Inc., Roseau, Minn., August A. Bourque, manager.

Border Counties Power Cooperative, Inc., Warroad, Minn., Einar Bergan, manager.

Clearwater-Polk Electric Cooperative, Inc., Bagley, Minn., Onno V. Beaver, manager.

Itsaca-Mantrap Cooperative, Inc., Park Rapids, Minn., Robert W. Wright, manager.

All are doing a splendid job in serving their areas.

The Rural Electrification Administration recently entered another field of service to our rural population upon the approval on October 28, 1949, of the amendment to the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, providing for the improvement and expansion of rural telephone service. The rural telephone loan legislation and its program has had my wholehearted and active support because its benefits are much needed in my congressional district. I have long contended that it is more necessary for farmers to have telephones than many of our town and city dwellers. The objective of the telephone loan program is to furnish loans and technical assistance in the rural telephone field similar to that which has been provided for rural electrification. The loans are made to telephone organizations, with preference to existing companies and cooperatives. The Congress provided an initial telephone loan authorization of $25,000,000 and the first REA rural telephone loan was approved February 24, 1950.

The REA has advised me that, according to the 1945 census, only 54.6 percent of farms in Minnesota had telephone service at that time. As of September 15, 1950, REA had received 39 applications for rural telephone loans in Minnesota.

All REA loans are self-liquidating. They bear 2 percent interest and must be amortized over a maximum period of 35 years.

If I am again chosen to represent the Ninth Congressional District as its United States Representative, I will continue to fully support the REA and rural telephone programs in Congress.

It will be a pleasure to be of service to all citizens who may have any inquiry concerning these programs or any other Federal matters.

The Answers To the "Fourteen Unanswered Questions"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Appendix, September 8, 1950, my colleague the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], placed 14 unanswered questions in the RECORD, claiming that he "could not answer many of them because he had raised similar questions himself but had never been able to get the answers from the administration." Since that time other Republican Congressmen have raised the same 14 unanswered questions in their campaigns.

Even though many of these questions are based on false assumptions, they should not be allowed to hang in the air unanswered. Direct answers to these questions follow:

First. What went with the $95,000,000,000 spent on national defense since World War II?

Answer: Of this amount approximately $42,000,000,000 or 45 percent went to pay for the cost of liquidating World War II. This left $48,000,000,000 or an average of less than $10,000,000,000 a year. During the postwar years there have been unusually heavy costs for maintaining peace in distant lands. Nearly half of our Army has been overseas in occupied countries in Europe and in Asia. Substantial portions of our Navy have been in the Mediterranean helping maintain the peace. We have had to bear the costs of saving Berlin with the airlift. The money needed to pay, feed, and clothe the men in our Armed Forces has cost an average of $5,000,000,000 a year. An average of $3,000,000,000 a year has gone to meet the costs of operating and maintaining the aircraft, ships, tanks, and military installations that go to make up our military strength. Major procurement of aircraft, tanks, and other equipment took $2,250,000,000 a year. Research and development of new weapons took a little more than a half billion dollars a year. The remainder was made up of National Guard and Reserve costs, service-wide and classified projects, pay of retired military personnel, and military public works, including housing.

Second. Why did only $1 out of every seven defense dollars go for combat equipment?

Answer: The answer to the first question above contains the data on how national defense funds were expended. Major procurement—the purchase of hardware, aircraft, ships, tanks, and other weapons—has accounted for approximately 2¼ billion dollars a year, or 18 percent. It is worthy of note that the percentage of the annual total that has gone into major procurement has increased from a low of 6 percent to a high of 19 percent in the fiscal year ended July 1, 1950. It is also worthy of note that 60 percent of the President's recently recommended $10,500,000,000 supplemental budget, approved by the Congress, is for major procurement—hardware.

Third. Why did President Truman limit the Air Force to 48 groups when the Republican Eightieth Congress ordered the Air Force expanded to 70 groups?

Answer: This question contains a false assumption. When the Republican Eightieth Congress ordered 70 groups for the Air Force—and I voted for it—it failed to vote a cent of the necessary funds to expand the Air Force to 70 groups.

The strength of an Air Force group has been greatly increased. It contains far more planes than ever before. For example, the B–29 groups long ago were expanded from 30 bombers to 65, 20 of which are tankers, thus increasing the range and striking power of a group. In other words, when the term "70-group Air Force" was first coined in 1947, it was the equivalent of what we now have in 35 of our present-day groups. Moreover, the original proposal for a 70-group Air Force called for 412,000 men, and almost exactly that number of men was provided as long ago as July 1949.

In October 1949 the House of Representatives voted to expand the Air Force to 58 groups. The President impounded the $615,000,000 voted for this sudden and unbalanced expansion of the Air Force for these reasons: First, a sudden rise in one branch of the armed services would destroy the balance between Army, Navy, and Air Force necessary to have an effective fighting force. Second, as additional aircraft were delivered, it would be necessary to make provision for additional personnel to man them; no provision was made by the expansion act for adequate ground and maintenance crews, for example.

The President did not reject the amount which was provided for aircraft; the money was merely kept available to be expended in accordance with the capacities of the aircraft industry to produce aircraft.

Fourth. Why, if communism was a menace in Asia, were there only 6 General Pershing tanks, only 30 propellate—tactical—combat planes, only 1 aircraft carrier, and not a single combat marine in the Japanese area when we entered the Korean conflict?

Answer: The figures cited in this question are grossly incorrect. Obviously, the number of troops and weapons in a combat area is classified information which cannot be bandied about. However, I agree with the gentleman that we should have had more combat marines ready and available in that area.

Fifth. Why did President Truman on December 15, 1945, officially announce that unless our ally, China, admitted Communists to its Government China would get no more American aid?

Answer: President Truman made no such announcement. On December 15, 1945, he issued a statement of United States policy toward China. In the course of that statement he said:

> It is the firm belief of this Government that a strong, united, and democratic China is of the utmost importance to the success of [the] United Nations organization and for world peace. A China disorganized and divided either by foreign aggression, such as that undertaken by the Japanese, or by violent internal strife, is an undermining influence to world stability and peace, now and in the future.

The statement said that—

> The Government of the United States believes it essential—
> (1) That a cessation of hostilities be arranged between the armies of the National Government and the Chinese Communists and other dissident armed forces for the purpose of completing the return of all China to effective Chinese control, including the immediate evacuation of Japanese forces.
> (2) That a national conference of representatives of major political elements be arranged to develop an early solution to the present internal strife—a solution which will bring about the unification of China.

The call for a conference was in support of the proposals already made by the National Government and Chiang Kai-shek regarding a peaceful settlement of the Communist problem and the agreement reached by the National Government and the Communist Party in October 1945 providing for the convening of a political consultative conference to discuss measures looking toward the establishment of a constitutional government. A provisional list of the delegation to the conference had already been published at Chungking on November 27 and on December 31, 1945, the National Government announced that Chiang Kai-shek had decided that the political consultative conference would convene on January 10, 1946.

President Truman's statement also said:

> The United States and other United Nations have recognized the present National Government of the Republic of China as the only legal government in China. It is the proper instrument to achieve the objective of a unified China.

Sixth. Who was best serving America, the administrations which for 50 years defended the open door in China, or the Truman administration, which abandoned China to Soviet exploitation?

Answer: This question contains one false implication and one false statement. It falsely implies that the administrations which for 50 years defended the open door in China were Republican administrations, neglecting to mention the support given China by the Democratic administrations of Cleveland, Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

It falsely states that the Truman administraion abandoned China to Soviet exploitation. The actual fact, of course, is that the Truman administration took every step possible to support the National Government short of committing American forces to fight the Chinese Communist armies in support of the government of Chiang Kai-shek, which in the course of 3 years lost the support of the people of China and the entire territory of China, despite over $3,500,000,000 worth of economic and military aid from the United States and the military advice of one of the greatest generals the world has ever seen, Gen. George C. Marshall.

Seventh. Why, when Congress had voted $10,500,000 military aid for South Korea 8 months earlier, had South Korea received only $200 worth of Signal Corps wire when the Communists struck June 25?

Answer: As noted above, this oft-repeated charge is absolutely false. The $200 figure was bandied about because some signal equipment was in process of being shipped from San Francisco on the day of the invasion, and a charge of $108 was made against appropriated funds for purposes of taking out and inspecting the equipment. This completely overlooks the vast amounts of weapons and munitions supplied by the United States and actually in the hands of the Koreans.

The military equipment which the American Government had turned over to the Republic of Korea before the Communist attack totaled over $57,000,000. Included in the military equipment turned over to the Republic of Korea were the following items: Over 130,000 small arms, rifles and carbines; over 50,000,000 rounds of ammunition; over 2,000 machine guns; nearly 7,000 pistols; nearly 200 antitank guns; over 700 mortars; 91 big 105-millimeter howitzers; 108,000 shells for these howitzers; over 275,000 rockets, rifle grenades, and hand grenades; nearly 9,000 grenade launchers; armored cars; half-track fighting trucks; nearly 5,000 trucks in which to move troops and equipment; 150 bazookas; over 50,000 mines and demolition blocks; 79 vessels, including mine sweepers, landing craft, and other types of fighting ships; 20 airplanes for military use; equipment for 15,000 men, including rifles, clothing, field tents, and other materials needed by soldiers in the field; and thousands of spare parts and operational material necessary to keep this equipment functioning properly.

Eighth. Whose advice was the administration following when it asked last year for $150,000,000 in economic aid for South Korea? That of its long-time adviser, Owen Lattimore, who said in July 1949 that "The thing to do is let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it"—hence the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000.

Answer: This phony question contains three false statements or implications. In the first place, it implies that Owen Lattimore was a major long-time adviser of the administration. This is not true, as three former Secretaries of State and the present Secretary of State have denied in writing.

In the second place, it implies that the administration in asking last year for $150,000,000 in economic aid for South Korea did so on Owen Lattimore's advice. This also is not true. The economic-aid program for the Republic of Korea was based on the advice of Secretary of State Marshall and of Paul Hoffman, the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation program.

In the third place, it implies the purpose of the $150,000,000 request was to "let South Korea fall but not to let it look as though we pushed it." The actual fact, of course, is that the $150,000,000 request was plainly stated to be the first year of a 3-year program intended to place the Republic as nearly as possible on a self-supporting economic basis—hardly a program to let South Korea fall.

Finally, the question fails to mention that the economic-aid program for Korea was killed in the House of Representatives on January 19, 1950, by the Republican Party and by 1 vote, 192 to 191. By this act the Republican Party demonstrated that it did not care to support the Republic of Korea.

Ninth. Why did Secretary of State Acheson virtually invite the Communists to take Korea, Formosa, and the balance of China by announcing January 12, 1950, that they were beyond our defense perimeter?

Answer: The above statement is untrue, and misquotes the January 12, 1950, statement of the Secretary of State. In his Press Club speech of January 12, 1950, Secretary of State Acheson said that the United States itself would defend a line along the Aleutians, Japan, the Ryukyus, and the Philippines. He further said that should an attack occur in other areas "initial reliance must be on the people attacked to resist it and then upon the commitments of the entire civilized world under the Charter of the United Nations." That is precisely what the Republic of Korea and the United Nations did when the North Korean Communists attacked on June 25, 1950.

Tenth. On what basis did President Truman declare—only 27 days before ordering American troops into Korea—that we were closer to a permanent peace "than anytime in the last 5 years"?

Answer: President Truman made this statement because during the last 5 years under the far-sighted leadership of the Democratic administration, the collective security arrangements of the free world both in the United Nations and in such regional arrangements as the Rio Pact and the Atlantic Pact had created situations of strength in the free world which made it less likely than ever before that any nation should undertake a major war. President Truman did not overlook the isolated armed actions going on in such places as Indochina, Burma, or China. He did not exclude the possibility of limited outbreaks, such as that which has now occurred in Korea. He was referring to the fact that our collective arrangements made aggression more risky than ever before. The correctness of this assumption was strikingly demonstrated by the immediate vigorous action taken by the United Nations to halt the aggression in Korea and thereby to give all potential aggressors notice that aggression against any free nation will be met by the resistance of all free nations.

Eleventh. Which was wiser—the administration's appeasement policy that enabled Russia, in the 5 years after World War II, to extend its domination from 170,000,000 people to 800,000,000 people, or Republican insistence on a firm anti-Communist policy?

Answer: This patently political question has four false statements.

First, it suggests that the administration has been carrying out a policy of appeasement. Nothing is further from the truth. The administration has vigorously and successfully opposed Soviet imperialism by the leadership which it has taken in the development of a strong United Nations, by turning back Soviet aggression in Iran, by declaring the Truman doctrine and helping the legitimate Government of Greece to resist aggression, by helping Turkey to strengthen itself against Russian threats, by preventing the overthrow of Italy and France by communism, by proposing the Marshall plan and thereby saving Europe, by advancing the Rio Pact for collective security and then consolidating the nations of the Americas, by saving Berlin when the U. S. S. R. ruthlessly tried to starve and freeze its people, by proposing the North Atlantic Pact and welding together the North Atlantic community, by successfully mediating peace in Indonesia, by aiding the National Government of China until it collapsed, but even then continuing economic assistance. This policy has been anything but appeasement.

The second false implication is that American policies have enabled Russia to extend its domination in the 5 years after World War II. The fact is that Russian gains in control in Europe since the war have with limited exceptions resulted entirely from the fact that Russian forces overran such countries in the course of fighting against the German armies. In the Far East, the domination which Russia now exercises is the result of her participation in the war against Japan, not of any American policy.

The third false statement is the figure of 800,000,000 people. This evidently includes China. The degree of control which Russia exercises over the Chinese people through the Chinese Communist Government is not because of American policy but because the National Government of China was unable to hold Chinese territory despite its immense military superiority and despite immense aid by the United States.

The fourth and most astounding falsehood is the implication that the Republican Party has insisted on a firm anti-Communist policy. The actual fact is that the Republican Party, despite the efforts of a few enlightened members, has persistently resisted the efforts of the administration to create a firm defense against the spread of communism. As one typical example, the Republican Members of the House of Representatives killed the Korean economic aid bill on January 19, 1950, by a vote of 131 Republicans against it to only 41 Republicans for it. When the administration brought it up again, the Republicans voted to cut it 99 to 36 and the Republicans voted against its passage 91 to 42.

As another example, when the administration's proposal for military assistance to the free countries of the world came before the House of Representatives in August 1949, only 51 Republicans voted for the bill and 94 voted against it. This was after the Republicans had voted by a tremendous majority to cut in half the money authorized under the bill. The bill was saved by 187 Democrats voting for it, with only 28 voting against it. On final passage of the bill after it had returned from the Senate, only 51 Republicans voted for it and 84 voted against it. This was in contrast to 173 Democrats who voted for it and only 24 against it.

The Democratic Party can be proud of its record on these votes and on other measures to contain communism. The Republican Party cannot.

Twelfth. After the Korean Communists are pushed back to the thirty-eighth parallel, then what?

Answer: This is an honest question. It can be answered, I believe, only by Gen. Douglas MacArthur and the United Nations which must decide what action it will take. It is my belief that MacArthur has the authority under the original UN directive to go across the thirty-eighth parallel and, for that matter, had already crossed it when American and Australian planes bombed North Korean installations. It is my hope that there will be no timidity or indecision in the UN because the only way to reunite Korea and carry out the UN order is to cross the parallel, hold elections, and bring the country together under one government.

Thirteenth. What will the administration do in Asia in the future—return to appeasement?

Answer: This question has the false implication that the United States has engaged in a policy of appeasement in Asia. This is, of course, untrue. In China the United States took every action possible to assist the National Government to retain control over China except to commit American troops to fight the more than 2,000,000 Chinese Communist forces. In Indonesia the United States assisted the leaders of the Republic and of the Netherlands to settle their differences and to make it impossible for communism to take advantage of the situation which existed.

In French Indochina the United States is helping France and the Indochinese Governments to resist the local Communist aggression. In Korea the United States was primarily responsible for the establishment of the Republic by the United Nations and when the Republic was attacked by Communist North Korea, it was the administration which took the lead in the United Nations to act immediately and decisively to throw back the aggression. This is hardly a record of appeasement.

Since many sincere people are deeply interested in what the administration will do in Asia in the future, it should be said that our firm, clear policy is the same as that which we had in Europe. We would help to maintain free governments and to prevent the spread of Soviet imperialism and international communism. As President Truman has said:

> We believe in freedom for all of the nations of the Far East. * * * We not only want freedom for the peoples of Asia, but we also want to help them to secure for themselves better health, more food, better clothes and homes, and the chance to live their own lives in peace. The things we want for the people of Asia are the same things we want for the people of the world.

Fourteenth. What hope can there be for peace under this administration?

Answer: This is a loaded question which shows a callous disregard for the deep, sincere desire which the people of the United States have for lasting peace.

The people of the United States know that the threat to peace comes from the ambition of Soviet imperialism and international communism to extend their control over the people of free nations. They will not be misled by false criticism which implies that it is the United States which is disturbing the peace.

The people also know that President Truman and this administration have one great fundamental purpose—the achievement of peace with freedom. All the policies and programs proposed by President Truman had been directed toward that end. The people know that the efforts of the administration are directed toward increasing the strength of free nations everywhere to resist Communist subversion and to make clear to the Soviet Union that aggression will not pay.

The people also know that the Republican Party and the Republican leadership in the Congress has persistently contrived to frustrate the great measures proposed by the administration to increase the strength of free nations. The people know that the Republican Party and its leaders in the Congress have recklessly tried to create dissension by false charges and loaded questions, such as these, and to destroy the confidence of the American people in their Government. By this means, the Republican Party seeks to destroy the unity and strength of the American people—a unity and strength vitally needed in these difficult times.

What I Have Stood for in Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the coming election to all of the people of the Nation, I want to give the people I represent a short report on the policies I have followed while serving in the Congress.

I have insisted on, and voted for economy in Government at all times. I have practiced economy in the operation of my own office at a saving to the Government. I voted and spoke against the increase of congressional salaries, and against the increase of allowances for congressional expense in the operation of congressional offices.

I voted against increasing the President's salary from $75,000 to $100,000 a year, and against giving him a tax-free bonus of $50,000 a year.

I voted against increasing the salaries of 300 top officials in the executive department of Government, with increases ranking from $2,000 to $10,000 a year for each official.

I voted and spoke against giving many unnecessary billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money away, which I felt was wholly unnecessary, to all of the nations of the earth. I voted to give reasonable assistance where it would be to our interest in national defense to foreign countries, but I voted against and spoke against many excessive billions I knew were not needed.

FARM LEGISLATION

Mr. Speaker, I have opposed the Brannan plan and supported the parity formula farm program, but have insisted that such perishable products as potatoes should not have the benefit of price supports.

I have supported appropriations for soil conservation at all times. My reasons can be given by quoting a paragraph from my speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of April 5, 1950, when I said:

Mr. Speaker, I am also interested in the provision with reference to soil conservation. The greatest contribution we can make to the posterity of this country, as well as for the immediate future, is that we try to leave the soil in a better condition than we found it, more fertile and more productive for those who follow after us. If we have done that, then we have really rendered a service to the country not only for the present and the near future, but for the many years to come.

REA

I have supported the extension of the REA and all of the appropriations requested by its Director and the President for the past 8 years I have had the honor to serve in Congress. I want to see it extended as rapidly as possible until light and power is brought to every farm home in the Nation requesting it.

FARM-TO-MARKET ROADS

I helped to write the farm-to-market road bill, and will continue to insist that this program be extended more rapidly in the future than in the past so the farmers may have the benefit of all-weather roads so much needed throughout the Nation and in my congressional district.

SHUMAN COMMENDS VURSELL RECORD

Mr. Speaker, I know of no one whose endorsement of my record in support of the farmers and farm legislation would carry more weight than that of Mr. Charles B. Shuman, president of the Illinois Agricultural Association.

I am inserting a letter from Mr. Shuman commending my services which I am sure will be of interest to the farmers of the Twenty-fourth District.

The letter reads as follows:

ILLINOIS AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., July 19, 1950.

Hon. CHARLES W. VURSELL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN VURSELL: In response to your recent letter, I have checked your voting record in the major agricultural issues coming before Congress. I find that on these important issues you voted in accordance with the expressed position of the Illinois Agricultural Association. We certainly appreciate the careful consideration that you have given to the agricultural issues coming before Congress.

The Illinois Agricultural Association has strongly opposed the so-called Brannan plan for subsidizing agriculture. We appreciate the fine support given us on this issue by yourself and other members of the Illinois delegation in Congress.

Very truly yours,
ILLINOIS AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION,
CHARLES B. SHUMAN, President.

SOCIALISM

I will continue to oppose the Brannan plan that would rob the farmer of his freedom through governmental regimentation, and would socialize the great agricultural industry of this country.

I have opposed and will continue to oppose socialized medicine which Lenin, the founder of Russian communism, said "is the key to the arch of the socialized state."

It would cost the taxpayers from five to ten billion dollars a year, and the people would receive a lower standard of medical care. I am opposed to socialism in any form, because it is only the first step down the road to communism.

COMMUNISM

For 8 years I have helped to lead the fight against the godless ideology of communism, and to hold back the power of the Communists who would overthrow this Government, destroy the churches, and enslave the people.

I voted for the Mundt-Nixon and McCarran anti-Communist bill which was vetoed by the President, and helped to pass it over the President's veto.

I do not believe in protecting, coddling, and dealing gently with the Communists in this country who seek to overthrow the Government while our fine young American soldiers are fighting and dying to protect southern Koreans from Communist invasion. I think the President making a great mistake in opposing this legislation.

THE LABOR PROBLEM

I voted for the Taft-Hartley bill which sought to bring about a more friendly cooperation between labor and management. It was absolutely necessary, and if it had received the support of the President as he should have supported it, it would have rendered a much greater service to all of the people of the Nation. Even with the opposition of the labor bosses and the President, it has proved its worth to the Nation and has been, at the same time, of great benefit to the honest rank and file of labor.

LABOR BOSS DICTATION

Mr. Speaker, because of my support of this legislation, and because I have refused to be a rubber stamp for the power-drunk labor czars, they have demanded my defeat in this election. They have boasted of the millions of dollars for the past 2 years they have been raising to defeat the Members in Congress who will not take their dictation.

It should frighten the people to know that the labor bosses only need to make a net gain of 14 Members in the House of Representatives, and 6 in the Senate to control both branches of Congress, and thereby the Government.

If they gain this objective, they will most likely give this country a Socialist labor government, probably worse than the Socialist labor government they have in England today.

RUBBER STAMP GOVERNMENT

Mr. Speaker, they are supporting my opponent who, in his announcement to the labor bosses, says: "If I go to Congress, you can write your own ticket."

NO ONE GROUP CONTROLS ME

When this announcement was carried in the Associated Press, I was asked to comment on my position. My answer was "that no single group has ever written my legislative ticket, and no one group ever would so long as I remain in the Congress." That has been my policy in the past, and will be in the future. I will deal fairly with business, labor, and agriculture in approaching legislation, with equal justice to all of these groups, and special privileges to none.

The Democratic farmer, the Republican farmer, the Democratic businessman, and the Republican businessman, and all of the people who have sacrificed and struggled to own a farm or a business, or a home, I feel certain are opposed to any one group having the power to control this Government.

Such control will wreck our American way of life, and destroy our freedom and liberty. The threat of it is before all of the people in this district in this campaign. The great majority of the people know I have been right in having the courage to stand up and fight these labor bosses off in their grab for more and more power and control. I feel certain that the farmer who wants to protect his fireside that he, his wife, and family have saved and sacrificed to own, realize this threat facing him in this campaign. If he will rise above politics and get into this fight with me, we can protect his future, and the future of all of our people.

The way to beat this crowd is with votes in the ballot box. I believe the farmers and the small-business men and—yes, many clear thinking laboring men, realize this dangerous threat to the future of our country.

I hope and believe that they will put the protection of their homes and businesses first, and forget politics long enough to urge their friends to go to the polls and join with me in making this fight to protect the interest of all of us, and the American way of life.

There is grave danger ahead. It is time for action now. It is later than we think.

Hon. Frank P. Graham, of North Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement I have prepared concerning my own reactions to an event which concerns us—the end of Senator GRAHAM'S current term of office in the United States Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR FRANK GRAHAM BY SENATOR HERBERT H. LEHMAN

One of the associations in this body which I shall always cherish is the one I have enjoyed with the junior Senator from North Carolina, Dr. FRANK GRAHAM. It is sad for me to contemplate returning to a Senate on November 27 which will not include this kindly modest humanitarian.

But, while Dr. GRAHAM'S contributions to the Senate during his year and a half tenure as Senator were always in the finest traditions of American democracy and genuine liberalism, that the role was for him only one of many which he played in the great drama of human progress. The work he has done in both his private and public capacities for the relief of the distress of his fellow men is tremendously impressive. The positions he had held range from president of the North Carolina Conference for Social Service to United States representative on the United Nations Commission which secured peace in Indonesia.

Indeed, his very eagerness to relieve human suffering and to fight human injustice was undoubtedly responsible, in large part, for the fact that he will no longer be a Member of this body.

Thus, his membership on the President's Committee on Civil Rights aroused antagonism on the part of some of his constituents despite the fact that Senator GRAHAM did not personally support all the proposals contained in the civil-rights report. But Senator GRAHAM, although his views are somewhat different from mine in this regard, followed faithfully and unerringly the dictates of his own conscience and the findings of his judgment. He would not compromise. He would not retreat from what he believed was right. That, along with gentle tolerance and full understanding, are the keynotes of FRANK GRAHAM'S character.

There have been many distinguished Members of this body who have honored the Senate of the United States by their presence in its 161 years of existence. We have had Daniel Webster, and Henry Clay, John Calhoun, and many others who each in his way made significant contributions to the development of this Nation. But, as I think of great Senators with whom FRANK GRAHAM'S social philosophy and warm humanitarianism can be more accurately compared, the name of Robert M. La Follette, Oscar Underwood, George Norris, and Robert F. Wagner of my own State, come most easily to mind.

It was in the La Follette-Norris-Underwood-Wagner tradition that FRANK GRAHAM served his State and Nation in the United States Senate during the past 18 months. And I feel certain that this great man will continue to grow in stature and to serve his country and his fellow men.

You and the Atomic Bomb

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a pocket-size booklet titled "You and the Atomic Bomb," prepared through the joint efforts of the New York State Civil Defense Commission, and Time, Inc. In view of the fact that it is the first simplified A-bomb handbook to be released officially, I believe it to be of sufficient interest to warrant its insertion in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOU AND THE ATOMIC BOMB—WHAT TO DO IN CASE OF AN ATOMIC ATTACK

(By New York State Civil Defense Commission, Public Pamphlet No. 1)

FOREWORD

The purpose of this booklet is to help you answer the question, What do I do if an atomic bomb is dropped?

As terrible as the bomb is, it will not spread as much death and destruction as many people believe. Atomic attack will not, as some people think, mean the end of our great cities, our State, or our country.

Certainly we must face the fact that at the immediate scene of an atomic explosion there will be dreadful devastation and thousands of lives will be lost in a heavily populated area. An entire city could be crippled temporarily by one bomb.

There is no complete defense against the atomic bomb, any more than there is against any other weapon of war. But if you are one of those who has said to yourself, "there is no defense against the atomic bomb," the facts, as you will see, are otherwise.

By careful civil defense planning now, and by full understanding on your part of what you can do now and what you should do in time of disaster, the effects of the bomb can be greatly minimized.

In case of attack, the enemy would logically concentrate on areas of dense population and industry. What happens in these areas can affect every citizen in the State. And it is the people of the so-called "safe areas," who must be ready to come to the help of those who might be bombed.

What you should do in time of attack are simple things—but all-important.

They are briefly outlined here.

LUCIUS D. CLAY,
Chairman, New York State Civil Defense Commission.

THE ATOMIC BOMB

We hope that your closest acquaintance with an atomic bomb will be in reading this pamphlet. But if you are to understand what to do if an A-bomb should fall on your city, you must first know what an A-bomb does.

An atomic bomb set off in midair, about 2,000 feet from ground level, is more destructive than either a water or ground burst, so we must consider this kind of attack as the most likely.

Air burst

Here is what happens in an air burst: At the instant of the explosion, a brilliant fireball appears in the sky and quickly grows to about 900 feet in diameter. It could probably be seen for 50 miles in daylight, 200 miles at night. From this fireball, brighter than 100 suns, deadly heat and radiation burst out in all directions. The heat flash is dangerous up to 2 miles, but radiation intensity falls off rapidly after 4,000 feet. In the first second, half of the radiation has already passed. In three seconds heat and most of harmful radiation are over.

Following the heat flash, a tremendous shock wave caused by the expansion of hot gases from the explosion sweeps over the area. Winds of 800 miles per hour accompany the shock wave in its early stages but fall off rapidly in intensity, dropping to 100 miles per hour within a mile and a half. Several seconds later, another wind roars in toward the center of the explosion with about half the force of the out-rushing blast. At the end of 10 seconds, the immediate danger from the explosion itself has passed.

If you are above ground anywhere within three quarters of a mile from the air burst, you will have less than a 50–50 chance of survival. If you are underground within this area, you will have a good chance of coming through, unless you are almost directly under the point where the bomb explodes.

Here are some estimates of how an atomic explosion would damage the area around it:

Within one-half mile: Complete devastation. Little chance of survival if above ground.

From one-half to 1 mile: All buildings, except those of concrete and heavy steel frame, will be gutted or destroyed. The heat flash will be intense, but radiation will be reduced.

From 1 mile to a mile and a half: Most old-style brick and frame buildings will be destroyed. Modern buildings will be seriously damaged. There will be great danger from flying debris. Radiation will no longer be a hazard. The heat flash will still be dangerous, but not lethal.

Hundreds of scattered fires will break out, many of them caused by broken gas mains, oil lines, and tanks, or shorted electric circuits. All utilities will be destroyed or seriously damaged.

At 2 miles: Damage here will almost all be due to blast and secondary fires. Public utilities will be badly damaged. Only moderate burns, if any, will be caused by the heat flash.

At 4 miles: There will still be some blast damage, especially to frame and old-style wooden buildings, and scattered secondary fires. Rubble will block the streets.

Beyond 4 miles: In some instances blast damage might extend to a distance of 6 miles, depending upon the wind, weather, and the terrain. Glass and plaster breakage might occur up to a distance of 8 miles. Utilities might be disrupted from damage in the central blast area.

About a half hour after the explosion a strong wind will blow in toward the center of the damaged area, spreading the fires that have already been started.

Ground and water bursts

While it is likely that an enemy will prefer an air burst because of the greater damage it does, he may deliberately or accidentally explode an atomic bomb on the ground or in a harbor.

In ground or water bursts the effects of the blast, heat, and direct radiation do not extend nearly as far as in an air burst. In the case of a water burst, heat and direct radiation are negligible, and damage from the shock wave does not extend beyond 1 mile.

However, both ground and water bursts have a particular danger of their own which is almost completely lacking in air bursts. The clouds of spray or dust thrown into the air by these bursts become highly radioactive. As they drift with the wind over the surrounding area, they contaminate all objects in their path and poison people who are exposed to them too long.

WHAT TO DO IN AN AIR RAID

A radar network and a force of volunteer airplane spotters is being established to detect a possible enemy attack. If enemy raiders are sighted, air raid sirens will be sounded. But we must also consider the possibility that the enemy will be able to evade our defenses and deliver a bomb before a warning can be sounded.

Sneak attack

In case of a sneak attack there are several things you can do to protect yourself, even though you may not be able to reach shelter.

The blinding flash of the explosion will be your first warning. If you are in the open, immediately fall to the ground face down next to a building wall, if possible, so you will be shielded from falling brick and stones. Close your eyes and cover your face, neck, and arms. This will give you some protection against the deadly radiation and scorching heat.

If you are on the street, dodge into a doorway if it is not more than a step or two away. Stand to one side under the arch of the door. Turn away from the flash and cover your face and other exposed areas of the body.

If you are in the house, crawl under a bed or table or drop behind a sofa or any other large object which can protect you from flying glass. Keep out of line with windows. Cover up.

Air raid warnings

When enemy planes are spotted coming toward your city, the sirens will blow a rising and falling signal for 3 minutes. This is the only warning and means that from the observed direction of flight of the enemy planes, they will soon be in a position to attack your city. The warning will be sounded just as soon as the direction of attack is clear, so that you will have as much time as possible to seek shelter, but will not be alarmed unnecessarily.

An attacking plane may fly over many towns before reaching its target. All these towns will be warned. The air raid warning does not necessarily mean that your city is the target. But remember that the rising and falling signal means trouble is at hand. Take cover.

Unless announced in advance that tests will be held, an air raid warning means business.

When you hear the alert

Know your designated shelter. Get down into it or into the basement, as fast as you can without pushing people around. Take cover, but be sensible. Do not panic.

Blast is most destructive to the upper portion of buildings. If you can't get downstairs, get into the center hall, the core of the structure.

If you cannot get out of your office or apartment in time: Get under a desk or table if possible or lie close to the wall where you are not in line with the windows. Cover your neck, head, and arms with your coat. Close your eyes tightly. These precautions will help protect you from flying glass or debris, as well as the heat and radiation from the explosion.

If you are on the street: Get to the nearest shelter, basement, or subway.

If no air-raid shelter is available, step into the nearest doorway or, better yet, into the lobby of a concrete building. Face away from the street and from windows. Pull your coat over you head or if you are without a coat shield your head with your arms.

If you are driving a car: Park at the curb as quickly as you can. Do not park where you will block a street or a corner. Leave your keys in the car. Get out and seek shelter at once. If you are riding in a taxi or bus, get out and take cover.

If you live in a frame house: Shut off at the source all oil, gas, light, and water. Put out fires. Close all doors and windows. Draw curtains and blinds.

Get into the basement if you have one. Take a flashlight and, if it is winter, a supply of warm clothing. After all fires have been extinguished, close fuel lines and draft doors of coal furnaces or stoves.

Have several buckets of sand and water and a complete first-aid kit handy.

The all clear

When the enemy plane has been shot down or has passed by without attack or has made its attack and departed, the sirens will blow on "All clear," a series of three 1-minute steady blasts.

After an air burst

The immediate effect of the explosion will be over in a few seconds, but before you leave cover look out for falling wreckage. The greatest danger after the attack is from fires set by the heat of the explosion or resulting from broken gas and oil lines and short circuits. Use your head. Don't let yourself get trapped by big fires. But don't run off and let a small fire burn your house down if it can be controlled with a fire extinguisher or sand.

If, because of fire or damage, you must leave the building you are in and there are clouds of dust or spray outside, cover your mouth and nose with your handkerchief. (The dust probably is from the wreckage and may be harmless, but be careful; a ground or water burst may have spread radioactive dirt or fog through the air.)

If you are not in the area of serious damage, stay indoors and close the windows.

Once the enemy raiders are clear of the area, change your clothes the first opportunity. Bathe or shower; scrub hard and use plenty of soap. Be particularly careful to get your hair and fingernails entirely clean.

After a ground or water burst

If you have been officially notified that the explosion was a ground or water burst and you are near the damaged area, do not use any food or drink which has been exposed. It may be contaminated.

As soon as possible after a water or ground burst, specially trained teams with detecting instruments will determine the areas which are seriously contaminated. You will be told if you must leave the area. Bathe and change to uncontaminated clothes.

Against the radioactive fog created by a water burst there is no certain protection, but obviously it is wise to take cover in as well sealed a place as possible, since the fog can seep through broken windows or small cracks. Until you are out of the contaminated area, try to keep your mouth and nostrils covered to avoid inhaling radioactive dust or spray.

Do not pick up objects on your way out of a contaminated area; you will be carrying contamination with you.

RADIATION

You need not worry about lingering radioactivity after an air burst. It is now known that there is much less residual radiation from an atomic air burst than was at first feared.

But a ground or water burst leaves a great amount of deadly radioactivity behind in the spray or dirt that spreads contamination as it falls to earth. Radiation, even if you have absorbed a considerable amount of it, is not always fatal, however.

There is no immediate way of knowing when you have been exposed to radiation during or after the atomic burst. You will not feel anything if radiation hits you. Signs of radiation sickness show up later. How much later depends upon how much radiation you have absorbed.

If you have absorbed a large amount, you will know it within a few hours. The first signs are nausea and shock.

In the first day or two, the shock will be followed by vomiting, diarrhea, and fever. There will be no pain, but you will suffer discomfort, depression, and fatigue.

The symptoms will disappear, then return for 2 or 3 days. In the worst and untreated cases, death follows.

In moderate cases these symptoms will appear only after several days—in some cases 2 or 3 weeks. During this time the mouth and gums will bleed, and there will be internal bleeding. All bleeding, even from small cuts, will be difficult to stop. Loss of appetite and falling hair also may indicate radiation sickness.

Medical attention important

In many cases radiation sickness symptoms disappear entirely for a time. This does not mean you are out of danger. The symptoms may return at a later time.

If you show any signs of radiation sickness or have reason to believe the area you have been in is radioactive, go to a medical station at once.

Conditions after the bombing, however, may not permit you to get proper medical treatment immediately. In this case follow these simple rules until help comes: Keep warm. Get complete rest; stay in bed if possible. Drink warm, nourishing liquids, and eat foods rich in sugar and protein, but do not eat or drink foods or liquids that have been exposed in a contaminated area.

FIRE

You may ask why you need concern yourself with fire when there is a fire department nearby. The answer is that no fire department system, even with the help of its auxiliary services, can deal with the multitude of fires which would result from enemy attack.

If the area in which you live is attacked, the first responsibility for providing fire protection (especially in case your house is set afire) rests directly upon you.

This responsibility involves the provision of the necessary fire-fighting equipment and the knowledge of how to use it.

A single attack may start hundreds of fires, and probably so much water would be used by the fire department that there would be little or no water pressure in homes. Also, any special fire-fighting equipment which operates by electricity should not be counted on, since power lines may be broken.

But a great deal can be done with individual fire-fighting appliances if they are used properly and promptly. If you act fast, you can help reduce losses from small fires and leave the regular fire departments free to go to work on the big blazes. They will come to your aid as soon as possible.

FIRST AID

First aid, particularly in the case of serious injuries and burns, is delicate work, for experts only. If medical aid is available, it is better to remain calm and let qualified medical people handle the situation. Otherwise you will do more harm than good.

But you might find yourself in a situation where help is not at hand and injuries are such that they need immediate attention.

Burns

If medical aid can possibly be secured, do not touch or treat any severe burn. Remember that infection may reduce chances of recovery by 50 percent. Any handling will increase the danger of infection.

A few simple rules:

1. Exclude air from the burned area with clean gauze, soft, clean cloths, or absorbent cotton, then bandage gently.

2. Unless absolutely necessary, do not remove clothing. If garments must be taken off, cut the cloth around the burn. If material sticks to the flesh, do not remove it. If blisters have formed, they should not be broken or punctured.

3. Dressings may be soaked in a lotion made by stirring baking soda in clean water (about two teaspoonsful to the pint). Keep strips wet by repeatedly pouring the lotion over them. Do not remove the dressings.

4. If pain is unbearable and no medical aid can be secured, smear clean gauze with petroleum jelly (vaseline), and apply to the burned area.

5. Dressings should overlap each other. Overtight bandages may lead to serious injury. The patient should be kept warm; give hot, sweet drinks if he conscious.

Hemorrhage

1. If bleeding is sigiht or there is only a small amount of oozing, it is best to ignore it. Remember, touching or handling a wound will increase the risk of infection. If there has been a ground or water burst, cover the patient with some garment to keep out contaminated water and dirt.

2. Bleeding may be checked by the use of a compress of gauze or cloth held by a moderately tight bandage. A tourniquet should be used only when there is excessive bleeding. A tourniquet or pressure bandage must be loosened momentarily at half-hour intervals to prevent serious damage.

Fractures

1. Do not try to set a broken bone.

2. Do not move the patient unless he is in danger from fire or falling debris.

3. If necessary to move the patient, bind the limb tightly to a pillow, a padded board, or other improvised support. When possible lay the patient on a door or other flat surface before moving him.

4. Keep the patient warm; give hot, sweet drinks if he is conscious.

CIVIL DEFENSE AND YOU

Your New York State Civil Defense Commission, working with the various State departments and local city and county governments, is taking all possible steps to effect immediate mobilization of the State's resources in time of emergency.

Advanced planning is now being completed by the State Commissioners for Public Health, Safety, Police, Public Utilities, Welfare, Housing, Veterans' Affairs, Agriculture and Markets, the Public Service Commission and the National Guard. This work includes the inventorying of manpower, equipment, hospital, housing and welfare facilities; the training of auxiliary police, firemen, air-raid wardens, welfare workers, and State guard and the organization of emergency teams ready to move at once into disaster areas.

Your local city or county civil defense director is responsible for the organization and operation of civil defense where you live. He works in cooperation with the State commission and the State agencies. But the success or failure of the program in your locality will depend largely upon the efficiency of the local organization and the teamwork and spirit of the community.

Here is how you can help:

1. If you have special skills, register at once with your local civil defense office so that you can do your part as the volunteer organization is expanded.

2. Cooperate with the civil defense workers in charge of your block or the building in which you live. Know your local warden.

3. In time of disaster, follow instructions, keep calm, don't try to telephone or drive away in your car.

4. Don't start or repeat rumors, particularly in time of real or threatened emergency. Don't believe everything you hear. Rely only on official information through the press, radio, or your local civil defense organization.

It is estimated that effective civil defense measures can save as many as 50 percent of the lives which might otherwise be lost in time of atomic disaster.

Let us hope that time will never come. Meanwhile, civil defense is everybody's business today, tomorrow, and in the months ahead.

HERE IS A SUMMARY OF THE MOST IMPORTANT THINGS TO REMEMBER IN CASE OF AN ATOMIC ATTACK

What you should do

Keep calm.

If there is time, get to shelter at once.

If no underground shelter is close by, get into the ground floor of a nearby building or even stand in a doorway if nothing better is available.

If you see the bomb flash and there is no cover of any kind within a step or two, drop to the street or gutter, turn away from flash, and close eyes tightly. Cover your head, face, neck, arms, and other exposed areas of the body.

If you are indoors, turn off gas, electricity, water, and oil at first warning and hang drapes over windows. Get into the core of your building and under a desk or table if there isn't time to get to the basement. Lie face downward and out of line with windows. After the burst tie handkerchief over mouth if area is contaminated.

What you should not do

Don't telephone.

Don't turn on water after blast, unless to fight fire.

Don't eat or drink in a contaminated area.

Don't use metal goods in a contaminated zone.

Don't touch things after ground or water burst.

Don't try to drive your car.

Don't get excited or excite others.

HERE ARE SOME THINGS FOR YOU TO DO AND NOT TO DO

What to do

1. Close doors and windows to prevent draft.

2. To force a door, break panel near lock.

3. Crawl, don't walk when in thick smoke.

4. Keep near walls where floors are strongest.

5. Attack fire at closest possible range.

6. Use sand or foam to quench oil fires.

7. Keep buckets of water and sand in the house and be sure extinguishers are filled and in order.

8. When searching a house for fires start at top.

What not to do

1. Don't enter a smoke-filled room alone, except to save a life.

2. Don't enter burning building or room without fire-fighting appliances, except to save life.

3. Don't play water on electric wiring.

If your attic is full of odds and ends get rid of them. They are a fire hazard.

Activities of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. TOM MURRAY

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following summary of action taken by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service during the Eighty-first Congress.

During the Eighty-first Congress, 610 House bills, 36 Senate bills and resolutions, and 44 House resolutions were referred to the committee. Favorable action was taken on 58 House bills and resolutions and 10 Senate bills, of which 55 became law. Two bills are presently pending before the House, three House bills were vetoed, four House bills have passed the House and are pending in the Senate, and four House bills were incorporated in other legislation.

The committee held extensive hearings on the following subjects: First, postal rate revision; second, revision of the Classification Act of 1923; third, improved financial control of the Post Office Department—Hoover Commission recommendation; fourth, recruitment procedures for the competitive civil service—Hoover Commission recommendation; fifth, increases in compensation for heads and assistant heads of executive departments and agencies; sixth, salary increases and other benefits for postal employees; seventh, summary suspension of employees in order to protect the national security; eighth, appointment and promotion of veterans of World War II in the postal service; ninth, census of housing; tenth, legislation requiring Communist, Fascist, totalitarian, and subversive organizations to identify matter sent by them through the mails; and, eleventh, more liberal benefits for civil-service annuitants.

In addition to the legislative activities of the committee, two subcommittees were appointed to study and investigate personnel practices in the Federal Government.

One subcommittee composed of Mr. KARST, chairman, Mr. MCCARTHY, and Mr. REES, has submitted a report—House Report 2456—concerning certain irregularities in connection with the administration of the Army finance center at St. Louis, Mo. Most of the recommendations of the committee have been adopted by the Department of the Army.

Another subcommittee composed of Mr. WILLIAMS, chairman; Mr. DAVIS of Georgia; Mr. HERLONG; Mr. REES; and Mr. HAGEN, has been studying the problem of employee utilization, overstaffing, and inefficiency in Government personnel operations in order to determine where economies can be made. One of the studies of this subcommittee is contained in House Report 2457 and relates to the activities of the Federal Security Agency. The operations of other departments and agencies have been studied and additional recommendations will be made.

Legislation approved by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service during the 81st Cong.

HOUSE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS APPROVED BY COMMITTEE WHICH BECAME LAW

Public Law No.	Explanation of provisions	House bill No.
9	To provide for the issuance of a 6-cent air-mail postage stamp in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Alexandria, Va., in lieu of provision in Public Law 807, 80th Cong., providing for the issuance of a 5-cent air-mail stamp.	H. R. 1432
13	To provide for the acquisition and operation of the Freedom Train by the Archivist of the United States during the period ending July 5, 1951	H. J. Res. 84
19	To authorize the issuance of 4 special series of stamps commemorating the three hundredth anniversary of Annapolis, Md	H. R. 960
29	To provide for eliminating the necessity for reappointment in cases of postmasters whose post offices are advanced from fourth class to a higher class or where post offices of a higher class are relegated to fourth class.	H. R. 253
98	To allow certain employees of the Government separated between Jan. 23, 1942, and Apr. 1, 1948, with less than 20 years' civilian service, to obtain refund of retirement deductions in lieu of annuity at age 62.	H. R. 2020
123	To provide retirement credit for Federal service when, through inadvertence, no deductions were made from the salaries of Federal employees	H. R. 3338
133	To provide for an improvement in the administration of the collection of cotton statistics by requiring the Bureau of the Census to furnish information regarding cotton statistics only to interested parties.	H. R. 3444
158	To provide continuing authority for the Bureau of Census to use other Government employees for field work in connection with the decennial censuses, and providing that during the taking of the next and subsequent decennial censuses enlisted men and officers of the Armed Forces may be appointed and compensated for the enumeration of the personnel of the Armed Forces.	H. R. 3198
160	To grant a retroactive (July 1948) $330 annual pay increase to employees of the Foreign Service and classified employees in or under the municipal government of the District of Columbia. These employees were excluded from the Postal Rate Revision and Federal Employees' Salary Act of 1948.	H. R. 5100
167	To authorize the creation of 10 professional and scientific positions in the headquarters and research stations of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.	H. R. 20
180	To provide for the repealing of the Alaska Railroad Retirement Act and the Canal Zone Retirement Act and to bring all employees to whom such acts apply within the terms of the Civil Service Retirement Act.	H. R. 3445
199	To exempt from the Civil Service Retirement Act certain employees of the Library of Congress and the judicial branch of the Government whose employment is temporary or of uncertain duration.	H. R. 3512
206	To authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to accept reimbursement for overtime paid to employees in the Bureau of Animal Industry who prepare virus, serum, toxin, etc.	H. R. 459
214	To clarify laws relating to the compensation of postmasters by providing the Postmaster General with authority to retain fourth class post offices in the salary grade and class to which they were advanced because of "unusual conditions" until the annual adjustment is made at the end of the fiscal year.	H. R. 5168
231	To provide a long-range development program in the Post Office Department for improvement in methods, procedures, equipment and supplies	H. R. 91
233	To provide that Federal employees who are veterans may be granted time off, not to exceed 4 hours in any one day, to participate as active pallbearers or as members of firing squads or guards of honor in funerals for deceased members of the Armed Forces returned for burial.	H. R. 2662
235	To provide that the civil-service annuities of certain officers and employees engaged in the enforcement of the criminal laws of the United States shall be computed on the basis of their average basic salaries for any 5 consecutive years of allowable service. Under previous law the basis for computing annuities of such persons is last 5 years of service.	H. R. 3756
257	To provide that automatic promotions for part-time employees in the custodial service of the Post Office Department shall be based on a calendar year rather than on present procedure requiring 2,024 hours of service.	H. R. 1516
267	To provide retirement benefits for certain employees with 25 years of service involuntarily separated from the Federal service between July 1, 1945, and June 30, 1947.	H. R. 997
277	To grant the Postmaster General additional authority to award star-route contracts for transportation of mail by air where no air-mail service exists and where the airplane is the most practical medium for transporting mail.	H. R. 4498
288	To provide that with respect to the computation of night differential for employees in the field service of the Post Office Department, night work shall be defined as any work performed between the hours of 6 p. m. and 6 a. m., and either standard or daylight-saving time shall be used, depending upon whichever time is observed where such night work is performed.	H. R. 3383
290	To provide the Postmaster General with authority to reduce postal rates to 1 cent per pound for braille writers and other appliances for the blind, or parts thereof, which are the property of State governments or subdivisions thereof, and of public libraries or of private agencies for the blind not conducted for private profit, or of blind individuals, under such regulations as he may prescribe.	H. R. 3637
310	To provide for extending survivorship benefits to widowers of employees retiring under the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1930 (previous law extends such benefits to widows), and changes the reduction factor in the annuities of the retiring employees from 10 percent to 5 percent on the first $1,500 per annum of such annuities and retains existing law of a 10-percent reduction factor on that portion of the annuities exceeding $1,500.	H. R. 2944
316	To extend pro rata annual- and sick-leave benefits to part-time employees on regular tours of duty covering not less than 5 days in any administrative workweek, and to validate payments previously made to certain part-time employees.	H. R. 2619
320	To provide that in computing annuities under the Civil Service Retirement Act for employees paid on a fee basis, the maximum basic salary upon which retirement may be based shall be $10,000 per annum.	H. R. 5465
359	To establish rates of annual compensation for the heads and assistant heads of executive departments and agencies from $14,000 per annum for certain bureau chiefs and board members, to $22,500 per annum for members of the Cabinet.	H. R. 1689
362	To amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1930, so as to make such act applicable to officers and employees of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf.	H. R. 86
425	To provide for granting the Civil Service Commission discretion under the Civil Service Act of 1883 to authorize appointments in the departmental service without regard to the apportionment laws when persons are not available from States whose quotas are not filled. Also, this legislation codifies statutes governing the residence requirements of persons seeking positions in the departmental service.	H. R. 3826
428	To provide employees in the postal field service with (a) increase of $120 per year for all employees paid on an annual basis, 2½ cents-per-hour increase for hourly employees and 5-percent increase for fourth-class postmasters; (b) 3 longevity grades for all employees (including postmasters and supervisors) not previously entitled to such grades; (c) increase in entrance salary for regular employees by $200.	H. R. 4495
429	To provide for the repeal and replacement of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, by revising and simplifying the classifications and pay schedules of 885,000 classified employees, an average $140.50 annual pay increase, and longevity step increases in all of the CPC grades and below grade 11 in the new general schedule. New procedures for allocating positions are provided for the classified Federal service subject to the control and supervision of the Civil Service Commission. A general schedule of 18 grades and a crafts, protective, and custodial schedule of 10 grades replace the present schedules and grades. 3 additional salary ranges are provided above the present ceiling of $10,330 with limitations upon the number of positions in each such grade as follows: 300 in GS-16 ($11,200 to $12,000), 75 in GS-17 ($12,200 to $13,000), and 25 positions in GS-18 ($14,000). A new procedure is established to grant employees promotions or cash awards for contributing to outstanding efficiency and economy in administration.	H. R. 5931
456	To permit claims for payment of postal notes to be filed later than 1 year from month of issue if the original note is presented with the claim	H. R. 6475
492	To remove pay inequities that developed in cases of certain employees in the field service of the Post Office Department who did not receive full credit for military service for pay purposes under the terms of Public Law 577, 79th Cong.	H. R. 4285
500	To provide uniform longevity grades for employees in the postal field service by (a) establishing 3 longevity grades for all employees, (b) permitting all employees to count all years of service toward such longevity grades, (c) permitting employees presently receiving longevity grades to elect to remain under old system of such grades or come under the new system.	H. R. 6553
515	To provide for changing the phrase "legal voting residence" to "legal or voting residence" in the act setting forth requirements for application for civil-service examinations.	H. R. 6552
547	To provide, in the absence of a designated beneficiary, the following order precedence for lump-sum death payments under the civil-service retirement: (1) Beneficiaries designated by the employee, (2) widow or widower, (3) children, (4) parents, (5) executor or administrator, (6) other next of kin.	H. R. 7866
552	To authorize the Postmaster General to detail employees to postal units at armed services camps and to authorize allowances not exceeding $4 per day in lieu of actual expenses. Renews an authority which had expired.	H. R. 5103
562	To provide that the Civil Service Classification Act of 1949 (Public Law 429, 81st Cong.) shall be inapplicable to postal employees of the Canal Zone	H. R. 7888
577	To permit the Postmaster General to renew for 4 years star-route mail contracts with subcontractors at the same rate as the original contract. Permits such renewals with subcontractors who have performed satisfactorily for at least 1 year, and where present contract holder does not want to continue contract.	H. R. 8270
580	To postpone the application of the Classification Act of 1949 to certain positions in the Selective Service System	H. R. 7889
601	To provide that each civil-service annuitant who retired prior to Apr. 1, 1948, under the Civil Service Retirement Act of 1930, may retain or accept an increase in his annuity of 25 percent or $300, whichever is lesser, and at the same time designate his surviving spouse to receive ½ of his annuity (but not to exceed $600). Under previous law such annuitants were granted the privilege of accepting one or the other of the above alternatives.	H. R. 4295

Legislation approved by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service during the 81st Cong.—Continued

Public Law No.	Explanation of provisions	House bill No.
609	To provide the Postmaster General with authority to return to senders marked "Unlawful" all mail addressed to persons, firms, corporations, companies, partnerships, or associations engaged in obtaining remittances of money or property of any kind through the mails in exchange for obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy, or vile articles, matters, things, devices, or substances, and to refuse to cash money orders and postal notes in connection therewith.	H. R. 8767

Key to Conquest of Reds To Be Found Inside Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I herewith include in my extension of remarks an article written by Rt. Rev. Msgr. Fulton J. Sheen and appearing in the Boston Post of October 1, 1950.

This article is a splendid one and written by one of the great churchmen of the world and one of the outstanding students of world events, particularly of communism. This article is worthy of deep consideration by everyone who believes in God and who values liberty.

This article of Monsignor Sheen's impresses me tremendously with its logic and its power. The contents of Monsignor Sheen's article cannot successfully be challenged.

His pointed suggestion to those officials who direct the Voice of America on the power of the Word of God is in order and should be adopted by them.

It is not only a timely article but is a very practical one.

KEY TO CONQUEST OF REDS TO BE FOUND INSIDE RUSSIA—GANGSTER TACTICS CAN BE BLOCKED BY MAN'S WILL TO SAVE HIS SOUL

(By Fulton J. Sheen)

The most tragic thing in the world is that those who are most violently incensed against the evils of communism have no clear idea of why they are opposed to it. The western world is being armed with guns to attack a faith, without itself having a faith.

Communism in Russia can be conquered, but only in the same way that it conquers—namely, from within. Without firing a single gun, but through winning over a state department employee from one country, a justice official from another, and a general from still another, it has gained mastery of over 800,000,000 people. Never before in the history of the world did any one country gain such power without the use of a bow and arrow or gun powder. Without an army crossing its own frontiers it has mastered much of the globe. The Trojan horse tactics and the fifth column within other countries have been more conquering than any army of the Russians' own could be.

The Western World is now arming against a communism which refuses to bear arms. It is the very essence of Russian communistic tactics not to fight. Russia did not fight to gain the Kuriles at our back door; it did not go to war to gain northern Korea, or even invade South Korea. It did not fight to gain China, nor Lithuania.

Almost every one of its victories were won at a conference table, as the statesmen's cigarette and cigar bowed down to the majestic smoke screen of a dictator's pipe. Communistic Russia will not use its Russian Army so long as there is a living Chinese, or Korean, or Indian. Its technique is exactly the same as that of gang leaders who hire killers to do away with their enemies while they pose as respectable citizens who love to give soup to the poor.

KEY TO THE PROBLEM

The key to the problem of how to deal with communistic Russia is to be found within Russia itself. The most effective victories are won by using the very implements the enemy would use in destroying us. Since communistic Russia would conquer the world by destroying each country from within, so communism in Russia can be conquered from within. In any country there are some elements which are the raw material for a revolution of one kind or another. The immoral, the jaded, the avaricious, and the atheistic naturally gravitate toward a communistic center.

The people of good will, the fathers and mothers who love their children and their God, naturally gravitate to a divine center. Russia has a greater potential for being destroyed from within than has America; there is a greater fifth column in Russia than Russia's fifth column in America. This potential enemy of communism within Russia is the vast majority of the Russian people, who are anxious to throw off the cruel yoke, simply because they are human beings. As the Chinese Communists betray China, and as American Communists betray America, so the Russians can be induced to destroy communism in Russia.

It may be said that the Voice of America is trying to achieve this. The truth is that the Voice of America will never overthrow Russia from within by merely political broadcasts, for politics alone can never fire the souls of men. Why should the Russians endanger their lives to change one form of politics for another? No Russian wants to risk his life in order that his country, too, may have a Tydings committee, but he will risk his life to save his soul.

DANGER OF WARS

Russia must be overcome spiritually before it can be overcome politically. Men will not throw off communistic materialism just in order to enjoy American materialism or the right to buy anything they see in a mailing-house catalog. But they have a thousand reasons for surpassing both kinds of materialism in order to remake their own souls, according to their own lights and according to their great Christian traditions.

America is not in danger of a war with Russia. But it does face a succession of wars with a succession of Russian satellites. As the northern Koreans put little boys with pop guns in the front ranks to protect the soldiers, so Russian Communists will resist "American imperialism" to the last drop of Chinese, Korean, Indian, and Philippine blood. Yet the Koreans are not our enemies, nor are the Chinese: they are our brothers.

American boys would not strike the sister of a boy they were fighting if he held his sister before him. That is what the Russians are doing; holding other nations before them, like women, to protect themselves. Russia never wins a battle—nor does it ever lose a battle. The Koreans lose battles, or the Chinese, but never the Russian Communists. That is why Russia will never be defeated until it is defeated from within. The Voice of America could accomplish this if its directors really believed that most people think seriously about God.

ECA—Old and New

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, in keeping with the order entered into in the United States Senate on September 23 I seek the privilege of inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post of September 25, 1950, headed "ECA—Old and new," about two of my old friends and old associates in the Committee for Economic Development, and surely two of the finest public servants Washington has seen. One of the finest things about them is their attitude toward each other, and their attitude, as Republicans and yet as loyal subordinates, toward the President. This editorial is as deserving as any of the dozens I have seen occasioned by Mr. Paul Hoffman's resignation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECA—OLD AND NEW

The change in the headship of the Economic Cooperation Administration will not alter its direction. Paul G. Hoffman and William C. Foster have been David and Jonathan in running the ECA, with, of recent months, Mr. Hoffman the expositor and Mr. Foster the administrator of that great and ramified agency.

At the start Mr. Hoffman had to create an organization. This he did with signal success. There is a fund of ability in this country for assignments of this sort, but it must be inspired before it can be enlisted. Mr. Hoffman happens to have the gift of inspiration, as his career before he started ECA had testified. As a progressive industrialist, he threw his abundant energies into the setting up of the Committee for Economic Development, which has served to take the Bourbonism out of American industry. He has enlightened ideas on the duty that industry owes to the community and a sense of cooperation with Government. As an employer he knew his workers in terms of coworkers, and is able to distinguish between a personal interest and paternalism. Withal he has a warming nature which breathes confidence and then enthusiasm into his associates and his audiences. No wonder he organized a team of like-minded and hard-working officials in ECA.

The same qualities account for his success in dealing with Congress. Few men have his facility for dissuading or persuading committees of Congress. It seems like an art as he exercises it, but Mr. Hoffman is artless, and he comes by his disarming trait quite naturally. His convictions are part of the explanation. But the power of his appeal comes from the respect he shows for the legislative branch of Government and the obligation he feels toward stewardship.

And what an excellent missioner he has been abroad. The farther east you go, the more the picture of the wickedness of the American capitalist is conjured up. But when Mr. Hoffman appeared among the people of Europe, they saw no forked horns, but a man of faith, with a deep sensitiveness to the fears and hungers of the world's submerged, and with a passionate belief that the free-enterprise system can distribute as well as produce. He must have offset a good deal of Muscovite propaganda of the exploiter grown fat on surplus value by the disproof furnished by his person as well as by his mission.

Mr. Foster has long had the reputation as the best administrator in Washington. He has taken over ECA at a time when the programing is being dovetailed with the post-Korean need for rearmament. In the new context of defense policy the integration of Europe over which both Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Foster have labored of recent months now has a military impetus. Mr. Foster, like Mr. Hoffman, is a Republican. But both of them have shown a single-minded loyalty to their work which must have been a great satisfaction to the President. With the respect that he has also gained from Congress and the ECA staff, Mr. Foster is assured of a flying start in the similar improvement of his assignment.

Statement by Prof. Thomas I. Emerson, President of the National Lawyers Guild

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement issued by Prof. Thomas I. Emerson, president of the National Lawyers Guild, in answer to a recent report of the House Un-American Committee attacking the National Lawyers Guild.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUILD ANSWERS UN-AMERICAN COMMITTEE ATTACK

Prof. Thomas I. Emerson, president of the National Lawyers Guild, issued the following statement in answer to the report of the Un-American Committee:

"The report of the Un-American Committee on the National Lawyers Guild is another typical demonstration of the fantastic standards, methods, and distortions which have earned that committee the disrespect of most thoughtful Americans. The committee's apparent purpose in this report, however, is more far-reaching than the usual one.

"Having contributed greatly to creating a hysteria in our country, under cover of which more and more dissident individuals and groups face prosecution directly or indirectly for their views, the committee now seeks through this report to intimidate or eliminate the only lawyers who have had the courage to defend those at the whipping post. In short, the committee is striking at the constitutional right of one accused to counsel of his own choice, and at the duty of every lawyer under the code of ethics not to reject a client's cause out of fear.

"We are confident, however, that guild members will not be intimidated. They and the guild will continue to fulfill to the best of their ability the special responsibility of the bar, to which Mr. Justice Douglas referred in his Altgeld Memorial address, to help make our civil liberties a vital force in American life.

"The committee recommends that because the guild is affiliated to an international bar association, the views of which the members of the committee disapprove, it should be required to register as a foreign agent. The committee does not refer to a single instance in which the guild has acted as an agent of the international association. The fact is that the guild is bound by no decision or policy of any other organization, and it has never represented or acted as an agent for anyone but its own membership. The guild is no more an agent of the international association with which it is affiliated than the American Bar Association is an agent of the Inter-American Bar Association, or the American Affiliate of International Rotary, the World Council of Churches, or the Catholic Church. Fortunately, under our law, the opinion of the Un-American Committee regarding the international association does not convert an affiliation into an agency.

"The committee's conclusion that the guild is a subversive organization (whatever that means) and should be listed as such by the Attorney General, is based essentially on two points: (1) That the guild and its members have defended the constitutional rights of Communists or alleged Communists, resisting the current hysterical witch hunt and the legislation and investigations which it fosters; and (2) that certain of its policies are somewhat similar to certain policies of the Communist Party.

"The aims of the guild as stated in its constitution include the following: 'To protect and foster our democratic institutions and the civil rights and liberties of all the people.' We have steadfastly adhered to this aim, and we shall continue to do so. We believe that liberty is indivisible, that when any group may be deprived of its constitutional rights, the liberty of us all is imperiled.

"It happens that the Communists are the scapegoat now. The main direction of the present repressive drive, as after the First World War, is against them. It is only for this reason that grave constitutional questions have so often been raised in cases involving actual or alleged Communists. We have presented our views on these questions as a friend of the court, never representing any accused person in any case. We hold that to be the highest responsibility of the bar. We shall not shrink from the fulfillment of that responsibility, however unpopular the individuals who happen to be involved. If that is subversive in America today it is a shameful reflection upon the state of liberty in our land.

"The guild's views on public questions are, and always have been, those of independent, liberal lawyers. It has considered and acted upon such questions strictly according to its view of the merits. It has taken positions in direct conflict with those of the Communist Party, just as with those of the Republican, Democratic, and other parties. This was exemplified most recently by the statement adopted by our national executive board on September 9 on the Korean and related problems. The board said, in part, 'We support the actions of the United Nations in opposing the aggression of North Korea against South Korea. We hope that this action will strengthen the authority and prestige of the United Nations and prove a deterrent to future aggression.'

"The guild is a nonpolitical bar association which supports the policies or personalities of no party. It has not been, and will not be deterred from the free exercise of its judgment, democratically determined, by the similarity between these views in any given case, and the views of any political party.

"It happens that the views of the Communist Party coincide in many instances with the views of most of the labor movement and many church and civic organizations. This is true especially of the area of civil rights and liberties, in which the guild has been most active. Presidents of the United States, in common with the guild and the Communist Party have protested the methods and procedures of the Un-American Committee. Many trade unions and church organizations have opposed universal military training in common with the guild and the Communist Party. Nonintervention in and recognition of China has been urged by many groups, including the Governments of India and Great Britain. Our opposition to diplomatic and economic relations with the Franco government is shared by the vast majority of the members of the United Nations. Undoubtedly the vast majority of the American people would approve our call to the 'United States and the Soviet Union (to) compose their differences in the briefest possible time and lay the ground work for the composing of differences among other nations.' Many other illustrations could be cited.

"To infer control or undue influence from similarity of some views is patently an absurdity. Most of the members of the United Nations vote with the United States on almost every question. Yet, the Un-American Committee would be the last to suggest that the United States controls or exercises an undue influence over these other governments. What is important is that the committee has referred to no policy or act of the guild which is not wholly consistent with the guild's vigorous support for our democratic institutions, and of every effort to further the cause of peace devoutly desired by all Americans.

"Some assertions of the committee deserve specific comment.

"It is said that 'almost without exception, its leading members * * * seek to bring the courts and its procedures into disrepute.' This conclusion is supported only by reference to the conduct of seven guild members in two cases. The guild has 85 members on its national board and many more on its local chapter boards. It has thousands of members handling tens of thousands of cases. Yet, the committee jumps easily to its conclusion. Moreover, while six of the lawyers mentioned were found by the trial judge to have had such a purpose as the committee mentions in their conduct of a single trial, this finding was held by the United States court of appeals to have been made without the hearing and opportunity for defense required by law.

"The guild is attacked for its criticism of the methods and practices of the FBI. The position of the guild is supported by the most extensive factual documentation of its criticisms and request for an investigation. None of this documentation has ever been challenged by anyone.

"The committee refers to 19 guild members who represented witnesses called by the Un-American Committee. Because these witnesses declined to answer certain questions asserting that their answers might incriminate them, the committee concludes that counsel, who advised the witnesses of their constitutional right to refuse such answers, did so under directives from the Communist Party. This conclusion is not supported by reference to a single fact or circumstance except that some witnesses were more ready to answer incriminating questions before consulting counsel than after. No doubt this would be true of all witnesses and all counsel. Moreover it is absurd to charge the guild with the conduct of a few of its members.

"Finally, the committee asserts that 'the dominant forces in the National Lawyers Guild have been composed of known Communists and fellow travelers.' In support of this three guild members are referred to, as to whom testimony was given before the committee that they were members of the Communist Party prior to the time the guild was organized. None of these three were ever active leaders of the guild. Some eight others are referred to as having been affiliated at some time with organizations disapproved of by the Un-American Committee. The dominant forces in the guild have always been the delegates to our annual conventions, chosen by the membership. They are the final determiners of policy. The committee's statement is wholly unfounded.

"The committee, as is so often the case, issued its report without notice to the guild or any hearing."

Record of Hon. Adam C. Powell, Jr., of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement on my record in Congress:

SECTION I. SUMMARY OF RECORD PRIOR TO JANUARY 1949

The New York Times on Wednesday, February 4, 1948, in a page 2 article said "the only anti-Jim Crow bill before the Congress was introduced by Representative ADAM CLAYTON POWELL, JR., Democrat, of New York, in the last session." This was stated in connection with the Truman Civil Rights Report.

Before President Truman took office, POWELL had authored or co-authored all the legislation which later became the Truman civil-rights program, including the following bills:

Anti-poll-tax, FEPC, antilynching.

Abolition of Jim Crow in interstate transportation.

Abolition of segregation in the Armed Forces.

Civil rights for the District of Columbia.

Franchise for the District of Columbia.

POWELL also wrote, introduced and steered through to enactment the only civil rights law since Reconstruction to be passed by the Congress and Senate (United States Statutes, 79th Cong., 2d sess., No. 60, Pt. I, Public Law 396). It guarantees "equitable distribution" of funds for school lunch program.

POWELL was the only Congressman to fight on the floor of Congress for the inclusion of Negroes in the permanent Air Corps bill and for the inclusion of Negro women in the permanent nursing corps of the Armed Forces and in the WAC permanent corps.

POWELL'S parliamentary maneuver was able to keep the House of Representatives from passing the southern regional Jim Crow college bill. Also, he started and led the fight lasting a solid week, to wipe out segregation in the Armed Forces (80th Cong.).

By a last minute speech in the closing hours of the Eightieth Congress, POWELL convinced the House of Representatives to vote several million dollars for the Virgin Islands.

The only Congressman to lead the fight, and take the issue to the White House so that black citizens of Panama would be given equal treatment with whites in the Panama Canal Zone. (He was sent as a committee of one to Panama to investigate these conditions.)

The only Negro Congressman to urge that the salaries of post office employees and all Federal workers be increased and to raise this issue at the committee hearing.

He chaired the Citizens Committee for the successful strike of Washington, D. C. cafeteria workers against GSI, thus bettering the living conditions of 10,000 Negro workers.

POWELL maintains full time offices in New York and in Washington, handling over 5,000 cases a year through which jobs have been obtained, pensions secured and increased, veterans assisted, and over $20,000 in cash refunded by the Federal Government.

SECTION II. EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

The following quotes are from an article in the Pittsburgh Courier of August 3, 1949, entitled "Negroes in the Halls of Congress" written by Lem Graves, Jr.:

"Once in Congress, POWELL became the articulate Congressman-at-large for United States Negroes in general and the vocal advocate of all downtrodden people. * * *

"POWELL has, in the course of his congressional career, authored the usual list of civil rights bills and has been a far more vigorous spokesman of the civil rights cause than have other Negro Congressmen. He has also been interested in labor and is second man on the Democratic totem pole in the House Labor Committee. He gets on the RECORD often with strong speeches and is easily the best showman of the Negro congressional lot.

"But almost obscured behind the glamour is some solid achievement. POWELL shepherded his Naval Academy nominee, Wesley Brown, through 4 years and saw him become the first Negro in history to graduate from that service school. He won the first Negro sponsored legislative victory when his anti-discrimination amendment to the national school lunch act was adopted. He headed a labor subcommittee which favorably reported an FEPC bill in the present Congress and fought vainly to have the House pass this bill. He fought against West Indian restrictions. He helped master-mind the deal which resulted in recommittal of the Wood labor bill after the administration failed to repeal Taft-Hartley. He saved the Virgin Islands Corporation in 1948 when its charter was about to expire. And a few weeks ago, he cleverly maneuvered a protective amendment into the long range housing bill during floor debate in the House only to see his amendment sabotaged in the all-powerful conference committee.

"POWELL'S hard-hitting attacks on the floor of Congress cover a wide range of Negro-interest subjects and practically every State in the Union. The fact that he is the race's Congressman at Large is the source of votes in New York where the political interests of the ghetto melting pot are so diverse."

SECTION III. NEWSPAPER QUOTATIONS

A. Miscellaneous statements

New York Herald Tribune editorial: "Congressman POWELL'S (FEPC) hearing is at the very least doing a good job of education. The statement of the facts now arouses public opinion. * * * We hope they are beginning to see the light" (May 19, 1949).

Roy Wilkins, administrative secretary, NAACP: "Representative POWELL conducted a brilliant campaign in behalf of his bill (FEPC) against overwhelming odds." (Associated Negro Press, March 3, 1950.)

Earl Brown, New York City councilman: "Congressman POWELL performed an efficient job as chairman of a subcommittee of the House Labor Committee. He conducted his hearings with efficiency and dignity. He engineered a recommendation to the entire House Labor Committee to approve a Federal law that would abolish discrimination in employment." (Amsterdam News, June 11, 1949.)

Val Washington, assistant to the chairman of Republican National Committee: "Castigates the weak civil rights record of the Democrats, pointing out that many key committees are chaired by minority-baiting Congressmen. He does pause to praise such as ADAM POWELL." (Chicago Defender, June 11, 1949.)

A. M. Wendell Malliet: "Congressman POWELL is doing a splendid job. He should have the full support of a united Democratic people." (Amsterdam News, June 11, 1949.)

Majorie McKenzie: "Although this was POWELL'S first chairmanship he displayed a capability that won praise even from his political enemies." (Pittsburgh Courier, July 2, 1949.)

Charlie Cherokee: "ADAM POWELL held the floor for a half hour as he took active part in the debate on the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law." (Chicago Defender, May 7, 1949.)

Pittsburgh Courier: "Congressman POWELL did a fine job in attempting to guide his bill to a vote, in the longest and most turbulent session of the House in years." (Washington Bureau.)

"Congressman POWELL has courageously conducted himself as an eloquent exponent of justice and equality before the Nation's law making body." (Some Great Men, April 14, 1949.)

"Congressman POWELL covered himself with glory at the close of the Taft-Hartley battle last week. He sat at the leadership table during the entire action and was one of the key quarterbacks of the game against Hartley."

B. Record of service

Segregation in the District of Columbia

New York Herald Tribune, March 3, 1949: "The unsuccessful attempt to drive a civil-rights wedge into Washington's long-standing segregation policies was made by Representative POWELL, Democrat, of New York, when he introduced an amendment to the appropriation bill."

New York Herald Tribune, March 15, 1949: "The defeated amendment of Representative POWELL which attempted to right the grievous wrongs of discrimination by segregation in the city of Washington, D. C., deserves editorial comment."

Washington Post: "Dixiecrats in the House this week teamed up with northern Republicans to defeat Representative POWELL'S amendment to ban segregation in the Nation's Capital by a vote of 106 to 64."

Anti-West Indian Discrimination

New York Herald Tribune, March 1, 1949: (See whole story of fight to take out of Judd bill clause which would have barred immigration of West Indians to the United States. Beginning March 1, and continuing to last days of Congress, POWELL successfully insisted upon elimination of this clause.)

New York Age, April 2, 1949: "New York Age and POWELL upset migration curb."

Amsterdam News May 28, 1949: "Congressman POWELL fought desperately against the Judd bill now pending before the Senate committee."

Kansas City Plaindealer, June 3, 1949: "Congressman POWELL led the speakers' list of the denunciation of the duplicity of leaders in Government."

Pittsburgh Courier, July 30, 1950: "POWELL leads fight against quota system."

Federal Aid to Education

New York Herald Tribune, March 9, 1949: "The House Labor Committee voted today to bar any racial discrimination in Federal aid to schools. In making the change the committee voted 19 to 5 for an amendment by POWELL, of New York."

Interracial Theater in Washington, D. C.

New York Herald Tribune, April 13, 1949: "A bill to direct the administration to lease the old Belasco Theater near the White House to the American National Theater was introduced by Representative POWELL."

Minimum Wage

(See story in all papers. POWELL appointed House conferee to meet with Senate; result: National minimum-wage upped to 75 cents.)

Aid for Panama Workers

Chicago Defender, April 23, 1949: "A bill to extend the benefits of the civil-service retirement to the Panama Canal employees was introduced last Monday by Representative POWELL."

Discrimination in Housing

Washington Post, June 9, 1949: "The House approved 199 to 41 an amendment by POWELL, giving first priority for occupancy of houses to persons removed from their home by slum clearance."

Pittsburgh Courier, July 9, 1949: "A major victory for Negro slum dwellers was won in the House last week when an amendment sponsored by POWELL passed 199 to 41. It may well prove to be one of the most important legislative contributions POWELL will make in his entire career."

Anticommunism

New York Age, April 30, 1949: "In opposing Paul Robeson's statement that American Negroes would not fight against Russia, POWELL said, 'In the hour of crisis we will be loyal to our Nation. In the event of war at any time, against anyone, we will do our part.'"

First Negro Annapolis Graduate

Washington Post, March 21, 1949: "Midshipman Brown appointed 1945 by Representative POWELL, first of his race to be graduated from the United States Naval Academy. Thomas Brandon, June 1950, graduated from West Point."

FEPC Leader

New York Post, March 30, 1949: "The whole field of discrimination in labor will be explored at a public hearing by a new House Labor Committee on FEPC under Representative POWELL. POWELL has been fighting for the naming of such a committee for 3 months."

Herald Tribune, May 11, 1949: "POWELL opens House hearing on FEPC bill—first Negro ever to preside over the drafting of civil-rights legislation in Congress * * * smoothly and quickly he cut off the only flare-up when one of the southern Democrats began a diatribe against the bill."

Washington Post, May 18, 1949: "POWELL, chairman of FEPC Committee, denounced America's railroad unions as 'scab No. 1 against democracy' because they are brotherhoods for whites only."

Amsterdam News, May 21, 1949: "POWELL, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor and Education under threat of subpena summoned the presidents of the top railroad brotherhoods before him for hearing."

Fights Segregation in Government Cafeteria

Chicago Defender, Charlie Cherokee: "NAACP Labor Secretary Clarence Mitchell with the aid of the Negro press and ADAM POWELL succeeded in finally ending segregation in Government Printing Office cafeteria."

Fights Segregation in Nation's Capital

Washington Post, May 24, 1950: "On a standing vote of 50–19 the House defeated the Powell amendment to attach an anti-segregation rider to the District appropriation bill."

Fights Segregation in the Armed Forces

Washington Post, May 25, 1950: "The House voted down 107–23 an amendment by Representative POWELL to end all racial segregation in the Armed Forces."

Time To Face Realities—Address by the Chairman, W. Arthur Simpson, at the Republican State Convention, Montpelier, Vt., September 29, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am including as an extension of remarks the speech made by the Honorable Arthur W. Simpson, chairman of the Republican State convention, at Montpelier September 29, 1950:

I am honored by selection to preside over this convention. I am not here to entertain you. I am going to make a few remarks which I hope you will find pertinent to this occasion.

This is a time to face realities and to face them without soft concealment. Thousands of American boys, ill-prepared and ill-equipped, have died or suffered grievous wounds on a far-flung battle front. The development of new areas of combat depend on the whims of our enemies. It cannot be denied that this may simply be a rehearsal for the big parade. We had been lulled into a sense of false security by little men who had crawled into position of great responsibility.

The historian will find in those things happening in the world today a familiar pattern to what has heretofore happened but the implications and impact of this conflict are the greatest in the history of civilization. This is not just another war. We are confronted by world revolution swept by forces of terrible portent because they will determine whether force or reason shall rule the world. The sword of Damocles hangs over this Nation. This is not an overstatement.

Liberty is fighting for its life. We must arm for a generation, both to protect ourselves and to police the world. There can be no compromise with these grim facts. Such a course, and we have no alternative, will be hard and expensive. The maintenance of a great standing Army, a two-ocean Navy, a great Air Force, will tremendously change the whole social and economic fabric of the Nation. It will eventually lower our standard of living. Liberty cannot be saved in its Sunday clothes.

During a time of national peril the Government has been unwilling to strengthen its credit or husband its resources. Inflation is not a threat. It is a reality. Not one single individual can consider himself immune from its consequences. The destruction of the material values built up through many generations of planning, toil, sacrifice, and thrift is a terrible thing. Lenin, the father of communism, declared that the best way to destroy capitalism was to debauch the currency.

We must put iron into our democracy. Democracy creating its own world was hard and grim and poor. Democracy in years of national peril has been rich and soft and quarrelsome. Government has been actuated by selfish political motives. It failed tragically to make peace. It failed dismally to prepare for war. These things are true. At a time to come, at a place not foretold, the life of liberty will be won or lost in an hour of battle and what happens there will have been determined beforehand, by work done in the arsenal, in the shipyard, in the airplane factory, on the tank assembly line, a few man-hours more or less. God grant that the hour will not have been struck too late.

The time is long overdue for us to seriously consider what road we are pursuing in this country. There are only two definite roads. One road is rocky but leads upward toward the summit of permanent stability. It is the road of economy, of balanced budgets, of constitutional government, and of common sense. It is a road which does not appeal to unthinking people, nor to those who have been led to believe that they can get something for nothing, but it is the only road that we can ever take to achieve any semblance of normal and permanent recovery in this country.

The other road is the well-paved road that leads ever downward. It is the road of extravagance, of loose fiscal policies, of bureaucracy, of crackpot schemes, and ideas, and at the end of this road is the mailed fist and the iron heel of a dictator.

The siren song of socialism with its fantastic promises of less work and more pay, guaranteed security, and other vistas of utopia is nothing new. It has been sung periodically since the establishment of civilization. It has brought about the downfall of nations wiser, more prosperous, and longer enduring than ours.

Government has a profound influence on the character of its people. The only progress which is really effective does not depend on the bounty of nature. It depends on the character and energy of man. The building of a great nation is essentially the triumph of character. Our founding fathers laid great stress on the pursuit of happiness. They did not attempt to guarantee it.

There is an increasingly prevalent idea throughout the Nation that the individual should look to government for his security rather than to earn it through work and industry. Man wants government to guarantee him security against all the hazards and vicissitudes of life.

Higher wages, increased comforts and luxury, which are solely the product of free enterprise and of which the people of this Nation possess more than peoples of any other nation in the world, present or past, arouse hunger for more wages with still greater comfort and additional leisure time. Political power and favoritism have given more of these comforts and leisure to some groups than to others. This is no time for higher prices, higher wages, greater profits, shorter hours, larger pensions, and rigid prices for agriculture. They are destroying the moral basis of society. They are increasing the cost of living and contributing to the depreciation of the American dollar. They are dominant factors in the rise in the cost of government and the burden of taxation.

A political power which perpetuates itself by setting class against class, by buying our votes with our own money and by special favors to minority groups, is creating a Frankenstein which will ultimately destroy the Nation. Power corrupts even the best intentioned men. Big government is vastly more dangerous than big business. The tendency is to offer more and more benefits and services for lengthened periods, at less and less (visible) cost to the recipient. Once a nation becomes entangled in the meshes of the welfare state, the party which can promise more welfare to more people has a head start in every election. James F. Byrnes has said: "Let government go unchecked and your children will be forced to pay for the folly of their fathers."

This Nation was not built on the blue skim milk of family and community unconcern. The persons who built this country were impelled by strong ideas, full of family and community responsibility. They were willing to work and save to that end. Had they been filled with the watered-out philosophies too often expressed today by our socialistic planners, the last white man would have long since been chased down the eastern slope of the Alleghenies, in fact it is doubtful if he would have ever crossed the ocean in the first place.

Our society and economy is roughly divided into two groups, one the producing-incentive group, the other the nonproductive group. Today more and more burden is falling on the producing group to support and pay for the nonproducing group. Progressively penalizing producers for the nonproducers is not only heading for trouble, it is heading for universal impoverishment. Our society must strain every effort to find a reverse process to stop the leveling off and dissipation of personal and individual energy and initiative.

This country is suffering from an overdose of selfishness and self-righteousness. Every group wants special consideration. They pool their resources and political strength to needle more out of Congress. The big moguls heading up the special groups enhance their reputation, measure their strength and increase their powers by the concessions, privileges, favors, and benefits they are able to obtain at the expense of the general public of which they are also an integral part. No one is willing to sacrifice, we cannot even be inconvenienced. Everyone is tarred by the same brush. So we go merrily down the road to inflation, repudiation, and bankruptcy.

No government will work in a land where everyone tries to work the government. When you take away the incentive to produce and the penalty for loafing, you are on the slippery road to ruin. We can take out of our economic system only what we put into it. Government can wave no magic wands, issue no decrees, make no laws which will provide things for a people who do not produce.

The only riches which enable us to eat and drink, to clothe, shelter, and educate ourselves and our families, to provide a measure of security in old age and to enable us to aid the less fortunate are the riches that are created through the skills of men in industry and business or grown through the efforts of men on farms. It is easy to forget how to plow when everyone wants to be a harvester.

The hope of mankind in relief from all forms of tyranny over the mind of man rests in the republican form of government. A hundred generations of struggle and sacrifice stands back of the experiment entrusted to the American people.

Abraham Lincoln concluded an address which is a model for brevity, clarity, and high resolve with these words: "That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Freedom is not from everlasting to everlasting. It is the obligation of each generation to insure that it be perpetually renewed and strengthened. This is our obligation, yours and mine. God helping us, we can do no less.

Crusade for Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, as one of the sponsors of the Crusade for Freedom, I ask leave, under the order entered into in the United States Senate on September 23, to insert in the RECORD the following editorial from the Hartford (Conn.) Courant which grew out of an excellent speech by Gen. Lucius Clay at the opening of the Freedom Crusade in Hartford on September 26. And may I emphasize in particular the closing sentence of the editorial that "Ideas alone can now win victories that endure," with a suggestion that the Congress has not remotely given adequate consideration to this neglected area in the conduct of our foreign policy.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CRUSADE FOR FREEDOM

If anybody has first-hand information of the conflict between the Big Lie and the Big Truth, it must be Gen. Lucius D. Clay. He was military governor in Germany in the days of the Berlin airlift. In fact for years General Clay had to contend with the Big Lie in almost every phase of the American occupation. General Clay was in Hartford last night to open the local Freedom Crusade. That fact alone lifts this cause above the level of just another drive. General Clay knows well today's bitter struggle for the minds of men.

The Crusade for Freedom, in General Clay's own words, "is a program designed to enlist the help of millions of Americans in this job of stepping up our world propaganda campaign." Such a campaign, financed privately, is already under way. Refugees from iron-curtain countries are already broadcasting to their compatriots in the Soviet sphere. An 8-foot, 10-ton Freedom Bell is now being cast in England. It will be installed in the western part of Berlin. The bell, a bronze one, bears five figures representing the five races of mankind passing the torch of freedom. It will be rung, says General Clay, "in the hope that every time it rings it will signify that freedom still lives behind the iron curtain."

Its installation in Berlin is to be attended by representatives of all free nations, and its ringing is to be broadcast throughout the world. Its pealing is expected to be taken up in every community throughout the free countries with the ringing of local church, school, and other community bells.

Do not underestimate either the power of a symbol or the effectiveness of truth spoken by simple people. The "V for victory" became a symbol that long haunted the Nazis. And the letters of American citizens to their relatives in Italy were potent factors in stemming the tide of communism in that country.

Man does not live by bread alone. And even in those countries where bread is a luxury, the hunger for freedom still exists. If this Crusade for Freedom, joined in by all the American people, can establish the Big Truth of liberty and justice in the minds of these captive Europeans, then we shall have won the only kind of victory that is real. There are no longer spoils of war from battles won. Ideas alone can now win victories that endure.

Communists and Socialists in Vermont—We Shall Have a Housecleaning To Rid Ourselves of These Termites, and To Get Rid of the Parasites Who Would Live Off the Body Politic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY
OF VERMONT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting as an extension of remarks a verbatim copy of the speech I delivered September 29 before the convention of nominate members of the Vermont Legislature:

Mr. Chairman and fellow Vermonters, appreciative as I am of the generous courtesy extended me and the high privilege which is involved in the opportunity afforded me to address you, let me put you on notice that this is not—God willing, and you all receptively minded—my valedictory. In fact, and you should know it, I have in preparation a speech for delivery on the floor in Congress, eventually to be distributed to all of you, in which I shall undertake to cover many of the things I have undertaken to accomplish during my service in Congress as your sole Representative, thanks for your sufferance, the while. I owe you a debt of gratitude for confidence manifest, immeasurable.

Today, I desire briefly to direct your attention to a few matters that deserve and must have the immediate attention of all loyal Americans, of whatsoever and of all partisan political beliefs there may be, to which matters the Republican Party of construction must pay particular heed because of its responsibility if it would preserve, as is its destiny and as of tradition, our freedom, which is the most precious heritage of America.

CALL FOR LEADERSHIP

Never was the call for leadership so loud or so compelling. Always heretofore in the emergency the Republican Party has been called upon to save the Nation and has saved it. So shall it be. Shall we do less?

The call today is louder and more widespread than ever before. In all humility but with the confidence born of what it has done, the Republican Party should assume the responsibilities of distinguished leadership out of which only can come the restoration and the preservation of the freedoms guaranteed to the people who are the Government and the life of such a democracy as we have lived and as we understand it.

Need I say, my fellow Vermonters, free government is the target of attack over a large part of the world while here at home and even in Vermont are those who would barter freedom for security. We can—we must—have both. That is one burden of responsibility which has to be assumed by the Republican Party.

As a party we must protect our form of government against those who first would destroy it by force, from outside or inside, and secondly against those whose purpose it is to make it the primary function of Government to guarantee support and social security for everybody. Instead of affording everyone an equal opportunity and a maximum freedom consistent with the same freedom for all others. Both groups and all other groups similarly minded are political termites which, unless eradicated or controlled, will topple the temple of freedom, justice, and equality for all, which is democracy defined, and as our founders established it. To prevent such a tragedy is the burden to be borne by the Republican Party. It is a tremendous responsibility. To be called upon to save Democracy is a challenge.

NO SURRENDER OF FREEDOM FOR SOCIALISM

The promises of those who told us we must relinquish some freedom in return for security have proven false again and again. There is no surrender of freedom to be tolerated, against any necessity otherwise.

Heedless of this plain lesson of history millions of Americans have forgotten that freedom and security are inseparable. They have listened to the siren promises of all the little political groups seeking power, paying lip-service to freedom, to those who would have something for nothing at the expense of those of us bound to pay, advocating a series of measures which only in the end are sure to liquidate freedom.

All these minority groups for welfare, for those who pay nothing for it, stem from that same philosophy under which and by reason of which Australia and New Zealand and England find themselves, as we find ourselves, where we are today.

I say to you that history and recent experience of other governments substantiates my statement that any system of government which offers the same rewards to the man who loafs on the street corner as to the man who works daily, will kill the greatest force that has made this United States of America the country the whole world envies, so let it be.

All these something-for-nothing programs are socialism, pure, simple, and undefiled, whether recognized as such or not. Therefore I am opposed to their continuation. Such philosophy does not fit the America we know, which we seek to protect against their efforts to socialize and destroy this country of ours.

America was built and has grown on the proposition that what the people should have is what they can get for themselves, plus such aid from others as their needs may demand from childhood to old age. To perpetuate that policy is a burden and responsibility which rests upon the Republican Party, as against the giving all to the do-nothings, which is the policy of the New Deal and the Fair Deal and the welfare state.

NO NEW ENGLAND TVA'S

I tell you, and I do not need to tell you, that work is the genius of all accomplishment. We need no more planned economies, governmental, no more rubber dollars, no more socialistic gratuities, no more tax-exempt TVA's, and no more subsidies. Who pays for them? Figure that out. You do in the last analysis. Why should you? Why should socialism set up a group of people in this United States exempt from taxes which you and I pay in order to support it?

HEAR CALVIN COOLIDGE

Think that over. It reduces itself to a situation which confronts the next Legislature of the State of Vermont, if I am correctly advised. "Why," said Calvin Coolidge, "the America which Washington founded does not mean we shall have everything done for us, but that we shall have every opportunity to do everything for ourselves." "Sovereignty," said he, "it is our belief is vested in the individual, and we are going to protect the right of the individual." I may be right and I may be wrong, but that has been my doctrine ever since I went to Congress and my votes are consistent with it and I have made many enemies because of it and I am glad of it.

And to the farmers he said, and when the history of the United States of America is written this man Calvin Coolidge will stand out as one of the protective defenders and as one of the greatest Presidents the United States ever had, "No complicated schemes of relief, no plan for Government fixing of prices, no resort to the Public Treasury will be of any permanent value in establishing agriculture."

This man Coolidge spoke, when he did talk, always whereof he knew what he was talking about. He was for economy and more of it, and for freedom and free enterprise against socialism, fascism, and communism. So I say, as a Coolidge Republican, that it is true that the greatest hoax of this century is the theory that socialism, straight or modified, is the alternative which will save us from communism. In my opinion, socialism is like the Mother Hubbard which would-be Communists put on to cover that which they would undertake to hide. In 7 cases out of 10, if you take off the Socialist nightgown you would find a Communist exposed.

May I say in the words of another: A lot of time has been lost, but thank God we are at last awakening. It is late, but I believe not yet too late. If the Republican Party will mobilize fully and organize effectively the moral, the material, and the military resources of ourselves and of all free peoples under imaginative, courageous, and inspiring leadership, then the tide of tyranny that threatens everything we count precious can be turned back. Only thus can we secure once more for ourselves and our posterity the blessings of liberty.

COMMUNIST INFILTRATION

Some 4 years ago I was criticized because I said that Vermont had been infiltrated by Communists. That criticism would not hold as of today for nobody doubts the truth of my statement. Nobody doubts that Vermont was deliberately selected by the Communists as a nest for experimentation. Nobody doubts that Vermont was selected and that Vermonters were chosen as a bunch of guinea pigs on which to experiment. Nobody doubts what they planned to do and did do in our midst. It is a matter of record that they so did do. I had reason to know I was talking the truth when I said what I did and I make no retractions. The evidences of the Communists are today to be found in more places than you would think possible in our colleges and schools. I say this without hysteria, but as a matter of fact and I insist that as a matter of self-protection the State of Vermont should undertake to segregate those who are known to be registered Communists or affiliated or associated Communists or fellow travelers, or sympathetic with any of the above-named groups, who are connected with any of our schools or colleges, or are even in our legislature. We should get rid of them and we will finally as we would of any other itch or aggravation on the body politic of the State of Vermont. They have no place in good old Vermont, and the sooner they get out and rid us of the embarrassment of their presence, or we kick them out, the better. Neither Communists nor hysteria can make much headway in this State of ours, among our people of such fiber and such faith, who are guided by the stars and not by the lights of each passing ship, if and when they know the truth, for the truth shall be told and it shall make us free.

OUR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

I realize that I will be criticized by socialistic sympathizers, Communist stooges, appeasers, and others for referring to these matters today, but I am convinced that some light should be let into some of the dark places here in Vermont. Who knows what textbooks are being used in our schools? Who knows what type of political economy and civics is being taught in our junior colleges and our universities? Nobody as a matter of fact, as Representative MILLER, chairman of a subcommittee of investigation of the House of Representatives, will tell you, because he could get no information from the chairman of the board of education or from the commissioner of education relative to the above matters. He had heard that some alleged communistically inclined textbooks were in use in Vermont. I told him, as shown by a free press survey, they had been so used, but I doubted that they were being so used now. The correspondence he had with Vermont State officials is very interesting reading, to say the least, and our failure to know what is being taught our children reflects no credit on us.

WHAT IS COMMUNISM?

In this connection let me say as did Bernard Baruch:

"Communism in America is not a political philosophy. It is not a political organization. It is not an expression of free thought. In America, it is a criminal conspiracy, inspired and ruled by the Kremlin. * * *

"It is not a matter of red-baiting, or red herrings. It is a question of survival. * * *

"You will find among us those who talk—who prate—of academic freedom, including, they say, absolute freedom to think and to teach. That is a dangerous romanticism, quite opposed to the naked reality.

"In the discussion of academic freedom, I beg you to remember that those who accept the Communist doctrine must accept the Communist discipline. They may not deviate from the line. * * * there is no academic freedom for those who are compelled to take orders from non-American sources, hostile to the spirit of our very existence. * * *

"We must continue our search for treason. That doesn't mean seeing a Communist under every bed, but it does mean the rooting out of organized propaganda, especially in the schools, colleges, and the Government. But always the process must be orderly, ethical, and free from demagoguery."

THE SOCIALISTIC THREAT

But, Mr. Chairman, under cover of all the excitement involved with respect to the Communists, it is creeping socialism which is crawling subversively, doing the work of the termite to undermine the foundations of our Government, State and National, which should give us great concern.

It has been well said that the time is here for all those who believe in America and who want above all to save her to stand up and make their voices heard above the clamor of the minorities who are destroying us.

The capitalist system can operate at its fullest efficiency only when there is a full and free flow of savings into investment—the creation of new capital machinery or the expansion of old. Whatever encourages that stimulates the system. Whatever hampers or checks that, slows it down and ultimately destroys it.

Since 1933 the administrations in power have waged relentless war upon this system, in the first years ignorantly but in its final phases with a definite design to cripple and destroy it. This must come to an end. What this Nation needs above all is men and women who are willing to create jobs. A job is an opportunity to work at a task producing useful wealth or useful services. Every man who starts a little shop to provide work for himself benefits the system. If he provides work for himself and one other, he doubles his useful contribution to the system's energy. If he can make enough profit to save and expand his business to employ 10 and then 100 and then 1,000, he is the most useful type of citizen we have.

Yet he has been pilloried as our greatest criminal and the Government has taken every conceivable measure to prevent him from accumulating those savings which alone make expansion possible. It has held him up to public scorn and hatred. It has taxed away his savings and it has so choked the streams through which savings flow into investment that our system is now wilting away before our very eyes. It is a fact that today, despite the addition of 20,000,000 to our population, the number of people employed in private enterprise upon the business of producing goods and services for the people directly is actually smaller than it was 20 years ago. The rest owe their jobs to Government directly or to the production of war materials or other products for the Government.

STOP SOCIALISTS

Therefore our course must be to stop planning for socialism and begin planning to encourage and revive free private enterprise. There are many defects to be cured—old imperfections and far more destructive new ones. Our system is in an appalling mess now, what with the debt, the confiscatory taxes which draw the blood from its very veins, Government intrusions, and the threats of ultimate extinction that are taking ever more terrifying shape. The task will call for patriotism and courage. But it must not be delayed another day.

It is my belief that we are rushing headlong down the road to collectivism or socialism much in the manner of Great Britain. * * * The free-enterprise system is being dealt savage blows—and if the trend is too long continued, will be destroyed—by (1) excessive Federal spending; (2) excessive taxation; (3) excessive Government regulation; (4) excessive Government competition with private business.

The American people will never knowingly and voluntarily give up their liberties, but the entire trend of Government during the past 15 or more years has been gradually and definitely toward a highly regimented state with personal liberty subordinated to bureaucratic control. Planned economy has been the fashion, and planned economy, in its ultimate form, is collectivism.

PRESIDENTIAL PROPOSALS SOCIALISTIC

The Presidential proposals this year included these:

Authority to control prices, wages, and employment practices; commodity control allocations; extended authority over consumer credit and bank reserve requirements; extended federalized power development through public works; expanded federalized insurance; socialization of agriculture (which turned out to be the Brannan plan); federalized urban redevelopment, housing, and farm housing; federally aided education and socialized medicine, the latter being the most costly and far-reaching Federal program yet proposed. Adoption of a Fair Employment Practices Commission, recommended by the President, would empower the Federal Government to enter every private business and say who should be hired or promoted.

Such proposals, if adopted, would expand nearly 100 different programs already spreading out like tentacles from among the 60 principal Federal departments and agencies which extend Federal administration through financial aids, grants, subsidies, and benefits, payrolls, pensions, payments, and virtually every other form of Government advance and contribution. It is my firm belief—and this is buttressed by history—that the people cannot surrender such vast power without eventually sacrificing basic individual freedoms.

If it is an insult to the intelligence of the American people to say we are on the road to socialism, as the President "cracked" at the Jefferson Day dinner, then the insult is added to the injury already done our intellect by Truman proposals and propaganda.

We have been moving steadily down this primrose path of socialism for some time, but we shall be irrevocably committed to socialism—from which there is no retreat once it is entrenched—if Congress adopts but three more of the President's projects.

A BUSY GROUP OF SOCIALISTS IN VERMONT

In conclusion, may I say, Vermont has a very busy group devoting its time and attention to the furtherance of socialistic programs and schemes under cover subversively, and active, seemingly, for the betterment of all those who, may I say, are willing to take something for nothing. I mean to be understood to say that these leaders, so-called, undertaking to convince Vermonters that what they can get for nothing is what they should have, have convinced a great many people that if by any method they may relieve themselves from a payment of their fair share of taxes by joining any association of whatever name, it is justified by reason of the benefits which they derive. This is a theory which is uneconomic, unpatriotic, and un-American.

ON CUARD

And now, I say to you, as I have said before, and I leave it with you to ponder and to consider, and as a basis upon which you, as the members of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, will act in days to come: We should dedicate our every strength against the gripping curse of communistic larcenists, guard our liberty, while we make sure we turn back those lustful men who would undertake to persuade us to close our eyes while they rob us of the things for which our fathers fought in order that we might have a chance to keep our children free.

"This is an hour to keep * * *
This is an hour to guard, letting no past
Or future moment make the present small.
Nothing except eternity can last,
And we must trust today to live at all."

Comment on Interparliamentary Conference Held in Dublin, Ireland, September 8–11, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I just received from Mr. P. J. Parker, of Dublin, Ireland, telling about the recent Interparliamentary Conference held in the city of Dublin from September 8 through 11, 1950.

Mr. Parker is a successful businessman with long experience in the United States and Canada. He was at one time the general manager of the famous Hudson Bay Stores, of Canada.

I also ask that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD following the aforesaid letter a series of editorials and special articles from Irish newspapers relating to the Interparliamentary Conference.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DUBLIN, EIRE, September 25, 1950.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I had the pleasure of meeting Senator and Mrs. Fepper, Mr. and Mrs. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. Poage, with other members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Knowing that Senator PEPPER is a very old and trusted friend of yours I arranged a little luncheon for him and for Mrs. Pepper, Mr. and Mrs. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. Poage, and a few other friends. I endeavored to make their visit to Dublin as enjoyable and memorable as possible.

I am sure you will be very pleased to hear that all of the members attending the Interparliamentary Union Conference publicly stated that the Irish meeting surpassed in organization, efficiency, and hospitality their greatest anticipation. The conference on the whole was a great success. The outstanding figure was Senator PEPPER. His address at a press conference at Leinster House re the Atlantic Pact and unity which they all declared was a masterpiece, in fact, it was by far the highlight of the conference.

To my mind, Senator PEPPER is a statesman of high caliber and well worthy of high office. He was largely responsible for the outstanding success of the Interparliamentary Union Conference.

Now, Senator, I want to offer to you and Senator PEPPER a suggestion that I believe worthy of great consideration. It is as follows: I candidly believe that if you and Senator PEPPER could convince President Truman that the elimination of the border would help to a very great extent to straighten out and fortify the Atlantic Charter and also help to further world peace before a third and last world war engulfs and destroys the present world. It seems to me it should be possible for the President and the British Commonwealth of Nations to see the light in the interest of the human family the world over. I, in my very humble capacity, am unable to understand England. Now, with the backing of the United States she has an opportunity of redeeming herself to some extent from the great crimes committed in the past against helpless nations the world over. I believe it is within your own and Senator PEPPER'S power to start this great crusade, and if accomplished, the names of Senator MURRAY and Senator CLAUDE PEPPER will live forever in the minds of the people of Ireland and of all nations the world over.

America today stands at the very zenith of its power and greatness and may God grant that the men now leading America will not have it said by future generations that she failed in her effort to obtain a world peace.

If the great minds of America follow the teaching of the first great world Moral Crusader she cannot fail.

I often think of the body of scientists sent to St. Helena in order to discover where the genius of Napoleon Bonaparte lay. To most thinking people the British Government should have sent its scientists when he was living and not trouble sending them 50 years after he was in the clay and if it had not been for an Irishman, the Duke of Wellington who beat him at Waterloo, we might have had the United States of Europe which America is hoping to obtain today. The scientist from India professing no particular denomination other than faith in his God made a very brief statement which is as follows:

"What care we for the rise or fall of Kings or Emperors
For in that coffin there lies the greatest of them all.
He fought a hundred glorious battles and half the earth was his Yet he must cross those yonder stars to know what greatness is."

So must we all, Senator; when the final day comes, kings, queens, warriors, and dictators shall all be judged in accordance with the light which God gave them while on this earth.

I am enclosing for your perusal various articles and editorials from Irish newspapers concerning the Interparliamentary Conference.

In the event President Truman and his associates can in a friendly way solve the problem of partition it will be the means I think of helping to keep democracy alive for all time to come. With America, Great Britain, and the members of the Commonwealth of Nations, including France, Italy, Spain, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark united, they can, I think, prevent world war III.

In conclusion may I ask your indulgence for presuming to offer suggestions to your good self and Senator PEPPER regarding political problems which mean so much to the world. I can only say from my heart if we had a completely united Europe it may be the means of preventing a third world war.

With sincere good wishes for yours and Senator PEPPER'S good health, and happiness, and may God spare both of you to help to accomplish the great peace which the entire world desires regardless of creed or nationality.

Most sincerely yours,

PATSY PARKER.
(P. J. Parker).

WHY SIX COUNTIES?

Nothing has annoyed the six-county leaders and Unionist Press so much as the proposal for a plebiscite made by Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida. Senator PEPPER is a very distinguished American and an experienced man of affairs. He knows what he is talking about and he understands that partition in Ireland is as fundamental a wrong as partition in Korea, which, as a recent United Nations report on that country says, was the origin of the war now costing so many lives. Senator PEPPER is also a Democrat without inverted commas, that is one old-fashioned enough to believe in the will of the people. To such a man it came quite naturally to suggest that the status of Ireland should be determined by a simple vote of its people. Then, if the national majority did not want unity, there was an end to it; if it did want unity then this disturbing problem would be settled for good.

But the one thing the British in Ireland, and those whose policy they direct, will not have at any cost is an ascertainment of the will of the Irish people. Their reason is no secret. The decision would go against them. Consequently the Unionist Press is very sharp toward Senator PEPPER, even offensive. American aid is one thing, they tell him, but American advice, no! One of the Unionist papers having lectured him on his bad manners adds:

"It does not need the prompting of a foreign country, however friendly, to show the Government at either Westminster or Stormont where its duty lies."

The reaction is so sharp because Senator PEPPER's proposal threatens the democratic facade behind which the six-county government has entrenched itself. The area detached from the rest of Ireland was chosen by Britain solely to provide a majority against unity. That majority is pointed to as if it meant something, whereas it is simply the fulfillment of a British trick. At first it deceived decent democrats but now they are coming to understand why elections always go the same way in this British enclave and they are proposing a real election. The bitter anger the proposal meets is simply because a real election would spoil everything.

Senator PEPPER being merely a "foreigner" (though a very useful foreigner both in war and peace) may not see why, if the national unit is to be broken up, there should not be a four-county election as well as a six-county one. If Derry, Armagh, Tyrone, and Fermanagh were to vote as a bloc they would extricate themselves from their present frustration and leave only two counties to maintain Belfast and to fill Stormont, and even these two counties would not be homogeneous by a long chalk.

The kernel of the partition question is this: Either it represents the will of the people concerned (which is clearly all the nation, since all the nation continually debates it) or, if there is to be a lesser division of the nation for testing purposes, then why not four counties? Both the greater proposal and the lesser the Unionists of the northeast reject with barbed words. Their resentment derives from the fact that the trick could not be played in any other way without defeating the British purpose. It cannot be a national plebiscite for the majority is overwhelming against partition; it cannot be a local plebiscite for the majority would take away most of the partitioned territory.

[From the Irish Independent, Dublin, Ireland, of September 14, 1950]

APPEAL TO DELEGATES

Following is a statement which was issued yesterday by the Anti-Partition Association to all delegates to the Conference of the Interparliamentary Union:

'On behalf of the Irish Antipartition movement, which represents the just demands of the Irish Nation, and in particular on behalf of the Nationalist minority in the six counties, now occupied by Britain, we make the following appeal. The claim of Britain to dismember the ancient Irish Nation is indefensible on either ethical or moral grounds, or under international law. It is based on a treaty which the Irish representatives were coerced to sign under threat of a resumption of the reign of terror perpetrated by Britain through the medium of the Black and Tans and other armed forces of occupation.

"Even in these circumstances, the Irish signatories to the treaty were induced to sign it only by the fraudulent representation of British statesmen that a boundary commission would be set up which would include in the jurisdiction of the Irish Government the various areas, amounting to almost half of the total area of the six counties, where the Nationalists were in the majority. Promises were made by all the leading British statesmen that the boundary commission would be an impartial tribunal and that the dismemberment of the country would be only a temporary phase during which the minority would be protected by proportional representation. All these pledges were flagrantly violated. British statesmen, once the treaty was signed, took every possible step to perpetuate partition.

"At the present time, most of the freedoms which you have striven to implement for your respective peoples have been abrogated in the six-county area, with the consent and connivance—and, in many cases, at the suggestion—of the British Government. Freedom of meeting has been denied to the Nationalist minority. Freedom to choose the employment to which their abilities and qualifications entitle them, has been denied also. The sanctity of the home and of personal freedom has been violated repeatedly, and the whole bulwark on which democracy must rest, universal suffrage, has been destroyed or rendered nugatory by the process of gerrymander.

"We would ask all fair-minded delegates—in the interest of true democracy, which we believe they aspire to serve—to peruse the various pamphlets with which they have been supplied and to lend their assistance to end the intolerable conditions existing in that portion of Ireland now occupied by Britain."

[From the Irish Independent, Dublin, Ireland, of September 14, 1950]

UNITED STATES SENATOR STRESSES UNITY NEED

He thought that a national plebiscite would be a fair way of determining what should be the form of government of this island, said Senator CLAUDE PEPPER (Democrat, Florida) at a press conference in Leinster House, Dublin, yesterday.

Senator PEPPER, who was one of the United States delegates to the Interparliamentary Conference, said that it seemed to him that it bore very directly on the interests of the security of both the United States and Britain as well as the security of Ireland itself that there should be unity in Ireland.

Professor Savory and the members of the British delegation to the conference had an informal confidential discussion on partition with Mr. de Valera. The meeting lasted several hours.

Senator PEPPER said that the unhappy problem of partition prevented the unity they desired in the Atlantic community, and he deplored the fact that Ireland was not in the Atlantic Pact.

It was but natural that this strategic island should be in association with other peoples to preserve their common freedom, and the freedom of each particular state. Yet the lack of unity here prevented such a movement, because it was felt in Ireland that the Atlantic Treaty rather tended to assure the integrity of the territory of each particular state and that this might be interpreted as giving an assurance that there would be no change in the boundary situation here in Ireland.

Any weak link in the strength of the Atlantic Pact affected the security of the United States. Today they were facing a danger more insidious than anything in the past. Not only was a certain power greater numerically than any enemy they had had to contend with, and possessed vaster territory than any nation that might be an aggressor, and had great resources, but it had developed some devilish and fiendish capacity to inflame the minds of peoples, and to make them its willing serfs to perpetuate its evil designs. It was not only attacking them externally, but right inside the border of their countries was breaking down defenses, and even breaking down the mental and spiritual resistance of their people.

"We might appropriately remind those who contemplate aggression to remember the Nuremberg and Japanese trials, where heads of states as well as high military and naval personnel were executed in dismal jailyards for aggressive war and crimes against humanity," he said.

FEDERAL PLAN

Senator PEPPER referred to the commendable efforts of the United States Ambassador to Ireland in bringing about two treaties within the past year to promote greater commerce and trade between the two countries.

Asked if he had suggested any concrete way in which the problem of partition could be solved, he said he thought it would be more fitting for the people here in Ireland to work out details, and a suitable technique. Mr. MacBride had suggested a federal plan and this obviously was a system which appealed to Americans seeing that they had the Federal system in operation in the United States.

In reply to a question as to whether it would not be desirable that the United States, in its own interests, should mediate to secure a solution of partition, Senator PEPPER said that he could not speak for the United States Government, but he was sure that if such mediation were desired, the Government of the United States would do anything it could toward healing this painful breach.

He thought, he said in reply to a further question, that a national plebiscite would be a fair way of determining what should be the form of government of this island. He believed in the principle of democratic rule, with the will of the majority prevailing and with, of course, constitutional safeguards for the rights of the minority.

"As long as you keep this partition problem out in the open," he said, "I think you are making some progress toward a solution. I have been encouraged by the candor of the talks before this Conference. I think that the march of present-day events and the pressure that they bring will bring us nearer and nearer to the necessity of healing those several breaches that exist in our Atlantic community. As the pressure of the problem grows more acute it may be that we shall have to move faster."

Asked how he assessed the prospects of international peace at the moment, Senator PEPPER said he believed they were brighter than they had been for some time. That was because they had taken steps to save the peace and because they had shown that they were willing to fight, if necessary, to keep the peace. Whether they had peace or not depended on how the aggressor appraised the unity and strength of the free world.

He expressed the belief that if this country were attacked the United States would give it assistance, but he suggested it would be better if there could be a solemn engagement such as that existing among the Atlantic Pact countries. He would, he added, like to see Ireland included in the arms aid program, and he knew that many people in his country would like to see it, too.

[From the Evening Herald, Dublin, Ireland, September 13, 1950]

UNITED STATES SENATOR AND PARTITION BARRIER TO ATLANTIC UNITY

The unhappy problem of partition in Ireland prevented, in the Atlantic community, the unity which they all desired, said Senator CLAUDE PEPPER (Democrat of Florida), one of the United States delegates to the Interparliamentary Conference, in a press conference at Leinster House, Dublin, today.

"It seems to me," he said, "that it bears very directly on the interests of the security of both the United States and the United Kingdom, as well as, of course, the security of Ireland itself, that there should be unity in Ireland."

He deplored the fact that Ireland was not a member of the Atlantic Pact group. It was but natural that this strategic island should be in association with other peoples to preserve their common freedom, and the freedom of each particular state.

Yet the lack of unity here prevented such a movement, because it was felt in Ireland that the Atlantic Treaty rather tended to assure the integrity of the territory of each particular state and that this might be interpreted as giving an assurance that there would be no change in the boundary situation here in Ireland.

Any weak link in the strength of the Atlantic Pact affected the security of the United States. There was today a greater necessity than ever before for the consolidation of nations to resist aggression and to promote Atlantic community, not only to peace, but also intimately to work together to accomplish those objectives.

"A CERTAIN POWER"

"Today," said Senator PEPPER, "we are facing a danger more insidious than anything we faced in the past. Not only is a certain power greater numerically than any enemy we have had to contend with, and possesses vaster territory than any nation that might be an aggressor, and has great resources, but they have developed some devilish and fiendish capacity to inflame the minds of peoples, and to make them their willing serfs to perpetuate their evil designs. So that they are not only attacking us externally, but right inside the border of our countries are breaking down our defenses, and even breaking down the mental and spiritual resistance of our people.

"We might appropriately remind those who contemplate aggression to remember the Nuremberg and Japanese trials where heads of states, as well as high military and naval personnel were executed in dismal jailyards for aggressive war and crimes against humanity."

FEDERAL PLAN

Senator PEPPER referred to the commendable efforts of the United States Ambassador to Ireland in bringing about two treaties within the past year to promote greater commerce and trade between the two countries.

Asked if he had suggested any concrete way in which the problem of partition could be solved, he said he thought it would be more fitting for the people here in Ireland to work out details and a suitable technique. Mr. MacBride had suggested a federal plan and this, obviously, was a system which appealed to Americans, seeing that they had the Federal system in operation in the United States.

UNITED STATES MEDIATION

In reply to a question as to whether it would not be desirable that the United States, in its own interests, should mediate to secure a solution of partition, Senator PEPPER said that he could not speak for the United States Government, but he was sure that if such mediation were desired the Government of the United States would do anything it could toward healing this "painful breach."

He thought, he said, in reply to a further question, that a national plebiscite would be a fair way of determining what should be the form of government of this island. He believed in the principle of democratic rule, with the will of the majority prevailing and with, of course, constitutional safeguards for the rights of the minority.

"As long as you keep this partition problem out in the open, I think you are making some progress toward solution. I have been encouraged by the candor of the talks before this Conference. I think that the march of present-day events, and the pressure that they bring, will bring us nearer and nearer to the necessity of healing those several breaches that exist in our Atlantic community. As the pressure of the problem grows more acute, it may be that we shall have to move faster."

Asked how he assessed the prospects of international peace at the moment, Senator PEPPER said that he believed they were brighter than they had been for some time. That was because they had taken steps to save the peace, and because they had shown that they were willing to fight if necessary to keep the peace. Whether they had peace or not depended on how the aggressor appraised the unity and strength of the free world.

Resolution by American Carpatho-Russians

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, in keeping with the order entered into in the United States Senate on September 23, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the attached copy of a resolution adopted by the administration of the American Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Diocese at a conference of the consistory held in New York City on September 28, 1950.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADMINISTRATION OF THE AMERICAN CARPATHO-RUSSIAN ORTHODOX GREEK CATHOLIC DIOCESE,
New York, N. Y., September 28, 1950.

RESOLUTION AMONG OTHER MATTERS ON THE AGENDA AT A CONFERENCE OF THE CONSISTORY HELD THIS DAY OF OUR LORD THE 28TH OF SEPTEMBER IN THE YEAR OF 1950

I

Representatives from 23 parishes of American Carpatho-Russians convened at a National Church Congress, July 25 and 26, 1950, in the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa., and proceeded to establish the Administration of the American Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Greek Catholic Diocese with a governing body named the consistory headed by the Rt. Rev. Andrew Slepecky.

II

Whereas the consistory desires to record this religious entity in the Archives of the Government of the United States of America at Washington, D. C., and to inform President Harry S. Truman, the Congress, the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the entire Nation with the founding of this religious body; that in its administration it shall be completely democratic, and free from all foreign entanglements, persuasions, and anti-American philosophies; and

III

Whereas the consistory is made up solely of either native-born or naturalized citizens of these United States of America representing 15,000 or more church followers, this consistory wishes to declare and assert in the name of all its member adherents, that—

1. We are ever grateful to the founders of the United States Constitution guaranteeing us freedom of religion.

2. We are loyal citizens of this beloved county.

3. We intensely abhor and oppose all that is alien to the spirit of our free American democracy.

Undesirables in Government Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL
OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, September 23 (legislative day of Friday, September 22), 1950

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Topeka (Kans.) Capital, of September 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOCAL LEGION BACKS SCHOEPPEL ATTACK

Senator ANDREW SCHOEPPEL apparently is not alone in his fight against communism and Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman.

On the Senate floor recently the Kansas Senator accused Chapman of Communist affiliations and has been a controversial figure ever since.

Meeting in regular session Thursday night Capital Post Legionnaires, after a report from the National Legion Americanism Committee, decided to back SCHOEPPEL. The local Legionnaires headed by Olyn Foard decided to delve into the subject after hearing that a Denver American Legion post had demanded that SCHOEPPEL apologize publicly for his remarks about Chapman.

QUERIES NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS

Foard wrote to the National Legion headquarters in Indianapolis and Thursday received a letter which he is using as source material.

The letter said Chapman had been known to deal with organizations which have all been declared subversive by accredited Government agencies.

The letter read to the Capital post membership says, "The Dies report of 1940 lists Oscar Chapman as a sponsor for the American League of Peace and Democracy. The 1948 Un-American Activities Report for California shows that Mr. Chapman was a sponsor of the National Council of American Soviet Friendship in 1943. Page 481 of Appendix Part IX of the House Un-American Activities reports show that the Honorable Oscar L. Chapman was a sponsor of the United States-Soviet Friendship rally, and page 1202 lists him as a sponsor of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship rally held at Madison Square Garden, Monday, November 8, 1943.

"TOASTS RED ARMY

"Page 1604 of the same report lists the Honorable Oscar L. Chapman as sponsor of a dinner celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red army, under the auspices of the magazine, Soviet Russia Today.

"The above-mentioned organizations have all been declared subversive by accredited Government agencies."

The report was received by the local post members with enthusiasm and Foard was appointed as a committee of one to convey the National Americanism Committee report to the Denver Legion Post.

Three Fictions About United States Role in Korea Disproved by Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I include in my remarks with pleasure an article appearing in the Boston Herald of October 1, 1950, written by Hal Clancy, Boston Traveler-Sunday Herald war correspondent and which should be given as wide publicity as possible.

In the closing paragraph of his splendid, constructive article, Mr. Clancy says:

How we will clear up these things, I don't know. But anyone who has spent a night in a fox-hole talking with our soldiers, knows that we must find the way—and the sooner, the better.

The insertion of this article is an effort on my part to cooperate with Mr. Clancy and our officers and men in Korea to correct an erroneous impression created by some sob-sister writers, mostly on the domestic front, and some others who were doing it for sniping political purposes.

Mr. Clancy's article which worried me very much is one of the finest I have ever read.

We can be proud of the record made in Korea by American officers, men and women. In my opinion the battle of Korea will go down in history as one of the great military feats of all time.

I did not for one instant think that our fellow Americans who fought in Korea did not know what they were fighting for. But there are some who did.

The article of Hal Clancy, who is and has been at the front in Korea, is a complete refutation of such an erroneous and unjustifiable impression.

His article presents to the American people the truth.

THREE FICTIONS ABOUT UNITED STATES ROLE IN KOREA DISPROVED BY FACTS

(By Hal Clancy)

SOMEWHERE IN KOREA, September 30.—This war has produced three evil fictions—absolutely unparalleled in American history—which are hurting our troops in the field as much as any enemy bullets or shells.

That this trio of falsities is absurd does not make them less lethal. They have been said and they have not been adequately unsaid.

Stated briefly, they are:

1. That our troops don't understand what they're fighting for.

2. That the American people don't understand.

3. That our soldiers are lacking in aggressiveness.

They are all lies, all of them. Whether they have been inspired by Communist propaganda or the mouthings of the professionally cynical, I don't know. But I do know they are criminal distortions. Something should be done, and promptly, about clearing them up.

Take them one at a time:

1. Our troops do know why they are fighting and what they are fighting for.

In the early, terrible days of the Korean war, some soldiers were quoted as saying they didn't know and didn't care. What answer would you expect if you walked up to a soldier who was bone-weary and still shaken from the horror of recent battle and asked: "Son, do you know what you're fighting for?"

SIZZLING REPLY

Unbelievable as it seems, I heard that question asked in that manner under those conditions very recently. The answer, not printable, was precisely what the questioner deserved.

But I have talked to infantrymen, to the battle-tried combat engineers, the tankers, the fliers, the artillerymen—hundreds of them. Frequently, I have talked to them under fire. And I have talked to the wounded lying in aid stations waiting to be evacuated.

I asked them if they thought the United States was right in supporting the UN and if the UN was right in opposing aggression.

I am still waiting for the first "No" to either question. Most of them said "Yes" in a manner which implied I was crazy to ask.

But, one way or another, every man said "Yes" to both questions.

Beyond that, they know of this fiction and they bitterly resent it. They consider it—as indeed it is—a monumental slur at their intelligence.

The average soldier is not a speech maker. But those with whom I have talked believe, a little angrily, that their actions should be sufficient answer. No one familiar with this war could doubt for a moment that these men have a thorough conviction or righteousness and necessity—though they would never word it that way. They are motivated by more than orders.

CREDIT TO ARMY

The much-maligned and overly criticized Army deserves some credit for this. Its educational program, the brunt of many poor jokes, has been largely responsible for this mental conditioning.

2. Of course, most Americans know why we are fighting and, as evidenced by the extraordinarily spontaneous public support of our action, are ready to see the thing through.

But our soldiers do not believe this—at least there are a very great number of them who do not. Time and again I've been asked:

When are they going to wake up at home and realize that this is a real war we're fighting—and why we're fighting it?

Here is the preposterous contradiction: Some, at home, saying the soldier doesn't know why he fights. Soldiers, in the field, saying civilians don't understand.

Obviously, both understand—very well. If that were all that mattered, there'd be no problem. But it isn't. It is important to our soldiers that positive action be taken to eliminate both doubts. A soldier, it would seem, would enjoy better morale if he were sure he was not regarded as a moron at home. It would also help him if he were sure that America knew why he fought, how hard was the fight, how important the victory.

CIVILIANS ALSO SUFFER

The soldiers don't like making all the sacrifices. They aren't making all of them. Civilians, though to a far lesser degree, are making them also. But it is terribly and pathetically wrong that the soldiers do not know this.

3. Of all the untruths, the hints, and on a few occasions flat statements, that our men lack aggressiveness are worst of all.

Our soldiers need no defense. The record is only too clear.

But they know what has been said and they are deeply resentful.

The fact, of course, is that rarely in the history of American arms have our soldiers performed so gloriously.

The early days in Korea saw American soldiers outnumbered 20 and sometimes 30 to 1. They lacked supplies of all types while the enemy seemed well equipped. They fought tanks with weapons that were almost completely ineffectual. But they fought them. They didn't run.

There were times when one division, which, according to the book, cannot be expected to defend more than a 12-mile front, was spread over almost 40 miles against overwhelming numbers of reds.

Look at the record: Our battalions fought divisions. Our companies held off regiments. Ask any military expert and he will tell you that is impossible, especially when the enemy also held the edge in weapons.

And that's true. It is impossible. But we did it.

ORDERLY RETREAT

When we retreated, we withdrew with amazing order. There was no rout, no panic. Our outnumbered, outgunned, outsupplied troops—fighting day and night against Red troops—made the enemy pay a fantastic price in men and matériel for every yard we gave up.

When, finally, we had retreated as far as we intended to go, we announced we would fight to the death for the ground we held. At that moment, looking at the situation on paper, we seemed to be a hopeless underdog.

But we held.

Now, though still outnumbered, we have the supplies and we are on the move—with an aggressiveness that must strike a deep chill in the hearts of would-be aggressors elsewhere in the world.

It is true that these falsehoods are no longer put into words frequently. But that is not enough. A falsehood does not disappear. It has to be retracted.

EDUCATION NEEDED

A large-scale educational program is needed. Not propaganda, education. We have merely to promote, forcefully, the simple facts that our men do know why they fight, that our people are in the fight, too, and that the soldiers who have fought in Korea have won lasting glory and the salute of decent men, everywhere, for their courage.

How we will clear up these things, I don't know. But anyone who has spent a night in a fox hole talking with our soldiers, knows that we must find the way—and the sooner, the better.

The Human Rights Jefferson Fought For Are Being Won

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR G. KLEIN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, September 23, 1950

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an extraordinary and heartwarming article from the bulletin of the Department of State dated September 25, 1950.

This is a careful, objective, nonpolitical, even somewhat dry account of the slow and small but steady steps we have made in these United States in the year 1949 in spite of the wild hysteria and emotionalism climaxed in the last day of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress by enactment of the miscalled Internal Security Act over the vigorous veto of the President.

To me, steeped as I am in the Jeffersonian principles of human rights and individual dignity, this account is a great comfort; and if the article itself is nonpolitical, there is nothing nonpolitical in my reaction to it.

I am very glad indeed to claim credit for the Democratic Party for these advances in human freedom, won in spite of and not because of the obstructive minority.

In truth, this sober narrative reflects a sad frustration of the magnificent message on civil right enunciated by President Truman in the opening day of this Congress; we have fallen far short of the bright goal set by the President then.

How much less would have been accomplished without the heroic leadership of President Truman I leave, Mr. Speaker, to your own contemplation.

UNITED STATES DEVELOPMENTS IN HUMAN RIGHTS DURING 1949 [1]

Significant statutory and administrative developments concerning human rights in the Federal, State, and local governments in the United States during 1949 are herein presented. It should be borne in mind, however, that these 1949 developments can be understood only when viewed against the total background of assurances of human rights in the United States, including the Federal Constitution, its Bill of Rights and subsequent amendments to the guaranties contained in the various State constitutions, and the vast body of pertinent legislation and court decisions.

In this connection, for example, the United States Supreme Court in 1949 continued its traditional role of expanding and interpreting the many human rights guaranties of the Federal Constitution relating to personal liberty and security. In Lustig v. United States, the Court applied the doctrine that evidence which has been obtained under an illegal search and seizure participated in by a Federal officer will not be admissible in a Federal court, in spite of the fact that the search and seizure was conducted by State officers to whom this principle has not been applicable (Wolf v. Colorado).[2]

Elsewhere, the Court amplified for the States the application of the "due process" clause of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution to assure their affording basic guaranties of criminal justice. In Watts v. Indiana, in Turner v. Pennsylvania, in Harris v. South Carolina, convictions for murders based on confessions which were obtained while holding the accused persons incommunicado for several days without arraignment and without advice as to the prisoners' constitutional rights, were reversed. In Gibbs v. Burke, the Court held that the accused in a larceny case had been denied a fair trial because he was not represented by counsel during a trial in which hearsay and other improper evidence had been admitted. It was stated by the Court that the primary duty is on the trial judge to determine the accused's need of counsel at arraignment and during trial and to decide in each case whether the need is so great that deprivation of the right works a fundamental unfairness.[3]

GUARANTIES IN INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

Three international agreements to which the Government of the United States is a party and which entered into force in 1949 contain clauses protecting human rights.[4]

Article XI of the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States and the Italian Republic, which entered into force on July 26, 1949, provides that the nationals of each contracting Government, individually and collectively, shall be permitted full religious freedom when in the territory of the other Government; that their nationals, or corporations and associations, when in the territory of each other, shall be free to write, report, and gather information for dissemination to the public and shall be free to transmit such information abroad as well as to publish it within the territory of each other.

The occupation statute for western Germany defines the powers retained by the three occupying powers, France, the United Kingdom, and the United States, after the establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany. In this document, which entered into force on September 21, 1949, the three Governments declare their intention of seeing that the German people of the three western zones enjoy th maximum possible self-government. The three Governments also assure to the German people of those zones that the agencies of the occupation will respect the civil rights of every person to be protected against arbitrary arrest, search, or seizure; to be represented by counsel; to be admitted to bail, as circumstances warrant; to communicate with relatives; and to have a fair and prompt trial.[5]

On November 22, 1949, the High Commissioners of the United States, France, and the United Kingdom reached an agreement with the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany which they hope will facilitate the incorporation of Germany "into a peaceful and stable European community of nations." In article V of the protocol of agreements the German Federal Government affirms its resolve, as a freely elected democratic body, "to pursue unreservedly the principles of freedom, tolerance, and humanity, * * * to conduct its affairs according to those principles, * * * to eradicate all traces of nazism from German life and institutions, * * * to liberalize the structure of government, and to exclude authoritarianism." [6]

ACTS OF CONGRESS

The Eighty-first Congress of the United States approved several laws during 1949 that bear upon the social and economic rights now recognized as fundamental.

Housing Act of 1949: This act, which was approved on July 15, 1949, authorizes the provision of low-cost housing units during the next 6 years; provides for a comprehensive program of Federal research designed to relieve underlying technical, economic, and social housing problems; and authorizes financial assistance to farm owners to enable them to construct, improve, or repair farm housing and other farm buildings. Preference for admission to the low-rent housing authorized by this act is given families, otherwise eligible, who are displaced or are about to be displaced by public slum clearance, redevelopment, or low-rent housing projects, with certain veteran-preference features. The Housing Act of 1949 establishes a national housing policy which reads as follows:

"The general welfare and security of the Nation and the health and living standards of its people require housing production and related community development sufficient to remedy the serious housing shortage, the elimination of substandard and other inadequate housing through the clearance of slums and blighted areas, and the realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living and environment for every American family, thus contributing to the development and redevelopment of communities and to the advancement of the growth, wealth, and security of the Nation." [7]

Fair labor standards amendments of 1949: This legislation, which was signed by the President on October 26, 1949, strengthens the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 in the following ways: (1) Increases the statutory minimum wage of all workers in interstate commerce as defined by the act; (2) redefines the term "oppressive child labor" to correct an unintentional error in the 1938 act which permitted a parent to employ a child in his custody under 16 years of age in a hazardous occupation while he could not employ the same child over 16 years of age in the same occupation and makes the employment of "oppressive child labor," as redefined, a direct violation of the act; (3) extends coverage to include certain agricultural handling and processing occupations; and (4) permits the administering authorities to supervise the payment of, and under appropriate conditions to bring court action to recover, back wages owed to employees under the terms of the law.[8]

Hospital Survey and Construction Amendments of 1949: These amendments were approved on October 25, 1949. They continue and increase Federal financial aid to the States for the construction of public and other nonprofit hospitals. The amendments also authorize grants-in-aid to public and private nonprofit agencies for the study of the development, utilization, and coordination of hospital services, facilities, and resources. This provision is particularly significant as experience under the Public Health Service Act of July 1, 1944, had indicated that although a great many small hospitals were being built, they could not provide a complete service nor could they be staffed in such a way as to handle all types of cases and illnesses. It was apparent that these small hospitals needed to be linked with larger hospitals. The grants-in-aid will make it possible to build up and supplement medical care in rural areas, and will tend to reverse factors which in the past have led to the concentration of medical personnel and facilities in the large cities.[9]

Nineteen hundred forty-nine amendments to the Rural Electrification Act of 1936: Today the increased use of electricity on farms is an important element in improving the standards of living of both the farm and nonfarm population. Legislation enacted on October 28, 1949 (63 Stat. 948), provides for the expansion of telephone services (1) in rural areas, which include cities and villages of 1,500 population or less; and (2) in areas surrounding towns and cities of more than 1,500 population and their suburban residential areas.[10]

FEDERAL REGULATIONS AND INSTRUCTIONS

In the execution of national laws, the various departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Federal Government from time to time issue regulations and instructions. Several directives of this kind were issued during 1949 which strengthen the enjoyment of human rights.

Instructions for carrying out the fair employment program: The President in Executive Order 9980 of July 26, 1948, called for more effective application of the long-established policy of employment in the Federal service on the basis of merit and fitness alone, without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin.[11] Instructions issued by the Fair Employment Board of the United States Civil Service Commission, effective March 24, 1949, require each Government department to appoint officers in both their home and field offices who shall have full operating responsibility for carrying out the President's fair-employment objectives. Under these instructions, each department is required to make known the names of these officers to all its employees.

Amendments to National Capital Parks Regulations: The National Park Service of the Department of the Interior amended the National Capital Parks Regulations on May 20, 1949, to prohibit the publicizing of the facilities, accommodations, or any activity conducted in the park area of the National Capital in such a way as to reflect upon or question the acceptability of any person because of his race, creed, color, or national origin. Operators or any employees of any public facility or accommodation, likewise, are prohibited from discriminating by segregation or otherwise against any person in the furnishing of any accommodation, facility, service, or privilege offered to or enjoyed by the general public in the park areas of the city of Washington.

Amended housing credit regulations: Amended regulations issued by the Federal Housing Administration on December 12, 1949, add several new sections to the National Housing Code. Under these new sections, property, the sale or occupancy of which is placed under any racial or religious restriction, is not eligible for new Federal loan guaranties.

Military directive: In Executive Order 9981 of July 26, 1948, the President of the United States proclaimed a policy of equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed service without regard to race, color, religion, or national origin. In furtherance of that policy, the Secretary of Defense on April 6, 1949, directed the three branches of the armed services to examine their practices to determine what steps could and should be taken to eliminate racial discrimination in the services, and to submit in writing their detailed proposals. The Air Force's plan received official approval on May 11, the Navy's plan on June 7, and the Army's plan on September 30, 1949. Under the Army's new program, for example, military occupational specialties, formerly closed to Negroes, are now open to all qualified personnel; Negro quotas for selection to attend Army schools are abolished, with selection now made from the best qualified personnel; promotion is administered on single-standard merit basis; and white and colored students attending Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) summer training camps remain together and are trained together. Under the old policy, Negro ROTC students attending such camps were placed in Negro units for their training.[12]

STATE AND TERRITORIAL LEGISLATION

The legislatures of 44 of the 48 States, as well as those of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, met in regular session in 1949. It has not been found practicable to cover every item in the great volume of their legislation that has a bearing upon human rights. Appropriation acts, which are not included in the table, reflect the continuing support given the maintenance of civil rights and such economic and social rights as social security, housing, health, education, and similar activities authorized in legislation of earlier years.

During the year there was considerable controversy regarding the effect of legislation adopted by some State legislatures which applied to teachers and others holding public employment. This legislation related to organizations believed to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force and violence, and in some cases called for special oaths of loyalty to the United States Constitution or of nonmembership in such organizations.

Perhaps the most fundamental State and Territorial legislation, from the point of view of human rights, which was enacted during 1949 concerns the elimination of discrimination on account of race, creed, color, or national origin in the fields of employment, education, and public accommodation, and in State militia. Many laws also were adopted which either materially strengthen existing labor laws, or add new features protecting workers. There were a number of enactments which specifically aim at the protection of women and children. Health laws were broadened, primarily to include additional services, such as psychiatric aid.

Discrimination in employment: One of the basic ideals for which the Government of the United States was founded concerns the right of an individual to succeed to the best of his ability.

In Graham v. Brotherhood of Firemen, the United States Supreme Court reaffirmed a principle already established in the field of collective bargaining in Steel v. L. N. R. Co., and in Tunstall v. Brotherhood, that an exclusive collective bargaining representative for a craft or class of employees has the duty to represent all members who belong to the craft or class of employees without racial discrimination.[13]

In Lincoln v. Northwestern Co., and A. F. of L. v. American Sash and Door Co., the United States Supreme Court hald valid State laws guaranteeing a person the opportunity to obtain or retain employment whether he is or is not a member of a labor organization. In an opinion concurring in the results reached in these cases, Mr. Justice Frankfurter noted that article 20, clause 2, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, December 11, 1948, declares that, "No one may be compelled to belong to an association."[14]

This ideal has also received considerable impetus in recent years through the passage of what are called "fair employment practices acts."

Prior to 1949, four States—New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Connecticut—had adopted such acts, with enforcement provisions. Two other States—Indiana and Wisconsin—had laws providing for voluntary compliance. Four new States—New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Washington—enacted legislation during 1949 forbidding racial or religious discrimination in employment. Although similar, these laws are not identical in coverage, types of discrimination prohibited, or methods of administration.[15]

New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Connecticut enacted measures in 1949 strengthening the antidiscriminatory laws already on their statute books. New York, for example, passed a law in 1949 forbidding questions on place of birth of applicants for civil-service examinations. New Jersey adopted a law combining the provisions of a 1945 antidiscriminatory measure with those of its civil-rights law and placing the administration of both under a single administrative agency, the commission on civil rights.[16]

In addition, California prohibited in 1949 the inclusion of any question relative to an applicant's race or religion in application forms for State employment. Several other States already had such provisions in their laws respecting civil-service employment. Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota provided for special commissions to study the problem of discrimination in employment.[17]

Several cities in the United States have enacted fair employment practices acts. One city, Richmond, Calif., adopted such an ordinance in 1949. It prohibits discrimination on account of race, creed, or color in hiring by the city or by its contract and franchise holders, and carries a fine of $500 or 6 months in jail for violation. The other cities having similar ordinances include Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, and Phoenix, Ariz. The ordinances of three of these cities—Chicago, Minneapolis, and Philadelphia—apply to private as well as to public employment.

Discrimination in education: Closely allied to the ideal of equal employment opportunities for all is that of equal educational opportunities. The majority of public schools throughout the United States have always been open to all races without distinction. Laws eliminating discrimination because of race, creed, color, or national origin in education have recently been adopted by several States on which questions have arisen. New York took the lead in this respect by passing a law in 1948 which prohibits racial discrimination in all schools and colleges, private as well as public, except those under religious auspices. Two other States followed the New York example in 1949, but on a less broad basis. The State of Indiana adopted a law abolishing separate schools for white and colored students and progressively eliminating segregation in its public-school system from kindergarten to university.[18] This law becomes fully operative by 1954. A 1949 Wisconsin law prohibits the establishment of separate schools or school departments and forbids the exclusion of any child between the ages of 4 and 20 years from any public school on account of religion, nationality, or color.[19]

The public schools of Oklahoma, like those of Indiana and a number of other States,[20] have been organized and maintained on the principle of providing equal educational opportunities in separate schools for white and colored students. However, in response to a ruling by the United States Supreme Court (Sipuel v. Board of Regents (322 U. S. 631)) that equal graduate-school facilities must be provided to Negro students and in the same full measure as provided for students of any other color, the State of Oklahoma adopted a law on June 9, 1949, admitting qualified Negro students to its institutions of higher learning serving white students, to pursue such courses of instruction as are not given in the institutions established and maintained for the use of Negro students. This act stipulated that the courses of instruction given to Negroes in the white institutions must be either at separate times or in separate classrooms.[21]

Discrimination in public accommodation: Two States approved legislation during 1949 eliminating racial segregation in housing. They were Connecticut and Wisconsin. The new Connecticut law expands the coverage of previous legislation to include public-housing projects as well as hotels, restaurants, railroads and other public transportation, theaters, motion-picture houses, and recreation parks. It carries a fine or imprisonment, or both, for violation of its provisions. Wisconsin also amended previous legislation by providing that no veteran, otherwise eligible, should be discriminated against for admission to veterans' housing projects because of race, color, creed, or national origin. The State of Florida enacted legislation authorizing the authorities of Miami Beach to prohibit the publication or distribution of literature tending to discriminate against or actually discriminating against any person or any religion, race, or creed in places of public accommodation, resort, or amusement in the city of Miami Beach.[22]

In addition to these laws, other developments occurred in the field of housing which have an important bearing on nondiscrimination. In 1948 the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that State and Federal agencies might not enforce racial or religious restrictions on the ownership of real property, thereby removing the support of law from restrictive housing covenants. In December 1949, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama held unconstitutional racial zoning ordinances of the city of Birmingham, barring Negroes from residing in dwellings in certain sections of the city.

In a court decision, affecting segregation in public accommodations, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia held that the 1949 order of the United States Civil Aeronautics Administrator prohibiting racial segregation at the Washington National Airport became the controlling policy at the airport.[23]

Other housing legislation.—The legislatures of 32 States, and those of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands enacted housing legislation during the calendar year 1949. Most of the legislation amended and enlarged existing laws pertaining to housing authorities, or amended or enacted slum-clearance and redevelopment statutes. The action of the Maine Legislature in enacting the Maine Housing Authorities Act is of particular interest. This act, which is similar to low-rent housing legislation already in effect in other States, provides for the creation of local housing authorities to undertake low-rent housing projects. Thus, Maine became the forty-second State to enact legislation aimed at permitting participation in the federally aided low-rent public-housing program. The legislatures of at least six States—California, Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Oregon, and Pennsylvania—provided for housing studies and investigations to ascertain, study, and analyze all facts relating to community redevelopment and housing problems, with particular reference to legislation supplementary to Federal enactments. Other subjects covered by 1949 State housing legislation included greater protection against evictions, student housing, housing aids for veterans, provisions for middle-income housing, and the reconstruction or rehabilitation of dwellings by authorized housing cooperatives for their members.[24]

Discrimination in State militia: Several States followed the example of the Federal Government (see above) in declaring a policy of equality of opportunity and treatment for all in the armed services by outlawing racial discrimination in their National Guards. California, Connecticut, Illinois, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin, as New Jersey had already done, abolished racial segregation, while New York and Pennsylvania passed laws of a more general tenor. The Pennsylvania law, for example, states that "there shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons * * * giving due regard to the powers of the Federal Government which are or may be exercised over all the militia of the Commonwealth and to the time required to effectuate changes without impairing the efficiency or morale of the militia."
